The circumstances of the two cases are very different, but there is an assumption in this debate not warranted by any facts before the Senate, not warranted by any facts known to me, which is, that Oregon has confessedly more population than Kansas. I deny it. Where is the evidence of it? Kansas gave a majority of ten thousand votes against the Lecompton constitution, and we all know that those who favored it did not vote at that election. It had some supporters. Six thousand votes were returned in favor of it. More than half of them I believe to have been fraudulent; but suppose there were some two or three thousand pro-slavery votes for it, there were more than ten thousand given against it, making a vote of at least thirteen thousand. The largest vote ever polled in Oregon exceeds ten thousand but a few hundred, so that the evidence is that Kansas has a larger population than Oregon.

But, sir, whether that be so or not, the fact that we have voted to admit Kansas as a State, and I did so at the last Congress, is not to preclude me from voting against the admission of another State under different circumstances. Congress has a discretion to admit States or not. The Constitution provides that the Congress of the United States may admit new States into the Union. When a state of things arises endangering the peace of the country; when an army is stationed in one of your Territories to preserve the public peace at an expense of millions of money; when thousands of soldiers are quartered there; when, as I believe, a military despotism has been established in a Territory; am I to be told because under such circumstances I would not stickle for the full amount of population before I would relieve that people, that therefore, when a Territory is peaceful, when none of these considerations exist, when there is no pressing necessity for action in order to relieve the country from civil war, and perhaps save the Union itself from destruction, I must vote to admit it with the same amount of population? Sir, the circumstances are very different. I said at the last Congress that I would not vote to admit Kansas as a State but from the pressing urgency of the case. I would have done almost anything in my power to relieve that people from the despotism under which they were laboring.

Now, sir, why is it that Oregon is to be admitted as a State? Why is the equality between the States of the Union to be disturbed by allowing one State a representation for fifty thousand population, and requiring more than ninety thousand from another? Is there any pressing necessity for it? If so, I do not know what it is. I see no reason in the world for it, and I am not to be governed by any such pressure as is brought to bear on some persons, who are urged to vote for the admission of Oregon because it is a free State. Why, sir, I will not vote to admit a free State improperly any quicker than I would vote to admit a slave State improperly. I will vote for neither to come into this Union, except on conditions which I believe to be right, just, and proper, under the circumstances of the case. The fact that Oregon has established a free-State constitution will not induce me to vote to admit her into the Union when she is not entitled to admission. I am glad she has come as a free State, but it does not change my views as to the propriety of her admission one iota. I recognize, to the fullest extent, the idea of State sovereignty. I admit the right of the people of Oregon, when they form a State constitution, to regulate their own affairs, and I never thought there was any practical importance in a controversy about the admission of slave States or free States. The contest is about slavery in the Territories of the United States, and no man of any party contends that the Federal Government has anything to do with slavery in any of the States of the Union. It is with it in the Territories. There Congress has authority to regulate the subject and may properly exercise it. But when a Territory has population sufficient for a State government and forms a State government for itself, it will regulate this subject as it pleases. We have no authority to interfere with it and no party in the country ever contended that we had. Therefore, sir, I regard it as a matter of very little importance; practically I could never see any importance in the question about which so much has been said of the admission of a free or a slave State.

Does human freedom gain anything by keeping out of the Union a Territory in which slavery is tolerated? What matters it to the slave whether he is held in slavery by virtue of a territorial or a State law, provided he is enslaved? You gain nothing to human freedom by keeping a slaveholding Territory out of the Union. Suppose you insist that they shall adopt a free constitution when they are admitted, have you any power to prevent their changing their constitution the day after they are admitted? Does anybody contend for the power to prevent a State, when once admitted, altering its constitution as it may provide? No one. Sir, the controversy between parties in this country is not on the question of admitting free States or slave States. The controversy is behind that; it is in regard to the Territories of the United States. If you have free Territories, if you preserve the country free while in a territorial condition, there will be no danger of slavery being introduced either when the Territory asks for admission as a State or after it shall have become a State of the Union. In this day and age of the world you cannot assemble together one hundred thousand people, even South Carolinians or Georgians, to form a government, without any slaves or negroes among them, who would agree to introduce them. So far as I understand those with whom I act, our doctrine is for the rights of the free white man; we want nothing to do either with free negroes or slave negroes. I say you cannot get together, at this day, one hundred thousand white people without negroes among them, free or slave, who will then introduce slavery or free negroes either.

Now, sir, I see no occasion for bringing Oregon into the Union; there is no such emergency as existed in regard to Kansas. If the rule is right, that a State, in order to be admitted, should have a population sufficient for one member in the other House, let us apply that rule here. If it be right to apply it, after we shall have admitted Oregon, is it not right to apply it before? Even if Kansas had been admitted, and wrongly admitted, must we continue the error? Or shall we cease to do evil and learn to do well? Sir, apply the rule now, if it is right. If it is unjust to the people of other States to give representation in Congress to fifty thousand people in Oregon, why consummate that injustice? Oregon has had no authority to form a State constitution; no enabling act was passed for her; and though I agree with my colleague, that a State may be admitted into the Union, without any enabling act, it is irregular. The regular and direct mode is for Congress to provide how a State government shall be formed out of a Territory, and provide for ascertaining the population, so that everything may be done regularly, and the State brought into the Union, in due time, with a population sufficient to entitle her to admission.

Entertaining these views, I cannot vote for the admission of Oregon at this time. It was asserted the other day that Oregon had a larger population than I supposed—more than forty or fifty thousand. If we postpone this bill until December, the fact, in regard to this matter, can be ascertained in the mean time. One of the Senators from California has stated that the persons from whom poll tax is collected in Oregon amount to fifteen or sixteen thousand. I know not from whence that information is derived, nor, if that were shown to be the fact, do I know upon whom this tax is assessed. For aught I know, it may be assessed upon all classes of persons, and not upon voters merely. The best evidence we have before us of the population is the vote, and judging by that, it cannot exceed fifty thousand.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have but a very few words to say; and first, as to the question of population. I think it is very clear that the population of Oregon is larger than that of Kansas. That it is not equal to ninety-three thousand, I think is equally clear; that is, about fifty-five or sixty thousand, in my opinion. Those who have a better chance than myself of forming a correct opinion—the Senators from California and the Delegate from Oregon—think it eighty thousand. Be that as it may, I shall not touch that question.

The point raised by my colleague is against the admission of a State not having the full population sufficient, according to the ratio of representation, for a member of Congress. I am glad that he is ready to adopt that as a general rule.

I have struggled hard for years to secure the adoption of that rule. I tried to apply it to Kansas in 1856, but my colleague would not help me to do it. He says if it is right as a general rule, it is proper to apply it now; and why do wrong once more, and afterwards apply a right rule? Then, however, he voted for the admission of Kansas with the Topeka constitution, notwithstanding the smallness of the population, and although that constitution had been sanctioned by only about two thousand votes; though it had not been formed by a legal convention; though there had been no regularity in the proceedings that led to its adoption. Again this year he votes to allow Kansas to come into the Union either with the Lecompton constitution or a new constitution, as the people should see proper, with probably forty thousand population. Perhaps it would have been well for him then to consider whether he had not better do right, and apply the general rule to Kansas. Why does he vote to apply it to Oregon, and not to Kansas? I made the exception of both Oregon and Kansas, because they were two inchoate States, standing on an equal footing, so far as the want of a full population and the absence of an enabling act were concerned. To admit one and reject the other, is odious and invidious. To admit the one which has been irregular in its proceedings, and reject the one which has been regular; to admit the one which has been rebellious in her spirit towards the Government, and reject the one which has been loyal and devoted to your institutions; to exclude the one which is a regular, quiet, and well-settled community, and admit that which has been in turmoil and strife and civil war, thus rewarding it for strife and civil war, is, I think, a discrimination that is unfair and unjust.

I insist now upon making an exception of both these inchoate States. Treat Oregon as you have treated Kansas; waive the objection of an enabling act; waive the objection on the ground of population, and I will apply the rule to every other case. I have offered in my place, again and again, in debate at this session, to apply this rule to Oregon if you would apply it to Kansas. I have proposed here, as a settlement of the whole slavery controversy, a provision that neither Kansas nor any other Territory shall be admitted as a State until it has the requisite population to entitle it to a Representative in Congress according to the Federal ratio. I proposed that as an adjustment; but it was rejected as applicable to Kansas, and yet it is now to be applied to Oregon; and my colleague asks me, why will you do wrong in the case of Oregon? and then votes to apply the general rule. May I not ask why you did wrong in Kansas, and now wish to apply the restrictive rule to the inchoate State of Oregon, with a larger population, a loyal, law-abiding, prosperous, and obedient people? Are we to be told that rebellion is to be rewarded; that civil war is a passport to speedy admission into the council chambers of the nation, and that, if a State wants to come here against rule, all it has to do is to violate the peace of the country, raise the standard of rebellion, shed fraternal blood; and that rebellion and bloodshed are the speediest road to the admission into the Union of States? If you put it on that ground, Oregon may give you a sample of a speedy mode of getting into the Union as well as Kansas. If you are going to drive her to rebellion, in order to establish her claim to consideration and to speedy admission as a State, she can resort to that expedient as well as others. I am told she will not do it; I do not believe she will. Her settlements were commenced at an early period by hardy pioneers, at a time when the country was under joint occupation of England and the United States. No government being established for them, they made one for themselves, and they governed themselves for years without protection from this country or any other. Afterwards, you gave them a territorial government, and they went on under it quietly and peacefully. They are a quiet, sober, law-abiding people; they have shown their capacity for self-government, and there is no reason why they should not be admitted into the Union now.

There are great reasons in favor of admission. The Pacific coast has vast interests which are now represented by two Senators on this floor, and two Representatives in the other Hall of the Capitol.

I desire to give additional representation in each branch in order that the Pacific slope may have a fair voice and just representation in the councils of the nation; and if we would relax the rule anywhere it should be to give a fair voice to the Pacific coast. I have seen Oregon and Washington Territories suffer in their interests because of the want of representation here, and it was not in my power to prevent it. California has had vigilant Senators here looking after her interests, and drawing everything that the Government could control into California, when, if there had been a representation of the whole coast, you would have heard a little oftener of the Columbia river, and of Puget sound, when you came to the distribution of the patronage of this Government, or the distribution of money for public works, and to develop the country. It is fair and just that they should have a representation at as early a period as you can give it to them consistently with those rules which you apply to other States.

I say, therefore, if you make a distinction, it should be in favor of Oregon instead of against her. I am reminded that the House of Representatives passed an enabling act last year for Oregon. That is true; I have stated it before in debate. It was reported favorably by the Committee on Territories of the Senate, and would have passed if we had had another day's session. It was lost on the last night of the session. I was blamed for not succeeding in getting it through. I had the territorial business of Oregon, Minnesota, Kansas, and all the other Territories pressing on me at once; each Delegate thought I should give preference to his business, and the Delegate from Oregon thought hard of me because I did not succeed in getting the enabling act through. The Senate unquestionably would have passed it then if we could have had a vote on it. The people of Oregon, knowing it had passed the House of Representatives, knowing that it was understood it would pass the Senate, proceeded to call a convention in obedience to what they supposed to be the assent and permission of Congress at the time. As I have said, their proceedings have been regular. Now, why exclude them on this technical rule of a want of population, when you would not apply it to Kansas, nor to other Territories heretofore? I say admit all the present inchoate States; Oregon is the last of them; and then I am ready for your general rule, as I have proposed, and I shall adhere to it in the future, but I will not make this odious discrimination between these two inchoate States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am disposed to vote for the admission of Oregon, though I believe her population is not equal to the ratio required for a Representative in Congress; but as I have voted for Minnesota, and as I should have voted for the admission of Kansas if she had been allowed to frame a constitution for herself, or present herself in accordance with the wishes of her people, as a free State, I shall vote for Oregon, and I shall vote against this motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until December next, as that is unquestionably a test vote on the passage of the bill.

I did not rise to discuss the question of admitting the State of Oregon, but to express some views in relation to a question that has been presented in the Senate, in commenting on the provisions of the constitution of the State of Oregon. The constitution entirely excludes slavery from the State, which, I think, is a very excellent provision. I recollect that the first Delegate from that Territory, who came when they had only a provisional government, Mr. Thurston, stated the absolute and nearly universal wish of that people to be not only free from the presence of slaves, but also that it was the very general wish of that people to have a homogeneous white population, and to be free from the settlement of blacks among them. They did not desire to encourage the settlement of that population among them, either as freemen or slaves. I think myself that such a provision in a constitution as excludes a black man from a right to reside in the State, or to sue in its courts, is a harsh provision; and residing in the State, I should be opposed to such a provision of law; but I certainly would not be in favor of encouraging the immigration of any considerable number of black men into a State to settle and live among a white population. I think it is the interest of both races that we should live separate. I have here a brief extract from the letter of a black man, which I propose to read to the Senate, and in whose opinions against mixing the two races I can say that I entirely concur. He has been the projector of a periodical, which he proposed for the benefit of his race, and has attended conventions of men of his own color; and advocated, some years since, the project of colonizing, with a view to enable the black men on this continent, where they were born, to test at any rate their ability to establish and maintain a community by themselves. He says:

"The fact is, the Saxon and negro are the only positive races on this continent, and the two are destined to absorb into themselves all the others, and like two positive poles, they repel each other; and if the one is destined to occupy all the temperate regions of this hemisphere, it is equally certain that the other will predominate within the tropics. The slavery propagandists unwillingly admit the same when they declare negro labor to be indispensable in those regions. The question which suggests itself to the intelligent mind is, shall things be permitted, and encouraged to reach their natural development, which no combination of circumstances can prevent, (however much it may retard it,) by the peaceful influence of free labor? or shall the slavery propagandists be allowed to interfere and check, for a time, the march of civilization, when the ultimate result must be to usher in, through war and anarchy, the very same state of things which might have been much sooner and easier reached by peaceful and legitimate means, to the great benefit of the whole civilized world?"

I think this black man writes good sense. It is a letter which he wrote upon having read the speech of a Representative from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR,] upon the subject of colonizing Central America by the blacks, and thus establishing a home for that race without interference with the whites, leaving the great body of the continent and the States which we occupy to our own race, and providing for them, or for those of them who chose to go there, a home where the climate would be suitable and inviting to them. In order to accomplish anything like this, we must certainly be aware that any scheme for such a purpose, to be successful, must commend itself to the black man, as well as to the white man. The colony of Liberia, in Africa, has never commended itself to the black man; and that, in my opinion, is the reason why that colony has not flourished more. The white people of the country, so far as I know, everywhere—the great mass of them—would have been glad to encourage and aid the emigration of the black man to Africa; but he was unwilling to leave the country in which he had been born, and looked upon it as an effort to get rid of him. The blacks have therefore never been induced, in any great numbers, to go; and a great number of people, like the black race in this country, can never be carried off to a distant and separate home without their consent and coöperation. The only mode in which we can relieve our country, relieve the blacks and the whites, divide these races, and provide separate homes for them, is by some scheme which will meet the approbation of both—one which the parties themselves will execute. I think well of a scheme presented of a colony in South America—or Central America, perhaps, is better—extending to it such aid and protection from this Government as would be perfectly legitimate and proper, in the hope that such a measure would be the best means of accomplishing a result so desirable for the benefit of both white and black. I think some such result as this will come in one way or another, from the collision of interests, from inevitable causes, and from the competition of free and slave labor.

From this, and other letters on this subject, from black men, which I have had the opportunity to see, I learn that this scheme is one which the intelligent and educated men among them have consulted upon—though I was not aware of it until recently—for some years past, and have been contriving how it might be executed. They speak of the great difficulty, in their scattered condition, of inducing coöperation among their people, and of apprehensions of difficulties. They have sent agents to St. Domingo, and conferred with the Government there, with a view to emigration to that country; but no feasible project has yet been adopted. But, as the free and slave labor of our country begin to press upon each other, that condition of things arises which is usually denominated "necessity;" and necessity works out the ends which it requires. In the State of Missouri, as the natural place for this movement to find a head and beginning, we find this scheme presented and advocated. Missouri desires a place where her black people can go, and be well provided for, and which will be satisfactory to them as well as to the whites who are to remain; and colonization in Central America naturally suggests itself as the means.

This idea of a free colony of black men is one which should commend itself to our consideration, and for my part, in that connection, I do not object to the provision which the people of Oregon have adopted in their constitution. I believe the Topeka constitution of Kansas contained a provision of the same sort, and so of most of the border States; and I am perfectly willing to see the people of these new free States exercise their discretion; and whatever their wish and will is, let them speak it out, and not suppress it; for that which a community desires is that which they should talk about and proclaim, because they are most likely to know what is best for their interests and their happiness.

This and other letters which have been placed in my possession, have communicated information to me in relation to the views entertained by the black men of the country, and as I said, I regard them as more important to us on this subject than any information as to the views of the white men; for I think there is not any doubt that the great mass of the white men desire to see something done that will provide a separate and satisfactory home for the black man. I have no doubt that there is such a desire throughout our whole country—strongest, perhaps, where the necessity presses strongest. We owe something to these black people, who have served for so many years, with so great fidelity and docility, the white race, and we ought, if we could, do something for their benefit. Some scheme which will be satisfactory to them, and also to us, must be devised to carry this project out.

As I said, the condition of things now is such as requires something of this sort. They are looking to emancipation in Missouri beyond all question. Their newspapers are discussing it; and I have no doubt that in other border States that idea would be more generally entertained if a rational, easy mode of providing for the black population was ready at hand. Indeed, I remember when the annexation of Texas was discussed here and through the country, that one of the strongest arguments used in favor of annexation, through all that part of the country where I reside, was that bringing Texas into the Union as a more extreme southern State, would draw off the black population from all the border slave States, and that they would become free States; and that it was desirable to provide some States further South, to which the black population could go.

I speak of this to bring the subject to the attention of the Senate, and to avow my wish and disposition, in any practicable mode, to aid in providing such a place for the free blacks of the country. It is unnecessary for me here to state that, in relation to the rest of that population, the responsibility is with each State for itself, in all these matters, and that, without a right to interfere, there should be the modesty not to undertake to make suggestions. I have never attempted to do it in Congress, and I shall not now. But in reference to the free blacks, they are among us all, and my own opinion is, that it would be best for them, as I am sure it would be for the white population, that a home should be provided for them. I am glad to see this project; and inasmuch as this point has been alluded to in the discussion of the constitution of Oregon, I speak of it in that connection, and I desire to say that the provision of the constitution of Oregon, for that reason, is no objection to me; but it seems to me to be one of the provisions which, in the ordinary course of human action, by the collision of forces and interests among men, is calculated to aid in working out and producing a proper result essential to the good of all.

Mr. GREEN. Before the vote is taken, I merely wish to correct the statement of the Senator from New York as to the sentiment of Missouri. It has been my privilege to live there nearly twenty-one years, to mix freely with the people, of all classes—

Mr. KING. The Senator will excuse me for interrupting him. I would not presume to state what was the predominant sentiment of Missouri. I spoke of topics which are discussed there, and which are entertained by some of the citizens of Missouri. I certainly would not here undertake to decide as to what was the prevailing sentiment of Missouri.

Mr. GREEN. Then I understand the Senator to admit that he does not undertake to give the sentiment of Missouri. If he undertook to do it, I should correct him, for I know it to be exactly the reverse of what he represented it, as I thought; but, as he now corrects himself, he confines it to a few individuals.

Mr. KING. The Senator will allow me. He does not, of course, desire to have me seem to state anything I did not. I did not assume to state how strong or how weak was the sentiment to which I alluded—whether it was predominant, or the view of a minority. I only spoke of it as a sentiment existing there; and whatever may be my opinion of the views of the majority of the people there, I will not assume to pronounce it here. I think Missouri will speak for herself on this subject, and very soon too.

Mr. GREEN. I understand the whole scope, object and design of throwing out such expressions. It is to cultivate a contest on a subject of that character in the State of Missouri, and I intend to meet it at the threshold. The public, common sentiment of the people of that State is for peace, for law, for quietude, for rest, and to abide by our institutions as they are, and not to carry conflict and contest there by the agitation of the question of emancipation or otherwise. That the same spirit which has fanned the flames of discord throughout the length and breadth of this land would seek to involve Missouri in a blaze, I have no doubt; but I do not intend to give a pretext for it in the Senate, so far as my action is concerned. I undertake to say that the sentiment to which the Senator alludes in the State of Missouri is exceedingly small. That some of it exists there, and exists everywhere, I have no doubt. We heard the same threats made in regard to the State of Kentucky a few years ago; but when the question was presented to the people of Kentucky, and they were about to elect a convention to form a new constitution, my recollection is that not a single delegate elected to that convention was tainted by the emancipation sentiment. If the same question were presented in the same manner to the people of Missouri to-day, the same result would follow that did in Kentucky. There is a great similarity between the common sentiments of the two States; the one, in the common parlance of the country, is very properly termed the daughter of the other.

I do not desire the wish, the mere expression, of one man, seized hold of and thrown broadcast over the land, with a view of prejudicing the State; and it does prejudice the State, first, by intimidating the immigration of those who hold slaves and desire to settle where they can have peace and quietude; second, by the encouragement of that class who have heretofore gotten up emigrant aid societies, fanning the flames of discord, sending a sword, instead of peace, into a community that desires peace; and it is my purpose, therefore, to disabuse the public mind. The slave population of the State of Missouri has grown rapidly within the last ten years. In the space of ten years, from eighty-five thousand, its numbers have gone up to now more than one hundred and fifteen thousand; and it is retained because it is profitable. Slave labor in the cultivation of hemp and tobacco, will compare well with slave labor in the cultivation of rice, cotton, and sugar; and I believe, at the ordinary ruling rates, it will pay better. As they are in the United States, the common sentiment of the people of Missouri is this: leave slavery, under the regulation of the law of production, to go just where it is profitable to go; not to force it anywhere, not to prohibit it anywhere. But this outside pressure, and internal assistance which the outside pressure is designed to get up, is to bring a second contest in the State of Missouri, worse than that which has hitherto prevailed in Kansas. I will never permit the first step to be taken without giving it the proper rebuke; and when the Senator from New York desires to intimate that there is to be this soon-coming contest in the State of Missouri, I tell him what the result of that contest will be.

But enough of that subject. It does not legitimately bear on the subject-matter before the Senate for its consideration, and I am sorry that it was brought in so unnecessarily. Having been brought in, I was compelled to notice it. I pass from it. Oregon has a population of at least eighty thousand. It is a distant portion of our dominions. We have been acting on the principle that they should have what we ordinarily mean by squatter sovereignty, that is, the right to regulate their internal affairs for themselves. Why not make them an independent political community at once? If the vote is to be taken on this proposition to postpone, I shall vote against it. I know the argument is used that, if we postpone it to the first Monday of December, it will enable them to come up with certain facts in regard to population. I answer that I am satisfied with the population as it is now. I will make no invidious distinction between Kansas and Oregon. I will not say to the one you may come in, and to the other you shall not; and if we postpone it, it leaves the question still to be agitated. If we vote upon it now and reject the bill, the State can still apply for admission under the present existing constitution next December, anyhow. Why not, therefore, take a direct express vote whether you will admit the State or not?

We all remember the action of the last session of Congress. The House of Representatives passed a bill, saying to Oregon: "form a constitution and come and be thou with us." The Senate Committee on Territories reported in favor of the same proposition. It would have been passed; and the only reason why it did not pass, was not fully stated by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] and I will supply the deficiency. Being anxious to settle the difficulty in regard to Kansas, I moved a corresponding enabling act for Kansas as an amendment to the Oregon bill, and that movement defeated the passage of the bill in favor of Oregon. I took the responsibility upon myself because my motive was a good one, whether it eventuated in good or bad. More than a year ago the Senate was willing to say to Oregon: "you are fit to form your constitution and be admitted." Thus you are committed upon the record; thus the fact and the history of the country stand recorded against you. Shall we now repulse the application of the young sister who has come on our own invitation? I trust not. I believe the good of the whole community will be subserved by her speedy admission. I am satisfied of her population, her strength, and her ability to sustain a separate State organization, and I believe that it is good policy to extend to her that privilege. At least let us have a direct vote and not a side blow to throw off the question until the first Monday in next December. I shall therefore vote against the postponement.

Mr. POLK. I wish to direct the attention of the Senate to a statement made by the Senator from New York, which was not replied to by my colleague. I understood the Senator from New York to state it as the sentiment of Missouri, that Central America ought to be colonized with free negroes.

Mr. KING. As I stated to the Senator's colleague, I did not assume, and I would not do so, not residing there, to pronounce upon the sentiment of Missouri as a State. I did not assume to say what the sentiment was, but that these ideas existed there and were discussed. How strong or how weak they are, I do not know.

Mr. POLK. I understood the Senator to make that statement. I am glad, if he made it, that he did not intend it, or that I misunderstood him. I would say that, in my opinion, this plan or idea of attempting to colonize negroes in Central America, is as novel and as strange to Missouri as to any other State of the Union, and it was heard of there, probably for the first time, after the movement that was made in the other end of the Capitol by the gentleman to whom the Senator from New York referred.

I pass from that point to observe merely that, on the question of the postponement of the entire subject of the admission of Oregon until next December, I am opposed to it, and in favor of the admission of Oregon, though I coincide most heartily and cordially in the soundness and expediency of a rule that would require a State, before being admitted, to have population enough to entitle it to a Representative in the popular branch of Congress. I do not wish, however, in the case of Oregon, to make a discrimination against that people, especially when I believe that no new State has come forward seeking admission, all of whose action has been more orderly and regular and proper than has been the action in the case of Oregon. I think the conduct of the population of Oregon stands not merely in comparison, but in favorable contrast, with what has been the history of some other States which have sought admission into the Union. I believe that population is settled, industrious, and well to do in all respects. I believe, furthermore, that situated as that population is on our extreme western limits on the Pacific seaboard, it is altogether proper that they should be admitted into the Union as a State, and that they should be tied to us by the still stronger cords that would exist if Oregon were made an equal sister of the Confederacy.

Therefore, sir, while I shall vote for the admission of Oregon at any time, probably at the earliest time when that question can be raised, and shall not vote for the postponement of this question until December, I wish it understood that when I do so I fully subscribe to the propriety of a rule which will hereafter require that a new State, seeking admission into the Union, shall have population sufficient to entitle her to one Representative in the popular branch of Congress. I will also say that I am rather of the opinion, from what has been stated here as being the fact in regard to Oregon, that the population in Oregon is about adequate at the present time.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, a portion of the Senate is opposed to the admission of States which tolerate slavery. That portion of the Senate is gratified by the bill which is before us now for the admission of Oregon; for it is founded on a constitution which excludes slavery in the State of Oregon. I believe all the other members of the Senate have avowed the principle that slavery or freedom in a State is to them immaterial, they proceeding upon the principle of the right of a State to choose whether it will exclude slavery or not. Under these circumstances, I had hoped that we had reached a proposition for the admission of a State into the Union in which the slavery question would not be discussed here. I see no necessity for going into that discussion now. It is not at all necessary to be taken into consideration in the vote which I am to give on this question.

Sir, I know how important it is, where it is practicable in the affairs of government, as well as in other concerns of human life, to adopt general rules and to have systematized modes and methods for the transaction of affairs. The Constitution of the United States does, in a great many cases, adopt that principle of generalization; that is, of fixing certain rules and measurements, all of which must be conformed to before a great public transaction can be achieved. But it has always struck me that it was a signal mark of wisdom in the framers of the Constitution that, in regard to the admission of new States into the Union, new members of the Confederacy, the Constitution avoided altogether everything like form, everything like measurement, everything like particularity, and submitted the transaction always to the uncircumscribed discretion of the Congress of the United States. Congress may admit new States; and inasmuch as they may admit, they may reject new States. They may admit new States anywhere; they may reject them everywhere. They may admit them with one hundred thousand people; they may reject them with a million of people. Congress may admit a new State which has been organized after a compliance on the part of its people with certain prescribed forms set for them by the Congress of the United States, or on the compliance with certain customs which other Territories seeking admission into the Union may have adopted. So, on the other hand, Congress may admit a new State, as it has, on more than one occasion, admitted a new State which had complied with no forms, which had proceeded at once to the matter of organizing itself without any preliminary application to Congress, or any preliminary investigation of it by the people themselves.

It is precisely because I think it is important that this should be kept up, that the question should always come before Congress in the case of every new State disembarassed by forms, disembarassed by measurements, disembarassed by precedents, that I rise to protest against my vote here in favor of the admission of the State of Oregon, under the circumstances in which she comes here, being given upon the condition, or the pledge, or the assurance, that under other circumstances and at another time and in regard to other States, I shall vote because of an analogy established between that State and the present one. I can conceive, as I said on this same question a few days ago, of a State with a million of people that I would not consent to admit into the Union; and I can conceive of a State which I would admit with a population of forty thousand, or fifty thousand, or sixty thousand.

In coming to this conclusion, I am determined by the fact, that, geographically and politically, the region of country which is occupied by the present Territory of Oregon is indispensable to the completion and rounding off of this Republic. Every man sees it, and every man knows it. There is some day to be a State of Oregon. There is no member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, and, probably, no man in the United States who would be willing to see it lopped off, fall into the Pacific or into the possession of Russia or under the control of any other Power; but every man, woman, and child, knows that it is just as essential to the completion of this Republic as is the State of New York, or as is the State of Louisiana, or the Mississippi. It cost us too much to get it; we have struggled and fought too hard for it, we have nursed and cherished it too long, not to know and feel that it is an essential part of the Confederacy.

Well, then, she is to be admitted at some time, and, inasmuch as she is to be admitted at all events, and is to be admitted at some time, it is only a question of time whether you will admit her to-day, or admit her six months hence, or admit her a year or seven years hence. What objection is there to her being admitted now? You say she has not one hundred thousand people. What of that? She will have one hundred thousand people in a very short time. This motion to postpone until the first Monday in December next, if it presents sincerely the views which it expresses, admits that on the first Monday in December she will have population enough, or that at least it can then be ascertained. Now, what earthly difference can it make to this Republic collectively, to these States collectively, or to any one State in the Union, whether Oregon is admitted now or admitted next December, except the inconvenience of postponing and delaying that question and embarrassing it by the occurrence of new and disturbing circumstances? The State of Oregon is, of her own free consent, here, ready to be admitted. She is here with a constitution complete and a State government organized and ready to go into operation. That state of things may continue until next December, or some circumstance may intervene to embarrass and disturb it. Next December will be the beginning of a short session of Congress, and debates upon this or other subjects may prevent the admission of Oregon for another year. Then, in that case, will be the embarrassing question, whether this constitution remains; whether the convention which organized it expressed the will of the people of Oregon, or whether a new proceeding must be instituted for that purpose; and, when it is all done, I think there is nobody who doubts that the people of Oregon are, to-day, ready, desirous, willing, to come in. They have made a constitution which is acceptable to themselves; and a constitution which, however it may be criticised here, after all complies substantially with every requirement which the Congress of the United States, or any considerable portion of either House of Congress, has ever insisted on in regard to any State.

It seems to me, therefore, to be trifling with the State of Oregon, trifling with the people of that community, and to be unnecessary and calculated to produce an unfavorable impression on the public mind in regard to the consistency of the policy which we pursue in admitting States into the Union to delay or deny this application. For one, sir, I think that the sooner a Territory emerges from its provincial condition the better; the sooner the people are left to manage their own affairs, and are admitted to participation in the responsibilities of this Government, the stronger and the more vigorous the States which those people form will be. I trust, therefore, that the question will be taken, and that the State may be admitted without further delay.

The question being taken, by yeas and nays, on the postponement of the bill to the first Monday in December next, resulted—yeas 16, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Chandler, Clay, Crittenden, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Kennedy, Mason, Trumbull, and Wade—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Clingman, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Foot, Foster, Green, Gwin, Harlan, Henderson, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Slidell, Stuart, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—38.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] in the second line of the preamble, after the word "republican," to insert "in form."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. PUGH. I ask for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clingman, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Foot, Foster, Green, Gwin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Slidell, Stuart, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Henderson, Hunter, Iverson, Kennedy, Mason, Trumbull, and Wade—17.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, their Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

An act for the prevention and punishment of frauds in land titles in California;

An act for the collection and safe-keeping of public archives in the State of California; and

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be surveyed the tract of land in the Territory of Minnesota, belonging to the half-breeds or mixed bloods of the Dacotah or Sioux nation of Indians, and for other purposes," approved 17th July, 1854.

COMMODORE PAULDING.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair, the Senate recurs to the regular order of business, which is the first special order.

Mr. HUNTER. What is that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution (S. No. 7) for the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding.

Mr. HALE. Cannot something be done to prevent that coming up every day?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I move to postpone that joint resolution indefinitely.

Mr. DOUGLAS. One act of kindness is always the prelude to another. The Senate have indulged me in the passage of the Oregon bill. Now I have in charge a little bill for running the boundary of Texas, that everybody is for, and there is no objection to it. It will take but a very few minutes, and I trust there will be unanimous consent to take it up and pass it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there unanimous consent to take up the bill alluded to by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GREEN. I object to that. I desire to submit a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I believe my motion to postpone indefinitely the joint resolution in reference to Commodore Paulding, is a privileged question, and has precedence. That resolution is an old customer, and we had better get rid of it.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will simply state that I understood it was agreed, by universal consent, that this joint resolution, which was introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] should be discussed at the same time with the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations upon the neutrality laws.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. If that is the understanding, I shall withdraw my motion.

Mr. SLIDELL. I think it would be better to make an express order that it shall be considered with that report; so as not to have it called up every day. I make the motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I had supposed that by an order of the Senate the joint resolution was fixed as a special order for consideration at the same time with the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and a resolution that was offered, or of which notice was given, by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. FOOT.]

Mr. SLIDELL. I move that the consideration of this resolution be fixed for the same day and hour with the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations upon the same subject, and remain so attached to it as to come up at the same time.

The motion was agreed to.

TEXAS BOUNDARY.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The objection to taking up the Texas boundary bill is now waived.

Mr. GREEN. I withdraw the objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 152) to authorize the President of the United States, in conjunction with the State of Texas, to run and mark the boundary lines between the Territories of the United States and the State of Texas, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Territories, to insert, at the end of the bill, the following proviso:

Provided, That the person or persons appointed and employed on the part and behalf of Texas are to be paid by the said State: Provided further, That no persons shall be appointed or employed in this service by the United States, but such as are required to make the necessary observations and surveys, to ascertain such line and erect suitable monuments thereon, and make return of the same.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to have an explanation of the object of the amendment?

Mr. COLLAMER. The amendment consists of two provisos: the State of Texas has appointed surveyors and commissioners to represent her in running this line, and has made an appropriation for their payment, and the first proviso is merely to provide that the money appropriated in this bill shall not be used to pay those persons employed on behalf of Texas. The other proviso is that no persons shall be employed in this service but those necessary to make the observations and surveys, erect the monuments, and make the proper returns. The committee were impressed with the fact that for a long time past we had not sent out any expedition to make an exploration, run a line, or anything of that kind, without having a body of naturalists, a body of astronomers, a corps of ichthyologists, a corps of botanists, and a corps of geologists; and out of that grew a large number of learned reports, making voluminous books, printed and sent abroad with very beautiful pictures and all that. For the purpose of preventing anything of that kind in relation to this boundary, we propose to confine the persons employed to those only who are necessary to make the observations, erect the monuments, and make the proper returns.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to make a verbal amendment to this amendment, at the suggestion of one of the Senators from Texas; to insert in the amendment, after the words "no persons," the words "except superintendent or commissioner." The VICE PRESIDENT. That alteration will be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS. The provisos seemed to me objectionable. I therefore asked an explanation; and not being satisfied with it, will proceed to state my objections. It will be recollected that when Texas was annexed to this Union as an independent Power of the earth, she surrendered to the Government of the United States the right to establish her boundary. The Government of the United States has so established that boundary as to strip from Texas an immense domain. In 1850, under influences to which I shall not now refer, $10,000,000 were paid to Texas to allow her territory to be carved down to its present limits, as defined in this bill; and it was hardly to be supposed that thus shorn of her fair proportion, she was at some subsequent day to be called upon for the benefit of the United States to define the line.

Mr. COLLAMER. Will the gentleman indulge me a moment? Texas has appointed her own surveyors and commissioners, and asks us to run the line; and this provision is, that all the expenses, except for the surveyors and others whom she appoints to represent her, shall be paid by the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. If that was the only object, the language does not express it, but treats it as if Texas were to send a corps into the field to establish the line and act equally with the United States. If the commissioner be the only person required to represent Texas, I think it would have been better expressed by the word "commissioner," instead of "person or persons."

That, however, is minor to the objection I have to the second proviso. The great expense of running this line consists in the outfit. You must send trains of supplies, wagons to haul your monuments, and this at a great distance, and over a country entirely destitute of supplies, which constitute the bulk of the expense. To add, then, to this corps of astronomers making observations to determine the latitude and longitude, and laborers to set up the monuments, a few men who can examine the character of the country, and bring back specimens, would but little increase the expense, unless Congress afterwards, in its desire to distribute books, should make a large expenditure of money for the preparation and publication of books written by learned men, to whom should be submitted the observations and specimens which might be brought in.

But that is not the point to which I expected to get an answer. How is this line to be made permanent? By setting up monuments of stone, of wood, or of iron? No. You have the line now traced in the stars. You propose to project it upon the face of the earth. I ask how is it to be made permanent? It is only to be made permanent by sending the necessary topographers with your party to sketch the ground on each side of it. That indication of the time stands forever. The monuments may be removed by any one who is willful or mischievous. The topographical sketch of each side of the line is the only way it can be defined on the face of the earth, and made to stand for future uses. These topographical sketches, engraved and published with the report, would give it to the world. This is necessary to make the line permanent, and thus you are secure against the contingency of the destruction of the original map.

I go further, and say that, having incurred the great expenditures of the expedition in its outfit, I would send along with it men who could take the very observations to which the Senator from Vermont alluded; observations of the soil, of geological structure, of entomology, of the botany and natural history of the country; and men who could engage in that much-decried occupation, sometimes called here looking after bugs; and in this region the inquiry would be of special value. From the time of the Israelitish exodus, it is a part of human history that all arid regions are subject to have their crops entirely destroyed at times by insects. It has been the case in the valley of Utah. Insects are now ravaging the fields of Texas. This is such a country; and an examination into the entomological character of this region is necessary to the people to warn them of what they have to meet if they migrate to that section. It is information such as the great landholder should give to those whom he invites to purchase. The publication of so many copies as would be useful for naturalists and learned societies, would be but a small expense; but if you should never publish it at all, the information being deposited in one of the Executive Departments, would exist as a source from which authors might derive knowledge, which, distributed through the channels of publication on private account, would be a useful contribution to mankind; and the Government then has incurred only the expense of adding a few individuals to the party.

Mr. HENDERSON. My objection to the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi is, that it will cause delay. It is of importance that this commission, on the part of the United States, should be appointed at once. Texas has for several years had statutes authorizing the Governor of that State to appoint a commissioner, to meet one on the part of the United States, to run this line. The season of the year for such work is at hand. The parties should be starting out now, for they have to go through a country which is entirely uninhabited, and they must depend upon the grass for the subsistence of their animals, and unless they start very soon this season will be entirely lost. Moreover, I am informed that lands are being surveyed about where this line is to run, and unless it be established very soon, confusion will be created by extending the surveys in Texas beyond the real boundary line; the system there being for each settler to select his own location and run out his line. I am told that difficulties even now exist there, because this line has not been established. It is important that the bill should be acted on at once, and I do not think the object which would be accomplished by carrying out the views of the Senator from Mississippi is of such consequence as to justify its in occasioning the delay which it seems to me will be caused, if an attempt be made to amend the bill by adding a provision for the number of scientific persons whom he indicates as proper to accompany this commission. I therefore hope he will not insist on his proposition, but will allow the bill to pass as it is. I should have no objection to his proposition if I did not suppose it would cause delay.

Mr. DAVIS. That portion of the work which consists in running the line of a parallel of latitude, involves a difficulty which allows but very slow progress. It is easy to mark a parallel of latitude on the map, but it is very hard to trace it on the face of the earth: it is impossible to run in the plane of a small circle of the globe, and the series of triangles which are constructed in fixing the points of a parallel of latitude involves so much of labor and delay, that necessarily the progress is slow. The topographers would sketch the land on each side much faster than you would advance in determining the line. At points where a change of direction occurs, and at all others where it is necessary to determine the longitude with exactness, a series of observations must be made, involving a detention which would give the topographers ample time (if they had chanced to fall behind) to bring up their sketches of so much of the ground upon each side of the line as would be necessary to its accurate description. Should its exact location at any time become a question, it would be easily found, without further astronomical observations, and though there should not remain one of the artificial monuments which had been erected.

Mr. HENDERSON. Allow me to say that I had no reference to a delay in the execution of the duties of the survey, but to the delay that would be caused in the passage of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no further remarks to make, and no wish in any manner to delay the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I had thought that on the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Illinois being presented, the bill would pass without difficulty. I called on the gentlemen of the Territorial Committee, and I understood there would be no obstruction in the way of the passage of the bill. I think, if the amendment of that committee be adopted, the measure will be complete, and nothing further would seem to be necessary. I conferred with my colleagues in the House of Representatives, where this bill originated; my senatorial colleague was absent when I last had an interview with them; but I could have no doubt that, in their opinion, this was the best plan that could be suggested, and only required the additional nomination of a commissioner to supervise the whole campaign.

I can see no necessity for any further provision: that would only accumulate expense without any correspondent advantage. The exact place where the line runs will be ascertained at the different points and angles where observations are taken, and mounds will be erected at those points, and such artificial corners as will be endurable and will not perish. I am sure that so soon as a surveyor has been on the ground, and marked the boundary line, there will be no topographical surveys required to give the settlers on either side of the line intelligence as to their rights. I can see no necessity for such a provision; and I most solemnly protest against this aggregating of offices in so little a matter. There are now many applicants for the crumbs that are thrown out—one hundred for every office that is to be given—and unless we have some more expeditious plan of running our boundaries than we have had heretofore, we had better have none hereafter. Why, sir, the boundary commission, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, exhausted hundreds and thousands of dollars, and resulted in nothing but an additional expense for the books and bugs of which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] has told us. It seems to be the supreme object of ambition of the persons who are engaged in such works to get their names before the public. Sir, the catching of a single bug of rare quality immortalizes a scientific gentleman, and a lizard is double immortality; and so too of a horned frog. [Laughter.] These are wonderful things to expend millions upon! Scientific men, if you get them started, must have something to do; they cannot come back with rational observations, but they must come back with something marvelous and wonderful to connect with their names. Let scientific gentlemen be satisfied with their sciences, acting in their appropriate spheres; but I protest most solemnly against anything that will delay the running of this line.

Texas has, for years past, earnestly desired its consummation. She is aware of the difficulty, and we are aware of it too, in Congress, notified in our official character that there is a conflict now between land titles on the boundary of New Mexico and Texas. We hear individuals complaining of detriment in consequence of it; and these difficulties will be multiplied by every delay. If you wait until midsummer before you commence this important work, we shall find that it will linger on till autumn; and then they will have to leave there, and make a second campaign; and instead of the reasonable amount of $80,000 provided in the bill—and $40,000 ought to accomplish it—it will take $140,000 if it is not adopted immediately, and the work set about and accomplished so soon as practicable. If you send men to make scientific discoveries and write books to the number of forty or fifty, who can read those books? A man who is industrious, or intends to make an honest living, has no chance to do it. You are throwing impediments in the way of industry when you are creating these books. You create a morbid appetite in children for pretty pictures. They will not learn their alphabets. [Laughter.] I will have none of it.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to the Senator that, if he had concurred in my proposition, and had not agreed to the amendment proposed to be made to the House bill, he would have avoided all delay which his own opposition is creating. He urges that to reject the amendment will be to delay until midsummer the commencement of the work, and overlooks the fact that he is now delaying the adoption of this bill which the House has sent here, by urging that the amendment which has been proposed to it shall be adopted. My proposition to strike off the amendment, is to expedite the enactment of a law under which this survey is to commence. Though it might take the Senator long to read the number of volumes he has described, and longer to print them, I am sure that will not delay or impede the prosecution of the survey in the field. These books are not written by the persons who go into the field, except, perhaps in a single case, the one to which he referred, where a commissioner, who went out to run the boundary under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, brought back specimens and drawings made by public employes, and wrote a book himself. But the general rule is, that the specimens are brought back and pass into the hands of scientific persons who write the books. The explorers are not usually persons who do anything more than make a mere report.

So far as the Army is concerned, as some allusion has been made to the length of time officers stay here to make reports, I will state they sometimes have made a second exploration before the order to print has been executed by your Printers here, and it is the specimens they bring in which pass into the hands of the learned, and which swell the large amount of books for which neither the officer, nor the Department having charge of the work, is responsible. They are authorized by Congress. They are made by the savans. They are printed by Congress; and, good, bad, or indifferent, the Senator has the responsibility on himself for printing the books.

Mr. HENDERSON. I misunderstood my friend from Mississippi. I thought his design was to move an amendment. My desire is to have the bill passed; and I shall not object at all, indeed I shall vote for his proposition as I now understand it. I shall vote to reject the amendment proposed by the Committee on Territories, for that will leave the bill as it is, and pass the bill, which is the thing we wish to accomplish.

Mr. DAVIS. I propose to leave the bill as it comes from the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The rejection of the amendment will leave the bill in the shape the Senator from Mississippi desires it.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays on the amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. This amendment is in perfect accordance with what I think the true interests of the State of Texas and of the United States require. It will not preclude the President of the United States or the War Department from sending such an escort as is necessary; but it will prevent an incumbrance of the commission by a number of officers who would delay the expedition on their march, and would necessarily be distributed over the country in making scientific observations, and delay the completion of the work beyond the time that would be requisite to accomplish it in a proper manner, if the number is restricted to the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state for the information of the Senate that Texas expects to pay, and has provided for the payment of her commissioner, and therefore the first branch of the amendment, as regards ridding the United States of that expense, is totally unnecessary.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Green, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Sidel, Toombs, and Wido—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Kennedy, Mason, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time; and the bill was read the third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. GREEN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 18, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. SMITH PYNE, D. D.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, is there a quorum present?

The SPEAKER. There are but ninety-five members present.

Mr. PHELPS. I move a call of the House; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 110; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Bennett, Billingshurst, Biscoe, Burlingame, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, Clay, Clemens, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, James Craig, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dick, Dowdell, Elliott, Florence, Foster, Gartrell, Greenwood, Gregg, Thomas L. Harris, Huyler, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Leiter, Leitcher, McKibbin, McQueen, Matteson, Miles, Miller, Edward Joy Morris, Mott, Niblack, Palmer, Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Rufin, Seales, Scott, Shorter, Samuel A. Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, Wade, Walbridge, Ellihu B. Washburne, Whiteley, Winslow, and Wortendyke—64.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bowie,

Boyce, Branch, Buffinton, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Cobb, Colfax, Corning, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Foley, Gilman, Giltner, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hawkins, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Lawrence, Leach, Lovejoy, Maclay, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Milson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Pike, Pottle, Powell, Reagan, Robbins, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, Searling, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, Robert Smith, Spinner, Talbot, George Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Trippe, Underwood, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Wilson, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—110.

So the House refused to have a call of the House.

Pending the vote,

Mr. MILES stated that Mr. BONHAM was detained from the House by illness in his family, and had paired off with Mr. WALDRON.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that his colleague, Mr. LANDY, was still detained from the House in consequence of illness in his family.

Mr. COX asked leave to vote, he not being within the bar when his name was called.

Objection was made.

Messrs. CASE and LEIDY asked the same privilege.

Objection was made.

READING THE JOURNAL.

The being been announced, as above recorded, The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SALE OF FORT SNELLING.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to permit me to present, at the request of the Delegate from Minnesota, there being no Representatives here from that State, some memorials, to have them laid upon the table and printed. They relate to the sale of the Fort Snelling reservation, and it may be necessary to refer to them in the discussion on that subject.

There being no objection, the petition of citizens of Minnesota in relation to the sale of the Fort Snelling reservation, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAULKNER. I also ask leave to present, for the same purpose, the report of a board of Army officers on the same subject.

There being no objection, the report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION OF DOORKEEPER.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the execution of the order of the House of yesterday, to proceed to the election of Doorkeeper. Nominations are in order.

Mr. ADRAIN. I nominate, as Democratic candidate for the office of Doorkeeper for the remainder of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, Joseph L. Wright, of New Jersey.

Mr. MORGAN. I nominate for Doorkeeper, Arthur W. Fletcher, of Washington city.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I nominate Jacob P. Chase, of Tennessee.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. ADRAIN, MORGAN, ZOLLICOFFER, and WRIGHT of Tennessee, tellers.

The vote was taken, and there were 216 votes cast; necessary to a choice 109; of which—

Joseph L. Wright received.....	117
Arthur W. Fletcher.....	77
Jacob P. Chase.....	10
F. W. Walker.....	9
Nathan Sargent.....	1
Peter Gorman.....	1
Z. W. McKnew.....	1

The following is the vote in detail:

For Joseph L. Wright—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Biscoe, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burns, Caruthers, Caskie, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Lawrence, Leidy, Leitcher, Maclay, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Milson, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searling, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sicking, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Mr. Speaker.

For Arthur W. Fletcher—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews,

Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Clawson, Colfax, Comins, Craig, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Matteson, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. For F. W. Walker—Messrs. Campbell, Ezra Clark, Davis of Maryland, Edie, J. Morrison Harris, Humphrey Marshall, Edward Joy Morris, Ricard, and Roberts.

For Nathan Sargent—Mr. Durfee.

For Peter Gorman—Mr. Thomas L. Harris.

For Z. W. McKnew—Mr. McQueen.

Joseph L. Wright, of New Jersey, having received a majority of the votes cast, was declared duly elected Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, and was sworn into office by the Speaker.

LAND FRAUDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Mr. Speaker, within a few days past two public acts of a very important character passed the Senate, and have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and I am now informed that, should the acts fail to pass in time for the fact of their passage to go to California by the steamer which sails on the 20th, it will be a very great detriment to the public interests. They are bills for the prevention of frauds and forgeries in land claims in California, and are essential to the protection of the public domain, and of the rights of private citizens of the United States. I ask consent of the House, under the circumstances, to report back these bills from the Committee on the Judiciary, and to have them put upon their passage. I apprehend there can be no objection; certainly there would be none if the facts were known.

Mr. COBB. I think they are bills which ought to receive more consideration than we can give to them this morning.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I am informed by the Attorney General that a loss of some fifty million dollars may possibly ensue to the national Treasury from the failure to pass these bills. The Committee on the Judiciary has examined them, and has directed me to report them back.

Mr. SICKLES. I ask my friend if these bills did not pass the Senate unanimously?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. They passed the Senate unanimously since the sailing of the last steamer, and were introduced at this late period in order that they might pass the Senate and the House, and go out before any knowledge of their pendency should reach California.

Mr. COBB. I thought they had not received consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary; but now that I learn that they have, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. QUITMAN. Mr. Speaker, when these bills were presented to the House I believe I was the only one who objected to their immediate consideration. I have since examined them, and if the gentleman from New York will consent to a single amendment to one of them, to strike out the word "thereof" after "affidavit," on the second page of the act to provide for the collection and safe-keeping of the public archives of the State of California, and to insert in lieu thereof "of the facts and circumstances," I will make no objection.

Mr. CLARK. I consent to that amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to learn from the gentleman from New York if he proposes to demand the previous question upon these bills?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I do, sir.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I merely wish to remark, with the consent of the gentleman from New York, that I shall give way to-day for nothing, unless it is something of as great emergency as this. I will not object to the consideration of these bills if the House will vote upon them immediately under the previous question.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I propose to call the previous question; and in order to avoid a single objection, I propose to agree to the very reasonable amendment suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask that the bill may be read. We do not yet know what the bill is.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Judiciary by Mr. CLARK, was a bill (S. No. 314) for the prevention and punishment of frauds in land titles in California.

The bill was read.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman who reported this bill, if he has any communication from the Attorney General in regard to it?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Yes, I have a verbal communication, and also a letter, received two days since, which I will have read.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire, as this legislation seems to be very hasty, that the gentleman should either read himself, or have read the letter from the Attorney General, which justifies this haste in the passage of the bill.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I send the letter up to be read; and I will state, that in a personal interview which I had with the Attorney General last evening, he stated additional reasons why the bill should pass at once.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that what it is proposed to have read is a hasty note which the Attorney General addressed to me. I will say to the House, that Attorney General Black is exceedingly anxious that these bills should pass. He regards them as of vital importance to the Government, and believes that if these two bills are not passed so as to go out by the steamer of the 20th, the Government will lose an amount of fifty million dollars, at least. I have no objection to the bill being read.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I did not reflect, when I proposed to have the note read, that it was addressed to my honorable friend from Alabama, and not to myself.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let it be read. It is short.

Mr. SEWARD. I have no objection to the bill if it will save the Government from a loss of $50,000,000; but I should like some gentleman to explain how it could be done. The bill provides for the punishment of forgery, and makes it an indictable offense. Now you have to prove the charge of forgery before you can convict the parties. The proof of forgery will vitiate the titles, and therefore I do not see how any damage can accrue to the Government. I am surprised, therefore, that the bill should have been presented with such an amendment.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I would inform the gentleman that at this moment there is no law for the punishment of the crime of forging these Mexican and Spanish land grants.

Mr. SEWARD. I understand that; but if you can bring sufficient proof to convict the parties of forgery, in a criminal prosecution, you can prove the forgery so as to void the titles.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. If the knowledge of the fact of the pendency of these bills should reach California, the crimes may be consummated before the acts can take effect, and thereby the public domain may be defrauded.

Mr. SEWARD. The question is this: if you can prove the forgery to convict the parties for the crime in a criminal prosecution, cannot you prove the forgery so as to void the titles in a civil court in an action for ejectment?

Mr. HOUSTON. The argument of the gentleman from Georgia appears to be for the purpose of delaying action on the bill. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. MILLSON. I ask the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MILLSON. We are assuming jurisdiction over offenses committed in a State, by the citizens of that State. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was passed.

Mr. HOUSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC ARCHIVES IN CALIFORNIA.

The House then proceeded to consider the bill

(S. No. 312) to provide for the collection and safe-keeping of the public archives in the State of California, reported from the Judiciary Committee by Mr. CLARK, of New York.

The bill was read.

The question recurred; first, upon the amendment offered by Mr. QUITMAN, to strike out the word "thereof," and to insert in lieu thereof the words, "showing the facts and circumstances upon which such suspicions are founded."

Mr. CLARK. The amendment is right, and I hope it will be adopted. I ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that they had passed a bill for the relief of Lemuel Worster, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had passed the bill of this House, (No. 294,) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1859, with amendments, in which he was instructed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. MILES. I ask the consent of the House to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I object; and move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Before the question is taken on that motion, I wish to state that I shall move to take up bill H. R. No. 200, making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government. I suppose it is the wish of the House to terminate debate upon this bill before going into committee. If there be no objection, therefore, I will offer the usual resolution to terminate debate upon that bill in fifteen minutes after its consideration shall be resumed in committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think we might as well discharge the committee from the consideration of that bill. I suppose it is in as good condition as we can make it.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I object to that. There are some important amendments which should be made to the bill.

Mr. KELSEY. Has that bill ever been considered in committee?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It has not; but I suppose there will be no objection to closing debate upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I shall object, until the bill has been read, and I can see what is in it.

RECIPROCITY.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I withdraw the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for a moment, and ask unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a joint resolution, for the purpose of having it referred, and printed. I ask that the joint resolution may be read.

The joint resolution was read by its title:

Joint resolution to place certain products on the footing of articles exempted from duty under the reciprocity treaty between the United States of America and Great Britain, signed on the 5th day of June, 1854.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Let it be read.

The joint resolution was read in extenso. It provides for the importation from the British Provinces, under certain regulations, of the articles of hay and hops.

Mr. STANTON. I shall object to the introduction of that resolution.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now ask for a vote upon my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN announced the first bill on the Calendar was House bill No. 198.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to take up bill of the House No. 200, being a bill making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1859.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up. Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was then read by clauses for the purpose of amendment.

The first clause having been read, as follows—

"For continuing the survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coast of the United States, (including compensation to superintendent and assistants, and excluding pay and emoluments of officers of the Army and Navy, and petty officers, and men of the Navy employed on the work,) $350,000;"

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES said: The bill now before us is a branch of the old civil and diplomatic bill. Under the division of that bill, made by the Committee of Ways and Means of the last Congress, this bill is confined to appropriations for the survey of the coast, the light-house establishment, the land surveys, and a few other civil expenses of the Government. The appropriation for these objects has been reduced by the Department to what was supposed to be the minimum amount with which they could be carried on. The Committee of Ways and Means, however, after a careful and scrutinizing investigation, was able to reduce the estimate some two hundred and thirty-nine thousand three hundred and fourteen dollars; and I will state to the committee, that, if it is the intention of Congress to carry on these works—all of which are provided for by law—it is the judgment of the Committee of Ways and Means, and of the Department, that we have reduced the estimates to the lowest possible amount.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would inquire of the gentleman what is the aggregate amount of the appropriation contained in this bill?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The aggregate amount is $3,819,438 97. The amount estimated for was $4,058,752 97. The reduction of $239,314 was made by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The clause which has just been read, makes an appropriation of $250,000 for continuing the survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts of the United States. I think that amount can be reduced with very great propriety; and, as we are short of funds generally, and are likely to be so for some time to come, I think we had better do it. I move to reduce the amount from $250,000 to $150,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have simply to say—and it is but a repetition of what I have said before—that the system of a coast survey was begun a number of years ago. Perhaps no measure was ever introduced into Congress upon which there has been a greater amount of discussion, or which has been subject to a closer investigation than the act organizing the coast-survey system. After fighting it for five years, almost continually, Congress finally came to the conclusion that the only possible way to get along with it, was to prosecute it to completion. The reduction made upon this subject-matter was $30,000 less than what was necessary to carry on the work. That reduction of $30,000 required a suspension of a portion of the operations, but the Department being determined to reduce the appropriation to the lowest possible point, have suspended that portion of the work which could be delayed without damage.

Now a word as to the effect of the gentleman's amendment. This coast-survey system demands many and accurate triangulations, and, of course, a great deal of preparation. It requires the use of steamboats and men to be distributed all over the coast, from Maine to California; and if the gentleman succeeds in reducing the appropriation $100,000, I tell him it will cost more than two hundred thousand dollars next year to repair the damage which will result. The gentleman might just as well strike out the wheels of a clock, and expect it to keep good time, as to strike out any part of this appropriation and expect this work to go on. If the amendment is adopted, it will result in a suspension of the work; it will check the progress of the system, and must do great mischief. The work cannot be carried on except as a continuous system. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

I would not have occupied so much time, but for the fact that the remarks I have made on this amendment are applicable to every appropriation in the bill, to a greater or less extent.

Mr. CLAWSON. I presented, some time ago, resolutions of the State of New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. The first clause of the bill has not yet been read through. When it has it will be in order for the gentleman from New Jersey to offer an amendment and to speak to it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. There is some misapprehension in this matter. The general debate on this bill has not been terminated; and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CLAWSON] has a right to speak on any subject he may desire to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was in error in supposing that the general debate had been closed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Perhaps it was my fault that the Chair has been drawn into the error. The House refused to terminate debate; but I supposed there was a general understanding that we should consider debate closed, and proceed to read the bill by clauses for amendment, except some gentleman claims a right of general debate.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. If gentlemen on the other side would consent to have night sessions for the delivery of speeches on miscellaneous subjects, then they may expect to have bills taken up and considered in their regular order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. In response to the gentleman from Ohio, I have merely to say—

Mr. ADRAIN. Is this debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CLAWSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ADRAIN. I object to this debate; and hope my colleague will be permitted to proceed.

Mr. CLAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor to present to the House a short time since, some joint resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, in reference to the better preservation of life and property upon her coast. I will not detain the committee now in discussing all the propositions they contain, but some of them are so important, that I trust to be indulged while I briefly allude to them. Representing a district washed on one side by the Delaware river and bay, and on the other by the Atlantic, few questions are regarded with so much interest by my constituents, as those to which these resolutions refer. The coast of New Jersey for years has been the dread of the sailor. Its long, low beaches; its numerous shoals and sand bars running parallel with it throughout its entire extent; its position with respect to those storms from the east, which drive with so much fury directly upon it; all tend to render it as terrible to the seaman as were the fabled Scylla and Charybdis to the ancient mariner, or the Maelstrom to the boatman of more recent times. No vessel from the East or South bound to the port of New York but has to run the gauntlet of these dangers. How unsuccessful many of them are, the public press, sir, but too faithfully portrays. During certain portions of the year it teems with the recital of many a tall admiral and rich merchantman driven helplessly upon our shores, and become the prey of the ruthless sea and tempest.

Some provision has already been made by Government for their relief. Station-houses, boats, and keepers, have been liberally distributed along the beach; and many a poor sailor and untold wealth have, by these means, been rescued from stranded ships. The surf-boats that have been placed there, the life-car, the mortar and line have done all that could be done in the hands of a brave, venturesome, and intelligent people. Those who live upon our seaboard have been ever ready, at the first alarm, to rush to the rescue, and to save, so far as possible, at the hazard of their own lives, the lives of their fellows.

But experience has taught them that much more is necessary to be done on the part of Government, to render the success of their efforts at all commensurate with their zeal. The metallic life-boats, which have been furnished to them, are found to be altogether unfitted for this particular service. In many respects, they no doubt possess all the merit claimed for them by their inventor; but they no longer command the confidence of those who have so often to venture through our tumultuous breakers to the relief of wrecks. They now use exclusively their own wooden boats, built of red cedar, when circumstances require the use of any, and those of the Government remain idle in the life-saving station-houses. Their preference for such boats has been repeatedly expressed in an official manner. It was made known to the Secretary of the Treasury three years ago by his Excellency Rodman M. Price, then Governor of New Jersey; and its wooden boats which are called for in the resolutions which have been laid upon your table the other day.

Within the last year, a boat, every way fitted for this kind of service, has been invented by a gentleman of Cape May. It combines all the advantages of the old cedar boats now in use. It is built of the same light wood; it can with difficulty be upset, or, if such accident happen to it, it immediately rights itself. In the event of its filling, from any cause—from capsizing, or from shipping heavy seas—valves placed along its sides free it, to a certain extent, of water. It contains, in close chambers, at either end, quantities of cork, which enable it, even when filled, to support readily its crew. It is light and strong. It can be transported with facility by land from beach to beach, and will live in the most tumultuous surf that ever breaks upon our shores. Such is the self-righting, self-bailing life and surf boat of Mr. R. C. Holmes. It has been thoroughly tested in the ocean itself, as well as at New York, Philadelphia, Trenton, and at the navy-yard in this city, in the presence of many officers of the Navy, and members of both Houses of Congress. All who have witnessed its performances bear testimony to its admirable adaptation to the purposes for which it was designed. The underwriters of Philadelphia and New York urge strongly upon the Government the propriety of adopting it, not only upon our coast, but also upon our national vessels; and the Legislature of New Jersey has sent here resolutions to the same purpose. I trust, Mr. Chairman, the House will see proper to adopt these recommendations, and to ingraft on the light-house bill a provision for placing them at least at the life-saving stations of New Jersey. New boats of some description are absolutely necessary. These are acceptable to the people along the coast, and will cost, I am told, but little more than the commonest boats now in use.

In addition to new boats, which are imperatively demanded by the necessities of commerce, scarcely less necessary are other appliances for the safety of the shipwrecked sailor. There are at this time twenty-eight life-saving stations upon our coast. Each of these is placed under the care of a keeper, at a salary of $200 a year; and the whole are under the direction of a superintendent. These are all the men who are in the pay of the Government. To make the apparatus at all efficient, always requires the assistance of others to move it from point to point along the coast, to work it, and to man the boats. Such services at present are altogether voluntary on the part of our citizens, and are performed without any compensation. They are no doubt rendered as promptly and as cheerfully as if they were regularly employed and paid; but it is no more than just and proper these men should receive some reward for their labors. It is therefore urged that a boat's crew of seven men, subject to the call of the keeper, should be attached to each alternate station-house; and that they be paid at the rate of two dollars a day for the time they are actually employed.

We have been taught by observation that all storms commence to the leeward, and proceed slowly in the opposite direction. A day or more often elapses before a northeastern gale, which begins at New Orleans, is felt at New York. It is believed that a line of telegraph erected along the shore, with an instrument at the most important stations, and all communicating with the Observatory in this city, might serve a most beneficent purpose. By authorizing Lieutenant Maury to receive telegraphic weather reports from such points as he may deem most advantageous, and to transmit to the coast intelligence of approaching storms, the keepers would be enabled to have all their apparatus in readiness for service; and ample time would be given to call the boats' crews from the main. The advantages of such a system would not stop here. Signal guns, placed at every second or third station, could communicate such information to vessels hovering upon the coast; and give them timely warning to seek an early harbor, or, unable to do that, to stand out to sea.

In this connection, permit me to allude briefly to another matter. Our Government, while prompt to punish, has been ever slow to reward. Every year are witnessed upon our low, sandy beaches deeds of daring which in the days of Greece and Rome would have won for the actor the civic crown. Often these men perish in their heroic efforts to relieve the distress of others. The acts of the living go unnoticed by the Republic; the bodies of the dead receive burial at the hands of their comrades, and their families are left impoverished, dependent upon the generosity of their neighbors. Such actions and such sacrifices surely merit some acknowledgment at our hands. An annual appropriation of a thousand dollars, placed at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, might, if properly distributed, again cheer up many a humble household upon the beach, whose chief has been swept away by the surge, and nerve to renewed acts of heroism many an arm which has already won for itself no stinted meed of praise.

These, Mr. Chairman, are some of the provisions which our people through their Legislature ask you to ingraft upon your appropriation bill. Your assistance is not sought for on their own account; they only ask you to place in their hands means to enable them more effectually to relieve others from danger, from whatever harbor or under whatever flag they may sail. New Jersey, comparatively, has but little at stake, either in men or ships. But a small proportion of the vast fleet of vessels which swarm along her coasts sail from her ports. Every commercial State of the Old World—every seaboard State of the Union, from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf stream, send their squadrons to help swell its numbers; vessels from Philadelphia, New York, and Boston; from Richmond, Charleston, and Savannah; from every southern as well as every northern port, navigate our seas, and are at times driven upon our shores. The whole amount desired to render perfectly efficient the apparatus I have referred to, will hardly exceed thirty thousand dollars. I shall, at the proper time, move such amendments to the light-house bill as I believe to be essential to furnish means for the better preservation of life and property from shipwreck. I trust that gentlemen will see sufficient merit in the propositions to give them their support.

But, sir, something more is needed upon our coast by the commerce of the country than men, however heroic they may be, or boats, whatever may be their construction. These, at best, can but lessen the horrors of a wreck. Without a safe and convenient harbor to fly to upon the approach of danger, in spite of all the appliances you may distribute upon the seaboard, every month will still bring with it distress and disaster; every storm will continue to strew our shores with wrecks. Our small coasting vessels dare not put to sea during our heavy northeastern gales, but keep near the land, trusting to find some creek or cove to run into, where they may anchor in comparative safety. But, unhappily, on our whole seaboard, from New York to Norfolk, there is no harbor that can be called safe for such vessels. A bill, sir, is now upon your Calendar, the object of which is to provide them such a shelter. The Committee on Commerce have reported unanimously in favor of constructing a breakwater harbor under Cape May, and have asked for it an appropriation of $50,000. Nor have they come to this conclusion without due deliberation. The embarrassed state of the public Treasury has made them averse to any measures, involving an expenditure of money, which were not deemed absolutely essential to the public good. It is my purpose, sir, in the few remarks I have yet to submit to the House, to invoke its favorable action upon the bill which they have reported.

More than twenty years ago, when the commerce of the country was scarcely half what it now is, the necessity for such a work was brought to the attention of Congress. In 1836 an appropriation was voted for a survey, of which, by the direction of Mr. Poinsett, then Secretary of War, Major Bache had charge. He accomplished his task with fidelity; and his report, in which he urges strongly upon the Government the propriety of this undertaking, accompanies the report of your committee. Since that period, the matter has been repeatedly urged here; but, thus far, without success. Other matters, deemed to be of higher importance, have occupied the attention of the national Legislature. The voice of the poor sailor, struggling against storm and tempest, has not been heard amid the din of party warfare which is waged in these Halls.

I have said, sir, that there is no safe harbor for our coasting vessels from New York to Norfolk. There is but one of any description—that at Cape Henlopen, on the opposite side of the bay; and this (owing to circumstances detailed in Major Bache's report, and which have still greater weight now) is not well adapted to this class of vessels. The portly Dutch galleon, or the three-masted Indiaman, may ride out a storm there in comparative safety; but the coasting-skipper regards it with distrust; and, rather than seek shelter under its stone barriers, will risk the dangers of the tempest elsewhere. Apart from all other considerations, its space alone is too limited to afford room for all the craft that need a harbor. During a calm, indeed, the navies of the world might find anchorage within its walls; but, during high gales, anchors will drag; and ships often suffer more from collisions with one another than they would from the tempest in the open sea. In accidents of this sort, it is always the smaller craft that must suffer. But there is another consideration, sir, of still more consequence. All coasting vessels from Philadelphia, bound for eastern ports, navigate the channel on the Cape May side; it is their shortest and quickest route. To reach Henlopen, they must cross a bay notoriously dangerous, from its numerous shoals, even in moderate weather. They prefer to run into Maurice river cove, a natural harbor, formed far up the bay by a curve in the line of coast; and here are often collected, at one time, more than a hundred sail of vessels. It cannot be difficult to imagine how grateful to such a fleet would be the breakwater contemplated in the bill. Sheltered by the land on one side, and a stone wall breaking the force of the waves upon the other, these little shallops might here ride out in safety the wildest storms that ever sweep across the Atlantic. It is for these, sir, that this work is so imperatively demanded.

These brigs and schooners, which come out of your creeks and rivers, and do the carrying trade along your coast, are at this time by far the most important class of vessels navigating Delaware river and bay. The foreign commerce of Philadelphia is at present scarcely greater than it was sixty years ago. New York and Boston have usurped this sort of trade; but the number of coasting vessels sailing to and from it is scarcely surpassed by any city in the world. In the year 1857, the arrivals amounted to upwards of thirty-two thousand, being at the rate of nearly one hundred a day.

The location of the breakwater is intended to be on what is designated in Major Bache's report as Crow shoal. This is near the point of Cape May, and at all times would afford a sufficient depth of water to float the class of vessels for which it is designed. The advantages of this position are fully set forth in the report of the committee, and the papers which accompany it. Being near the point of the cape, vessels would be detained there only during the prevalence of a storm. Head winds could not prevent them from taking advantage of the first lull in the tempest to continue their voyage. Such is not the case when they make Maurice river cove their harbor. This is twenty-five miles from the chops of the cape; and vessels once entered there, are often detained for weeks from again putting out to sea. The wind from the south, which would be most favorable to them if the cape were once rounded, will now be dead ahead, and will baffle all their attempts to accomplish it. With such a wind, it will often occupy them the entire day to reach the point of the cape. When once there, night has come on; the sky perhaps looks threatening; and the pilot, considering the risk of putting to sea at such a time and in such weather, prudently chooses the lesser evil, and runs back to his morning's anchorage. This is no imaginary case; it is one which is constantly occurring. Fleets of these vessels are often seen lying idle in the cove day after day, long after the storm has passed over; unable, in consequence of adverse winds, to reach and round the cape. It has been estimated that nearly enough is lost every year, by this detention alone, to build the harbor. Give this same fleet of vessels the breakwater on Crow shoal, they run into it on the approach of a storm, and the next morning, if the wind be fair and the tempest has abated, they can, in one short hour, round the cape and weigh their way to their eastern port.

Mr. Chairman, all who live on Cape May and all who cruise in these coasting vessels speak of this matter in some such terms as I have endeavored to repeat here. The hinderances to commerce from the want of this work, so far from being exaggerated by them, I believe to be vastly greater than they are represented. But difficulties of this kind might be permitted to go unnoticed, were they the only thing to be taken into consideration. There is another subject which demands attention, and which cannot be so lightly passed over; I mean the suffering and loss of life which are continually occurring from the want of this work. Every year forty or fifty vessels are wrecked within the immediate neighborhood of the shoal where this harbor is designed to be constructed, and at least as many lives are lost in the same time. Others escape with life, but only after enduring such sufferings as few, I apprehend, in this Hall, can form any conception of. It is no uncommon thing to see sailors in midwinter clinging for hours to the cross-trees of their sunken vessels, exposed to the northern gales and snow-storms, which actually freeze them to the rigging. Many thus perish from exposure; others escape, but with health shattered, with limbs frost-bitten, and crippled for life. The little church-yards of Cape May contain the bodies of many a poor sailor who might to-day be navigating our seas had there been a harbor on its shore to protect him.

As a mere question of economy, the Government would be the gainer by making an appropriation for this purpose. I have already referred to the loss by detention; this is said to be equal at least to two trips a year between Philadelphia and Boston. More than five hundred vessels are employed in the coal trade alone between these cities; each of these will carry about two hundred tons; and at the usual freight of $1.50 per ton, the loss in this way alone would be $300,000. This, combined with the loss by wreck, which is nearly as great, would amount to such a sum, I apprehend, as would be amply sufficient to build the work. But should the expense be greater, and should the loss be even less than has been estimated, surely no one can doubt that since application was first made for it to Congress in 1836, the amount lost by wrecks alone, which could have been prevented by it, would have built such a stately harbor as would have challenged the admiration of the world. Every month's delay in making the necessary appropriations is adding to these losses.

Gentlemen, every year, vote, with little hesitation, millions of money to embellish this city. They construct patent offices, treasury buildings, post offices, by the acre. They make large appropriations for new domes which are to tower gracefully towards the vault of heaven, and for new houses of legislation which are to excite the envy of the capitals of Europe. They eagerly furnish the necessary supplies to complete an aqueduct which is to exceed, in grandeur and expense, anything known to ancient or modern times. I, sir, do not complain of all this; I believe my name will be found recorded in favor of most, if not all, of these appropriations. But, sir, while we vote such sums for objects which will serve for little more than a magnificent parade, let not gentlemen tell us that the Treasury is empty, that our custom-houses are idle, that we have a war upon our hands, and that therefore the Government is too poor to do anything for those who are suffering and perishing upon our coast.

These coasting vessels are the schools in which are educated most of the seamen who are to man our national ships in time of war. On board of these they learn everything that it is necessary for a sailor to know, and experience all the vicissitudes of a sea-faring life that they would be likely to witness in any part of the globe. A fostering care extended over them would render them ever grateful to the Republic. It is to these she owes much of the glory acquired by our little Navy in the last war with England; and it is to these she must be indebted for whatever glory it may acquire in the future. From just such schools graduated those who bore your flag so proudly beneath the walls of Tripoli, and bearded the Turk within his stronghold. Upon the marble monument which graces the western ascent to this Capitol, a grateful country has engraven the names of those who distinguished themselves in our conflict with the States of Barbary. Two, sir, stand out prominently before the rest. On different occasions, each was the principal actor in the two most desperate undertakings of the whole war. One entered the harbor of Tripoli by night, and under the guns of their forts burnt the frigate Philadelphia to the water's edge. The other, on board a fire-ship, attempted to run into and destroy the Turkish fleet; and being boarded by gun-boats, which overpowered his little crew, fired his magazine and annihilated friend and foe. Somers perished, but his gallant deeds are still treasured up by his countrymen; and the people of Cape May point with pride to one, who, reared among them, first learned, like Decatur, to brave the dangers of the sea in the little schooners of the coast.

It is men from just such schools as these that man the fleets of England, and which make her to-day the mistress of the sea. It was these which enabled her so recently to humble the Russian power in the Crimea, and rendered her flag victorious in the seas of China and on the Persian gulf. Take from her ships of war the stout hearts and willing hands which have been recruited from her coasting vessels, and how insignificant would her power become?

To foster and protect them, she furnishes with a liberal hand every appliance that can lessen, and every expedient that can avert the horrors of a wreck. Light-houses, station-houses, harbors of refuge, stud her whole line of coast. Night and day sentinels keep constant watch upon her cliffs.

A harbor of the kind I speak, sir, when once constructed, answers for all time to come. The first expense is the only one; its immovable walls never need repair. The time must come, sir, when this work will have to be constructed; and why not begin at once? Every month's delay but adds to the long catalogue of disasters which has already become so appalling. The lapse of each year sends to a watery grave scores of our fellow-beings, and witnesses the destruction of whole fleets of our coasting vessels.

To show, Mr. Chairman, that what I have been saying is not mere idle declamation, permit me here to read an extract from a letter addressed to me, some two years since, by Mr. Holmes, of New Jersey. This gentleman has spent his life upon the coast, and has, perhaps, been instrumental in saving more people from shipwreck than any one now living. For the last sixteen years he has been the agent of the underwriters of New York and Philadelphia, and has repeatedly received from them testimonials of their warmest approbation, both for his devotion to their interests and to the interests of humanity. I have the honor of his personal acquaintance; I have been at his home upon the sea-side; I have conversed with those who know him intimately; and all concur in characterizing him as one whose opinion on a subject of this kind is entitled to the highest respect. His humane efforts in behalf of the poor, shipwrecked sailor, have palsied his own limbs, crippling him perhaps for life; but he still feels, if possible, more acutely than ever, for the misfortunes of others. Whatever comes from such a source must have infinitely more weight than anything that I could say; and the committee, I am sure, will pardon me if I trespass upon its time with some extracts from his communication. His letter bears date February 20, 1856. The winter had been severe; and he thus alludes to some of the hardships encountered by our seamen at such times:

"For more than two months the Delaware bay has now been closed by ice, while the vessels bound into it have been compelled to lay at anchor back of our beach, exposed to the storms of this terrible coast, or go down to Hampton Roads for a harbor. There has been no place of safety which would properly accommodate these vessels, and into which they could get, short of the capes of Virginia. The poor sailor has no voice in the affairs of the nation, and takes no part in the Government, because his home is upon the great deep; yet he is entitled to our warmest sympathy, and could the members of Congress, as I have done, witness his suffering, caused by the want of this national work, I know they would do all in their power to add to his comfort, and be glad to thus shelter him from the pitiless storm. I wish the members of Congress, who have power thus to befriended the friendless, would visit this coast and witness some of its winter storms. I know it would do them good and benefit those who must look to them for aid. I have now acted on this coast, from Cape May to Little Egg Harbor, a distance of forty miles, as agent for the Philadelphia and New York underwriters, fourteen years, and I have seen suffering and loss of life that have been caused by the want of such a harbor, which I do not care to recall."

And in another place alluding to the harbor at Cape Henlopen, he says:

"The breakwater of the opposite cape is considered no harbor for small vessels. It is so exposed to our northeast gales that they will not go into it if they can possibly avoid it, and prefer running into Maurice river cove, where there are frequently collected over one hundred and fifty sail at a time, which are detained for weeks by head winds.

"The mouth of the Delaware is filled with dangerous shoals; and to cross the bay to go under Cape Henlopen when the weather is thick or when the wind is heavy, is always attended with great danger. It is dead to leeward, and vessels to reach it from this side must go before the gale and wildly enter with no land to protect her while going, and none to shelter her when entered. The entrance to this harbor, of course, must be small, and you will readily perceive the danger of going into such a place among piles of stone before such gales as we often have. The sailor looks at all these things, and prefers to take his chance in the open sea. It is a harbor of deception, at least for small vessels. It is all open to the howling winds of our wild Atlantic. In the northeast gales the small vessels are driven ashore, broken up and sunk by the larger ones dragging into them; and it matters not whether the little one goes into the big one or the big one into the little one, it is the little fellow must always suffer."

Sir, I am fully convinced that by carrying out the view expressed in these extracts in relation to the harbor under Cape May, and by increasing the life-saving apparatus upon the coast in accordance with the resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, most of the vessels and lives annually lost upon our shores might be saved. The station-houses have already admirable apparatus which answer every purpose when a wreck lies near the shore; give to them new boats, boat-crews, and the telegraph, and we shall rarely again hear of such fearful losses of life as have heretofore been so often witnessed. But more than all construct the harbor at the cape, and henceforth, for your coasting vessels at least, the apparatus will seldom be called into service. These always will find sure refuge beneath its walls, while, without, the seas may run mountain high and threaten, each moment, to engulf the storm-tossed vessel,

"Within, the waves in softer murmurs glide,
And ships secure without their halsers ride."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move now that the committee rise, with a view to offer a resolution terminating debate. Before that motion is put, Mr. Chairman, I give notice to the committee—as I believe it to be the sense of the House to transact business—that if the debate be closed, I will myself, at five o'clock each day, if we are in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, move to take a recess till seven o'clock, with the understanding that after seven o'clock nothing in the way of business shall be done. With that understanding I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration House bill No. 200, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that all debate on House bill No. 200 shall terminate in five minutes after its consideration shall have been resumed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I ask the Chair whether the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union has a right to take a recess?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the chairman of the committee will so decide.

The question was taken on Mr. J. GLANCY JONES's resolution; and it was adopted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended; and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 200, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1859; the pending question being the amendment offered by Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, to strike out the word "two," and insert the word "one," in line twelve, so as to make the clause read:

"For continuing the survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coast of the United States, (including compensation to superintendent and assistants, and excluding pay and emoluments of officers of the Army and Navy and petty officers, and men of the Navy employed on the work.) $150,000."

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have had the benefit of the remarks submitted by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and will therefore respond to them. His argument is that if my amendment prevails it puts a stop to this system of expenditure connected with the Coast Survey. In the course of his remarks he said that it would stop the work not only on the Atlantic, but on the Pacific coast. Well, I am not sure but that, under the present circumstances, that would be desirable. The system is now in operation, and he says that all that he asks for its continuance in full blast is $250,000. To be sure, we are informed that there has been a very serious reduction of $30,000. Well, I am satisfied that the system can be continued and progress with the appropriation that I suggest, though it may not progress so rapidly as with the full appropriation.

The honorable gentleman will bear in mind that this item has no reference at all to appropriations for the Pacific coast. This item is "for continuing the survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coast." It has no reference whatever to the expenditure now going on on the Pacific coast, for you will observe, sir, that another division of this section is "for continuing the survey of the western coast of the United States, $130,000."

Now, it has been my teaching, from early life, whenever, from any cause, the usual supplies are withdrawn in private life, to cut short my improvements. If I were building a splendid house, such as this, I would put it in such a condition as that it would not suffer from dilapidation, and not attempt to go on and furnish it in the gorgeous style which is the taste as well as the fashion of the day. I am to reduce my outlay. It is not indispensable to have this coast survey finished immediately. Some delay in its completion will not work any great detriment to the public service. The reduction which has been already submitted to is but $30,000 out of $280,000. Insist upon it that this amendment ought to be adopted; and I shall follow it up with a corresponding reduction in regard to other items in this bill. Instead of cutting down this single appropriation a trifle, I want to make a material impression on the whole bill, and to save the Treasury as much as possible. It was expected, when the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to issue Treasury notes and make a loan, that the Government could make a loan at three and a half per cent. interest; but now we see advertisements that interest is not to exceed six per cent.; and some bids have been made at five per cent., and some as high even as six per cent. Certainly, sir, it would be idle for me to talk to a body of practical men unless I could hope at least that they would take warning from this thing. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOWARD. I hope, sir, that the amendment will not prevail, for I happen to know that the soundest principles of economy require that an appropriation should be made of a sum at least as large as that which it is proposed to reduce. Whatever may be the merits of this Coast Survey, as an original proposition, it is in process of prosecution. The bureau is supplied with vessels and the various implements for carrying on the work. They have made progress in it, and are now engaged in drawing a line across Florida to connect the triangulation on the Atlantic coast with that on the Gulf of Mexico, which is going to save a good deal of expense which would be incurred if they had to go round the cape, and will, perhaps, secure additional accuracy in the work. The men are there; they have their vessels and implements there, and much as it is desirable to save money—and no man would go farther than I would to save money in a legitimate way—I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that, if this work is to be completed, the Government had better borrow money and pay twenty per cent. for it than to reduce the appropriation to $150,000, because the vessels would lie idle, the men would be thrown out of employment, and you could do nothing to advantage. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not prevail.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to amend the following clause by reducing the appropriation $30,000:

"For continuing the survey of the western coast of the United States, $130,000."

I suppose there are no Florida peninsulas to pass through there.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. LEITER. I move to strike out the following clause:

"For continuing the survey of the Florida reefs and keys, (excluding pay and emoluments of officers of the Army and Navy and petty officers, and men of the Navy employed on the work.) $40,000."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The argument of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] was mainly predicated upon the necessity of continuing the work—

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Does the gentleman from Virginia propose an amendment?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to strike out the following clause of the bill:

"For running a line to connect the triangulation on the Atlantic coast with that on the Gulf of Mexico, across the Florida peninsula, $10,000."

I move to strike it out, because the argument of the gentleman from Michigan is, that the $250,000 was necessary to continue this triangulation across the peninsula of Florida; and here is a separate appropriation for that very purpose.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman is mistaken. I said that the appropriation was necessary to carry on the work and to employ the materials in hand; and then, as an illustration of the various operations, I said that they were throwing this line across Florida as a basis of operations—not that it was to be paid for out of the $250,000. What I meant to say was, that these appropriations for the Coast Survey have been reduced by the Committee of Ways and Means to the lowest possible amount that economy would authorize, and any reduction would be adverse to sound economy.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BRANCH. I move to amend by striking out "$7,034 05," and inserting "$3,034 05," in the following item of the bill:

"For fuel and quarters for officers of the Army serving on light-house duty, the payment of which is no longer provided for by the quartermaster's department, $7,034 05."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the kind of items for which we are called upon to vote in this bill. I read from the estimates presented by the Secretary of the Treasury, and laid before Congress at the commencement of the present session of Congress:

Explanation of estimates of sums required for fuel and quarters for officers of the Army serving on light-house duty, &c.:

"For six captains serving on the Atlantic coast, $2,481 48.

"For two captains serving on the northern lakes, $864 42.

"For four lieutenants serving on the Atlantic and Gulf coast, $1,653 69.

"For one major serving on the Pacific coast, $1,395."

I read this merely for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the fact that it appears from this statement that the allowance made in this bill for fuel and quarters for one major, is $1,395. Now, sir, the appropriation may be necessary under existing law. I have confidence in the Committee of Ways and Means, and in the statement of the chairman of that committee made this morning, that they have reduced their estimates as low as they can possibly do under existing law; but, sir, while I hold a seat upon this floor, I will never cease to call the attention of the House to such expenditures of the public money. It is an outrage upon the people of this country, when an officer of the Army receives a liberal salary, a salary admitted on all hands to be liberal, that he should receive under the pretense of fuel and quarters an additional salary of nearly two thousand dollars per annum.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Does the gentleman from North Carolina propose to abolish the Light-House Board?

Mr. BRANCH. I propose to strike out "seven" and insert "three."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I suppose the gentleman understands that the effect of the adoption of that amendment would be to abolish the Light-House Board.

Mr. BRANCH. If the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or any other gentleman, can satisfy me that competent persons cannot be employed to discharge these duties without the payment of such exorbitant compensation as is provided for in this bill, it will be time for me, then, to consider whether we shall abolish the system, or whether we shall introduce some reform. At any rate, if we are to continue this system, and cannot obtain the services of competent officers at a less rate, I, for one, will vote to put their regular salaries at five or ten thousand dollars, or whatever salary it is necessary to give them, directly, and not cover up $2,000 salary under pretense of fuel and quarters.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I only wish to state, in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, that these salaries, including fuel and quarters, are already provided by law, and you can no more alter their salaries in an appropriation bill, than you can alter the salaries of members of Congress.

Mr. BRANCH. This, as I understand it, is no part of the regular salary of officers of the Army. He is entitled to fuel and quarters, by law; and the usual custom is for the Department to allow him such sum as may be reasonable, for fuel and quarters.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The law provides for fuel and quarters.

Mr. PHELPS. A brief explanation only need be made in reference to this matter. Every officer of the Army is entitled to fuel and quarters when public quarters are not assigned to him, and he is assigned to the performance of public duty in other locations. The act establishing a Light-House Board directs that certain officers of the Army and Navy shall be detailed to perform the duties of that board, which has charge of the various light-houses on the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts. The board is composed of officers of the Army and Navy, acting in conjunction with the Secretary of the Treasury. This Light-House Board supersedes the old light-house system, which was under the control of the First Comptroller. I recollect well the member from Maryland, (Mr. Evans,) not now a member of Congress, brought forward from the Committee on Commerce an act upon which the present light-house system is founded. He proposed to establish a Light-House Board, to be selected from the Army and the Navy. They manage everything connected with light-houses; they recommend where they shall be erected, what kind of light shall be used; and they superintend the repairs to be made. I understand that, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, they appoint keepers of the light-houses, and also officers whose duty it is to proceed and examine the condition of the light-houses on the different coasts.

Now, sir, the officers of the Army and Navy who are detailed to serve upon the Light-House Board, are entitled to commutation for fuel and quarters, when they are not employed in barracks, unless the Government furnish quarters at the public expense, the officers of the Army are entitled to commutation for their quarters. The amount of the commutation is fixed by the regulations of the Army, and these officers who are detailed to serve on the Light-House Board are entitled to the same compensation that officers of the Army of the same grade would be entitled to in the regular service.

The system has grown up and these appropriations have been made for a series of years. Every argument of the gentleman from North Carolina strikes at the law which is upon your statute-book. It is probable that he and myself would agree as to the modifications which it would be proper to make of the law. I believe that officers of the Army and Navy ought not to be detailed for service on this board. I think it is a duty which ought to be performed by civilians. But it was not the province of the Committee of Ways and Means to bring forward modifications of the existing laws in an appropriation bill. If they had brought forward such a provision it would have been said that they had exceeded their jurisdiction, that they had assumed a duty which properly belonged to the committee, of which my friend from New York, [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] is chairman. Such a proposition should come from the Committee on Commerce and not from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think that the question which has been raised by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BRANCH] is a proper one, though upon the arbitrary question as to the amount of reduction which should be made, I think he has moved an amendment which ought not to be adopted; that is to say, to strike out "seven" and insert "three," which would be a reduction of $4,000. I think that is entirely too great a reduction upon this particular item. I therefore move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, by striking out "three" and inserting "five." That will allow to these officers, for fuel and quarters, $5,034, which, I apprehend, will be entirely sufficient to cover their expenses, either upon the Pacific or Atlantic coast. The Committee of Ways and Means have introduced the item precisely as it was recommended to them by the quartermaster's department. The item, to which the gentleman from North Carolina referred, allows one major the sum of nearly two thousand dollars for fuel and quarters; an amount which that gentleman and myself deem entirely too great to allow an officer of the Army, of the rank of major. I see no reason why he should be entitled to that, and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has certainly given no reason to this committee why it should be allowed. My friend from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] has given no reason—

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. With the permission of the gentleman, I will read a section of the act of 1852:

"And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Light-House Board, immediately after being organized, to arrange the Atlantic, Gulf, Pacific, and Lake coasts of the United States into light-house districts, not exceeding twelve in number. And the President is hereby authorized and required to direct that an officer of the Army or Navy shall be assigned to each district, as light-house inspector, subject to and under the order of the Light-House Board; who shall receive for such services the same pay and emoluments that he would be entitled to by law for the performance of duty in the regular line of his profession, and no other," &c.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not question that the officer is entitled to pay according to his rank; but it is, that the item which is provided for by this portion of the bill is not covered by the law which the gentleman has read. The gentleman says the officer is entitled to pay according to rank. That I did not dispute. The question I raised was in regard to the allowances made to the officers for fuel and quarters, which is here $1,895. That, of course, is not regulated by law, and we think it is entirely too much. There is no propriety in it, and there is no law for it. I called upon the gentleman to give me the law authorizing it; and he tells me the Light-House Board regulates this matter.

Mr. PHELPS. I only referred to the regulations of the Army which prescribe the number of rooms and the amount of fuel which shall be allowed to officers of different grades.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Read it.

Mr. PHELPS. It is a long paper and I cannot read it. This is the particular Army regulation to which I refer.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask the gentleman from Missouri whether any officer of the Army with the rank of major, anywhere upon the Pacific or Atlantic coast, or within the United States, receives for fuel and quarters $1,895?

Mr. PHELPS. He receives no more than these quarters will cost him, and no more for fuel than what will be sufficient for him at the place where he is stationed. The amount allowed depends upon two things—the grade of the officer, and the location of his post. More fuel would be allowed to an officer stationed in Maine than to one stationed in the State of Texas, and more fuel is allowed to a major than to a lieutenant. I have in my hand the regulation which prescribes the number of rooms and the number of cords of wood to which each officer is entitled, and they can receive no more pay for fuel than the Army regulations permit, nor any more for quarters than they are authorized to rent, and the actual rent which they are obliged to pay.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That does not meet the question raised by myself and by the gentleman from North Carolina; which is, that this appropriation is not covered by law, and that is my objection to it. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Did not the gentleman vote for this appropriation in committee?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I did not vote for it, and there is another item in this bill which I did not vote for, and which I shall move to strike out; and that is, the appropriation for the Washington aqueduct.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I believe that the objection is, that the estimate for this item is too high.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes, sir; and because it is not covered by the law.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman will perceive that this is an item for the Pacific coast, where the expenses of all things are much higher than they are on the Atlantic coast. I can give no further information upon the subject than is sent to us by the Department. The substance of that information is, that the Department gets those accommodations at the very lowest price possible. It is not to be supposed that the Department can estimate precisely what these items will cost. But the Army regulations cover the case; and that being the case, the Department estimates as nearly as it can, what they will cost. And I will say to gentlemen that if the cost is less than here estimated, it will not be paid, and the balance will return into the Treasury.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to read one paragraph of the Army regulations, which will settle this matter:

"When public quarters cannot be furnished to officers at stations without troops, or to enlisted men at general or department headquarters, quarters will be commuted at a fixed rate by the Secretary of War, and fuel at the market prices delivered. When fuel and quarters are commuted to an officer by reason of his employment at a civil work, the commutation shall be charged to the appropriation for the work. No commutation for rooms or fuel is allowed for officers or messes."

Mr. BRANCH. With the permission of the gentleman from Missouri, I wish to say that the chairman of the committee of Ways and Means made the point against my amendment that the matter was regulated by law. I admit that where it is regulated by law we cannot in this way reach the matter or control it. But another member of the Committee of Ways and Means gets up, and, instead of reading the law authorizing this item, reads a section of the Army regulations. I ask if it has come to this, that a regulation issued by a commanding general of the Army, or an estimate made by the Quartermaster General of the Army, is such a law that this House cannot inquire into it? We are not precluded, by propriety or by the rules of the House, from reducing the estimate; and the very point I make is, that the Department has estimated too largely, and it is the duty of this House to cut down the estimates so made.

Mr. PHELPS. I wish simply to say in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, that the Army regulations have the sanction of law; for they are established in pursuance of law.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. CRAWFORD to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. BRANCH's amendment.

Mr. STANTON called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I offer the following amendment:

Insert after the word "department," in the seventy-third line, the following:

A sum not exceeding three hundred dollars each, except in the State of California, where the sum allowed shall not exceed six hundred dollars.

So as to make the clause read:

For fuel and quarters for officers of the Army serving on light-house duty, the payment of which is no longer provided for by the quartermaster's department, a sum not exceeding, &c.

We have in the United States, according to this bill, five hundred and fifty-six light-houses. These light-houses are divided into thirteen divisions. Each division is under the command of an Army officer. That Army officer, under the regulations of the War Department, claims fuel and rations. The committee will not fail to perceive that this officer ought to be a traveling officer; that he has a number of these light-houses under his charge; that he is, or ought to be, frequently in motion; and that there is not one of these divisions which has not a military establishment of the United States within it—not one where quarters cannot be had. Notwithstanding that this is the case, he prefers his claim for fuel and quarters—quarters which he ought rarely to occupy—and is allowed four hundred dollars odd for these particular items. I propose to confine this allowance to a reasonable sum. I suppose there is no doubt of our power to do so. My amendment restricts the allowance on the Atlantic coast to $300 each, and on the Pacific coast, $600.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to say that that would make the amount $7,800, instead of $7,034.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. No, sir; $300 to twelve men and $600 to this major in California. The committee will observe that I propose by this amendment to regulate these allowances to officers by fixing them at $300 on the Atlantic coast, and $600 in California, where things are certainly at a pretty high figure. I ask the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if that is not enough? Does he not believe that it will cover every dollar of expense in that regard?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether, in his calculation for these officers engaged in light-house duty, he has made the allowances according to their Army rank?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. That is my understanding. They are allowed for quarters and fuel which appertain to their rank in the Army.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Well, that ought not to be so.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am opposed to the amendment. I do not propose to debate it; I believe the bill cannot be improved, and I call for the vote.

The question was taken on Mr. SMITH's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. REAGAN. I offer an amendment to come in at the seventy-fourth line.

Mr. SEWARD. We have not reached that point where the gentleman offers his amendment. When we have reached it the gentleman can offer his amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Who is entitled to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Well, I hope his amendment will be read. Let us go on in order.

Mr. REAGAN's amendment was read as follows:

Provided, That no sum shall be paid out of this appropriation, in gross, to any officer, nor until the proper Department shall be satisfied that an actual expenditure has been made by such officer for fuel or quarters, and for no other purpose; and only for the amount of such actual expenditure.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand, from what has been said by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the officers provided for in this clause are to be paid constructive fuel and quarters according to their rank in the Army. The object of my amendment is to prevent this constructive paying away of the public money for purposes for which it is never used.

This amendment, whatever the appropriation may be, will limit the expenditures to the amount actually paid out for fuel and quarters. The salaries of these officers have been referred to in this debate. Their salaries are elsewhere provided for. This is only for fuel and quarters. I desire to limit the expenditures to the payments actually made for fuel and quarters, and not to allow these constructive payments to be made to officers of the Army.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to correct the gentleman on one point. They do not receive their fuel and quarters by construction of law at all, but by positive law. The law itself fixes the pay, fuel, and rations, according to rank.

Mr. REAGAN. It is doubtful, and this amendment makes it clear and explicit. They are not to be paid constructively, but only for what is actually needed by the public service.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I have observed that the honorable gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRANCH] has, on more than one occasion, assailed the extravagance of the Army of the United States, and I have sought an opportunity to reply to him, but have heretofore been unable to do so. In the first assault which he made, he said that we had a superabundance of officers in our service as compared with the service of other countries, and read copious extracts to show an exorbitant number of commissions to a given number of privates. In justice to the Army, he should have considered the character of the service which our officers perform. Many of our officers are not really engaged with the troops, but are employed in civil pursuits by the Government, as you perceive by the character of the bill now before us. Many of them are engaged in the topographical bureau, and in various surveys all through the United States; some of them supervising constructions of roads; some driving camels; one has, for years, been delving in the earth to discover artesian wells; and one has charge of the construction of this Hall. Others are engaged in civil engineer service—quite out of the line of the duties performed by military officers in other parts of the world. Our Army is a skeleton army. The officers educated at West Point are employed in various ways, and whenever the legitimate service requires it, they are ready to fall into the ranks and do the duty devolved upon them as military commanders. This versatility of pursuits brings them in contact with the various enterprises of the day, and better qualifies them to act as a nucleus upon which your militia can and does rally in time of war. There is no branch of the military service that is more cautiously guarded than that relating to fuel and quarters. It is impossible that an officer should draw more than he actually needs, because the quartermaster can only grant that which the service seems to require. For instance: the officers serving in Mexico generally got no fuel, because the climate was generally so warm none was required. But from the earliest military history of our country, the officers and privates of the Army have been entitled to fuel and quarters when required, and I do not apprehend that any officer will receive more under this bill than is right and just. Why should officers on light-house service be deprived of this allowance, which is accorded to all other branches of the service?

Mr. BRANCH. I desire to ask the gentleman, in order to show the injustice of this system, whether an officer serving in the Indian country, and living in tents and undergoing all the hardships of living in tents, gets anything from the Government for fuel and quarters? And whether this is not an advantage given to officers living in comfortable quarters, and a discrimination against officers engaged in hard service?

Mr. CURTIS. It is not a discrimination which they regard as an injustice. At least they should not: the man in field service, with all this inconvenience in regard to quarters, generally prefers it. He draws a tent instead of a house, and prefers it. Why? First, because his personal and family expenses are less while he is in field service; and, second, because the service is generally more in accordance with his profession; more varied and distinguished, and therefore more interesting. It would be better for the officers and the service if they were more in the frontier service. But if, stationed in the city of Cleveland, or New York, or San Francisco, he desires to live as other gentlemen do, he must incur greater expense. It is right and necessary for the honor of your country that your officers should be so provided. The quartermaster has to furnish our officers when thus located with a respectable house, and you cannot get a respectable house in a large city for less than from five hundred to one thousand dollars a year; you cannot get a good one even in Iowa, in the city of Keokuk, where I reside, for less than six or eight hundred dollars a year. An officer is thus entitled to quarters according to his location. If in the field, he desires and draws a tent; if in a frontier garrison, he has a cabin; and when you locate him in a city, he should have a respectable house. Such is the system established by the Army regulations, and contemplated by this bill. I hope gentlemen will pass on to other items, and make no further assault on the transient and indifferent homes allowed to our Army officers and their families. [Here the hammer fell.]

The question being on Mr. REAGAN's amendment,

Mr. CRAWFORD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HALL of Ohio, and BUFFINGTON were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 74.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to amend the same paragraph by striking out "seven" and inserting "ten." Mr. Chairman I have moved this amendment simply for the purpose of making a few remarks upon the general subject.

It is a matter of regret to me that these insidious attacks are made against the commerce of the country by some gentleman who come from the same section of country from which I come. When we remember that we have no commerce, that we have no ships which are built at the South, that the whole commerce of the South does not exceed forty thousand tons of vessels built there, yet southern men are eternally warring upon appropriations which are for the benefit of the coast surveys and for the Light-House Board, which are of such immense advantage to the commerce of my section of the country. It is a fact that an exclusively agricultural country can never become a wealthy country.

While gentlemen from the North have been liberal in their appropriations for the benefit of the South, gentlemen from the South vote against them. If these reforms are necessary, let us reorganize the Light-House Board. Let us reorganize the whole system, and our whole system of coast survey. Let us do what is proper, and no more. But I protest that while the commerce of the South is languishing, it should be made to suffer still more by the niggardly parsimony shown by gentlemen from the South, when gentlemen from the North come forward to relieve us. Let us meet gentlemen from the North in these measures for our relief, instead of spending our time in nonsensical conventions, discussing commerce outside the country.

Now, sir, we must have some principle to act upon. We must have some system. Gentlemen are constantly complaining that war is made upon the South; that contributions are levied upon the South; and that the labor of the South is taxed for the benefit of the North. It is true that the labor of the South has been taxed for the benefit of the North, but we have done nothing for ourselves. Gentlemen from the North are willing to do what is right. During the five years I have been here, I have always found the people of the North liberal, in respect to the South, upon every subject, with the exception of that of slavery, and I believe they are coming round right upon that subject. I want to see the subject of slavery taken away from these Halls. Let that be done. Let us talk about commerce. Let us come up like sensible men, and turn our attention to the commerce of the country—a subject in which all our people in the North, in the South, the East, and the West, are equally interested—and we shall hear no more of sectional controversies.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to oppose the amendment of my colleague. I do not think the appropriation should be increased to $10,000.

[The committee here informally rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled, bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 82) to amend "An act to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be surveyed the tract of land in the Territory of Minnesota, belonging to the half-breeds or mixed bloods of the Dacotah or Sioux nation of Indians, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1854;

An act (S. No. 314) for the prevention and punishment of frauds in land titles in California;

An act (S. No. 312) to provide for the collection and safe-keeping of public archives in the State of California.

The committee again resumed its session.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to amend the same paragraph by striking out "three" and inserting "five." I do not understand the principles upon which the Committee of Ways and Means justify themselves in calculating the pay of these people, who are engaged upon light-house duties, according to Army rank. You say the Quartermaster General will not pay them. You put these men upon special duty—upon light-house duty. Why should not one superintendent, put upon light-house duty, have fuel and quarter equal to another superintendent, put upon the same duty? They are all occupying the same special position, of superintending, as I understand it, the light-house system. When the duties are the same, when the districts are equalized, when the special duties they perform are the same, why should a younger man, probably of the most energy, probably of the most talent and of the most efficiency, be cut down in the matter of his quarters and fuel to that belonging to the rank of lieutenant, while an older man next to him, upon the same line of duty, gets fuel and quarters according to a major or colonel's rank?

Mr. CURTIS. I can tell the gentleman. It is because old men have larger families, and have more company to entertain.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I am indebted to the gentleman from Iowa for the information, and he stands uncontradicted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and therefore I suppose he gave correctly the principle upon which the appropriation is made—that where a man, a senior in years, is superintendent of a light-house district, you give him larger pay, in order that he may entertain more company. Now, my notion about it is this: that when we put men upon similar duty we ought to equalize the compensation; that when officers leave the Army and assume land duties—such as superintending the light-houses—they ought to be paid like lamp-lighters, and not like majors.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to ask the gentleman if he proposes to alter the law in an appropriation bill?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not concede there is any law for this item. If there is, I would like to see it.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky one question. I would like to know how many horses he rode, when he was a colonel commanding in Mexico, by construction?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I never rode any by construction; I rode a great many actually. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS. Did not you have three horses?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It is true I had all that I was entitled to, and I nearly rode their tails off. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BRANCH. I cannot permit the remarks which have fallen from the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] to pass without calling the attention of the House to the very gross error into which he has fallen. I think it would plague any gentleman in this House, except the gentleman from Georgia, to perceive how an attempt to prevent a major in the Army from receiving $2,000 for fuel and quarters, over and above his usual pay and other perquisites, is an attack upon the commerce of the country. The gentleman, however, says he regrets to see gentlemen upon this floor assail commerce upon all occasions.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman does not confine his remarks to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BRANCH. I was only answering the gentleman from Georgia. But I will endeavor to proceed in order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I understand the gentleman rises to oppose the amendment; and that he is opposed to striking out "seven" and inserting what has been proposed.

Mr. BRANCH. I do not know how the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has found that out.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Because I know my friend would not desire to proceed out of order; and he can only proceed in order by opposing the amendment.

Mr. BRANCH. I intended—

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BRANCH. I do not wish to consume the time of the committee, and will yield the floor in a moment. I wanted to remark that, instead of forty thousand tons, the South owns more than five times forty thousand tons of shipping; and that a single port of the South which I could name—the port of Baltimore—owns one hundred and eighty-three thousand tons; that Charleston owns sixty thousand tons. And I could name several ports which own three or four times the tonnage which the gentleman from Georgia asserted as belonging to the entire South. Instead of southern men doing injustice to the North, it is southern men doing injustice to the South, by such statements as the gentleman from Georgia has made. That is what the South suffers under, even more than from attacks of those who live in other sections of the Union.

Mr. SEWARD's amendment was not agreed to. The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. CLAWSON. I offer the following amendment, to come in between lines 77 and 78:

For the purchase of Holmes's life-boat, to be placed at each of the twenty-eight life-saving stations on the coast of New Jersey, $6,440.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a question of order. If I understand the amendment, it is not in order, because it is not provided for by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment being an independent resolution, the Chair rules it out of order.

Mr. CLAWSON. There are already life-saving boats at those stations in New Jersey, and they are provided for by law.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman will find in line eighty an appropriation for contingencies, to which his amendment may be offered.

Mr. CLAWSON. The amendment, I think, is in order here. [Cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled the amendment out of order.

Mr. CLAWSON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. I wish to say one word.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I rise to a question of order. The appeal is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal is not debatable.

Mr. CLAWSON. Does the Chair decide that my amendment will not be in order in any part of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is out of order, as there is no provision of law providing for it.

Mr. ADRAIN. I understand there is a law for the purchase of boats. The boats now in use on the New Jersey coast are of no use, and the proposition of my colleague is to substitute other boats for those that are absolutely valueless.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is out of order, and so decides. The gentleman from New Jersey appeals from that decision.

Mr. CLAWSON. I withdraw the appeal for the present.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. CLAWSON. I offer the following amendment:

After line eighty-one, insert as follows:

For the purchase of Holmes's life boats, to be placed at each of the twenty-eight life-saving stations on the coast of New Jersey, $6,440.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I raise the question of order, that the amendment proposes independent legislation. The clause sought to be amended is "for contingencies for life-saving apparatus on the coast of the United States, $12,000." The amendment is a proposition to authorize the purchase of a specific kind of boat. There is no law for it whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CLAWSON. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that there are twenty-eight life-saving stations on the New Jersey coast. There are already boats there—the Francis life-boat—and the proposition merely is to substitute those of Mr. Holmes. Francis's boats will not be used by the seamen along the coast of New Jersey. They lie at the station-houses perfectly useless. In cases of wreck, the seamen on the coast use their own boats exclusively. The proposition is, that the Government shall supply them with boats, instead of using their own boats.

Mr. FLORENCE. The purchase of boats is now authorized by law, and the point of order, made by the gentleman from Virginia, cannot be sustained.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Does the Chair hold the amendment to be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decided to hear the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey, before deciding the question.

Mr. CLAWSON. I desire to add but one word more. I believe that when this appropriation was originally made for life-saving apparatus on the coast of New Jersey, it was made by an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the gentleman moves to increase the appropriation, that amendment will be germane; but if he moves also to add words, describing the article, not in the existing law, then it is not germane.

Mr. FLORENCE. There is an existing law providing for boats.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then it is not necessary to describe the boats. All that is necessary is to increase the appropriation.

Mr. FLORENCE. It is merely substituting another boat for the one now in use, because the latter is entirely useless.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The word "contingencies" will cover all that, if it be in the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes that, under rule 81, this amendment, being germane to the bill, is in order at this stage of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

And for the purchase of the best life-boat, to be approved by the Department, for use on the coast of Long Island, $10,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The act of 1854 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to establish such additional stations on the coasts of Long Island and New Jersey for affording aid to shipwrecked vessels thereon, to change the locations of the existing stations, and to make such repairs and furnish such apparatus and supplies as may, in his judgment, be best adapted to give effect to the objects of that act. The discretionary power of the Secretary of the Treasury under this act is large enough to cover all this; and, if the gentleman wants to obtain a better kind of boat, he may do so by moving to increase the appropriation, and that amendment will be germane.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. The amendment suggested by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is entirely satisfactory to myself; but I desire to say that something additional is absolutely necessary. We not only lose millions of property annually on the coasts of Long Island and New Jersey, at the entrance of the port of New York, but thousands of lives are annually sacrificed on these coasts. The stations now provided, and the means now provided, are wholly inadequate, and some additional appropriations are absolutely necessary. This is a matter of life and death—a matter of vital importance to those coming to our port from foreign countries—of vital importance to our shipping interests, and to those who are engaged in foreign trade. It is not an appropriation that we can postpone. We can dispense with many of the appropriations in this bill; but here is an appropriation intended for the saving of life, and we cannot dispense with it. If gentlemen will examine the statistics, they will find that hundreds of thousands of dollars are annually sacrificed there, because we have not provided efficient means to save life and property. New York is the great port of the country. The emigration coming into the port of New York is annually increasing. I do not desire to occupy the time of the committee, but I desire to call the attention of the committee to the vast interests involved in this matter.

Mr. LETCHER. I am opposed to this mode of legislation for one or two reasons that are sufficient to myself. Whether they will prove satisfactory to the committee, or not, is another matter. Now, sir, here is a proposition—to do what? To direct the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase a boat of a particular make and of a particular pattern, taking away from him all discretion in regard to the matter; although, at the very time this order is made, he may have conclusive evidence before the Department that this boat is not as good as other boats now in use.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. The amendment which I propose does not do that.

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman will permit me to say that the Secretary of the Treasury has direct evidence to the contrary. This boat has undergone investigation by officers appointed by the Navy Department, with a view to its introduction and use in the revenue marine and naval service, and, from the investigations and experiments that have been made, have proved its better adaptability for the purpose than any other; and it is a humane object which gentlemen have in view in desiring to introduce it.

Mr. LETCHER. The humane object may be effected as well, perhaps, by one boat as by another; and if the examination has been already made, and the Secretary of the Treasury is satisfied that this is the best boat that can be procured for the service, it strikes me as a little singular that an officer who is usually so prompt in regard to his duty should not have apprised the House of the fact, and requested them to make the necessary change in the law for that purpose. But nothing of that sort has been done. If this part of the amendment be stricken out, then if the Secretary of the Treasury is satisfied, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says he is, he will not be precluded from obtaining that boat which is best adapted to the service.

It strikes me, then, that the most proper course for us to pursue is to leave the discretion just as it is, and, of course, whatever light the Secretary has before him will guide him in his future action on the subject, and if his conclusion shall be, as my friend from Pennsylvania supposes, then he will in all probability purchase this boat.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of mischievous legislation here by directing things to be done in a particular way, when the House is entirely destitute of knowledge in regard to it, when it has not a particle of information from the Department in regard to it, and when the only information which we have has suddenly been sprung upon the House in the progress of a five-minute debate such as this is. This course I suggest can do no harm; the other course may do mischief.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment to the amendment already pending, and no further debate is in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a question of order. I know of nothing in the rules of the House that justifies members in sleeping on the sofas around the Hall—as I see several gentlemen now doing—when there is a very important matter under consideration. [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, is it in order to move to strike out the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee. Then, sir, I make that motion, because I do not think that so important a matter as this ought to be acted upon without the presence of the honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. CLEMENS,] who, I discover, is now asleep. [Much laughter.] The gentleman from Virginia, on the memorable night when many members were absent, manifested so much zeal in having every member present, that I think it would be doing injustice to the country to go on with important subjects of legislation without his presence. I therefore make that motion, and shall insist on it, unless the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CLEMENS] can be waked up and brought to his seat. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CLEMENS at this point returned to his seat.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee. I now withdraw my motion.

Mr. TAYLOR's amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to amend the amendment, by striking out the word "Holmes's," so that it will read:

"For the purchase of life-boats to be placed at each of the twenty-eight life-saving stations, and so forth."

That will leave the matter in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury as to what boat he shall purchase.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I oppose the amendment for the reason that unless we designate the kind of boat, we have no guarantee that the matter will not be disposed of on political grounds.

Mr. PHELPS obtained the floor.

Mr. KELSEY. I rise to a question of order. Debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia has been exhausted. The gentleman from Virginia submitted the amendment, and the gentleman from Illinois opposed it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois was not recognized by the Chair, and had no right to oppose it.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I wish to ask if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] was adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. It was.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Then, is it in order to move an amendment to the amendment as amended?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment as amended now becomes the same as original matter, and is open to amendment.

Mr. PHELPS. I am opposed to both the amendments now pending. I think it proper to leave this matter to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CLAWSON. I rise to a question of order. My question of order is, that the gentleman from Missouri is not opposing the amendment.

Mr. PHELPS. I am very sorry my friend from New Jersey does not see that I am in order.

Mr. CLAWSON. The amendment is to strike out the word "Holmes's." The gentleman states that he is in favor of leaving the whole matter to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he is therefore in favor of the amendment.

Mr. PHELPS. I will endeavor to keep in order.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to another point of order. I understand that this amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. STANTON. I understood it had been adopted.

Mr. PHELPS. I am desirous that when the Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase these life-boats, he shall have the opportunity of purchasing the best life-boats that have been invented. The gentleman from New Jersey says that Holmes's life-boat is the best. If it is the best, then I am opposed to striking the word "Holmes's" out; but I think it is better to leave the whole matter to the exercise of the sound judgment and discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that we should give him authority to purchase Holmes's life-boats, or Francis's life-boats, or any others which have been manufactured, and which he may decide to be the best. I think it is wrong to require the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase the invention of a particular individual.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Will the gentleman from Missouri accept an amendment increasing the appropriation to $20,000?

Mr. PHELPS. Is that for the benefit of Holmes's life-boat?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Oh no.

Mr. PHELPS. The amendment of the gentleman is not in order at this time; for an amendment to an amendment is pending. I can see no necessity for increasing this appropriation according to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, unless it be because Holmes's life-boat costs more than any other life-boat which has been invented. I submit to the committee, whether it is not better to leave the Secretary of the Treasury to select the life-boat which shall be found, on examination, to be the best?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment as amended.

Mr. BILLINGHURST called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BILLINGHURST and JOHN COCHRANE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported eighty-four in the affirmative; a further count not being demanded.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. I offer the following amendment, to come in immediately after the amendment just adopted:

For procuring two additional improved metallic life-boats, a metallic life-car, and necessary harness, lines, and other suitable articles, to be used under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury in saving life, in case of marine disaster, off Galveston station, Texas, $10,000.

This is an amendment similar to the one just adopted. The necessity for it is stated in a petition I now hold in my hand, signed by a number of the principal merchants of the city of Galveston. Two vessels were recently wrecked there, and most of the crew lost. One large steamer plying between the city of New Orleans, Galveston, and the western coast of Texas, was burned off the coast, and fifty-three lives were lost in consequence of not having these life-boats. A life association has been organized to cooperate with the Secretary of the Treasury to save life through this appropriation. This is an appropriation on which I trust my friends from the North will respond to the sentiments uttered by the gentleman from Georgia, and show that, while some gentlemen of the South will vote for these liberal appropriations, they, too, will vote to save southern life, as some of us have just voted in favor of providing means for saving northern life. There is a necessity for this appropriation, as shown by the memorial of the merchants of the city of Galveston; and many of the facts stated in that memorial I myself know to be true.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Is that amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been received by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EUSTIS offered the following amendment to be inserted between lines 81 and 82:

Treasury Building, Custom-Houses, and Marine Hospitals.

For continuing the work on custom-houses building at the following places, viz: at New Orleans, Louisiana, $350,000; and at Charleston, South Carolina, $300,000; $650,000.

For the completion of custom-houses at the following places, viz: at Ellsworth, Maine, $2,000; at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $50,000; at Bristol, Rhode Island, (including fencing and grading,) $5,000; at New Haven, Connecticut, $60,000; at Oswego, New York, $10,000; at Plattsburg, New York, $10,000; at Newark, New Jersey, $10,000; at Norfolk, Virginia, $20,000; at Pensacola, Florida, $5,000; at St. Louis, Missouri, $20,000; at Mobile, Alabama, (including fencing and paving,) $30,000; at Galena, Illinois, $10,000; at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, $10,000; and for annual repairs of custom-houses, $15,000; $257,000.

For the completion of marine hospitals at the following places, viz: at Portland, Maine, $3,000; at St. Marks, Florida, $2,500; at New Orleans, Louisiana, (including filling up, grading, and fencing, and the introduction of gas and water pipes and fixtures,) $35,000; at Cincinnati, Ohio, $50,000; at Galena, Illinois, $5,000; and for annual repairs of marine hospitals, $15,000; $160,500.

For grading, paving, and fencing the grounds, and for furnishing custom houses, at the following places, viz: at Ellsworth, Maine, $3,000; at Bath, Maine, furniture alone, $1,100; at Burlington, Vermont, $4,600; at New Haven, Connecticut, $3,500; at Oswego, New York, $7,300; at Plattsburg, New York, $9,900; at Newark, New Jersey, $5,200; at Alexandria, Virginia, $3,700; at Norfolk, Virginia, $12,000; at Mobile, Alabama, furniture alone, $2,600; at Pensacola, Florida, $2,500; at St. Louis, Missouri, $14,600; at Louisville, Kentucky, $3,900; at Cleveland, Ohio, $7,100; at Galena, Illinois, $3,700; and at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, $7,700; $97,100.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire whether it would be in order to move to amend that proposition, by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow the money with which to meet that appropriation? [Laughter.]

Mr. EUSTIS. I will state, for the information of the House, that the appropriations asked for in the amendment are not precisely those which are asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury; and perhaps I may be permitted to add that they receive his countenance; at all events, I think I may state, if I am to be contradicted—and I certainly shall be by the vigilance of the Committee of Ways and Means—that the Secretary of the Treasury does not oppose, and will not oppose, any of these appropriations. The House will perceive that they are divided into three classes.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to ask the gentleman from Louisiana whether he omitted the appropriation for the Treasury extension by design or by accident?

Mr. EUSTIS. I omitted it by design, and not by accident. As I was saying, the appropriation is divided into three classes.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a point of order. The amendment is not in order, because it is not germane to this portion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it is in order, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. EUSTIS. When I was interrupted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I was saying that this amendment contains three classes of appropriations. In the first place, there is an appropriation for $350,000 and one for $300,000 for the continuance of the work on the custom-houses of Charleston and New Orleans. These works are under contract, and we have no discretion. The Secretary of the Treasury states in his letter that where works are progressing under contract there is no discretion with the Department to limit the progress of the works. If they were to stop for want of appropriations, the Government would be liable for damages, and for damages that might be infinitely larger in amount than the appropriations that are now asked for. The other classes of appropriations are necessary to complete buildings at some ten or twelve places. The aggregate amount is some two hundred and fifty-seven thousand dollars. If the amount be appropriated, before the meeting of next Congress these buildings will be completed; and the Government, instead of paying enormous rents to private individuals, will have its buildings completed, and will be able to occupy them. Therefore, on the principle of sound economy, these appropriations which the Committee of Ways and Means have designedly omitted to present to this House, are absolutely necessary for the purpose of saving money to the Government.

But, sir, when I look at the bill which the Committee of Ways and Means have reported to this House, I am not prepared to say that these appropriations were omitted from motives of economy. I find on page 10 an item for the completion of the Washington Aqueduct, $800,000; one for the Capitol extension, $1,000,000; and one for the extension of the General Post Office, $100,000. Enormous sums of money are asked for for the completion of public buildings here in the District of Columbia. I see no reason why the same rule should not apply throughout the whole country. If the Government, from motives of economy, is not prepared to complete its buildings in different parts of the United States, let us make the rule general in its application, and stop the progress of buildings in the District of Columbia, as well as in the States. The same remarks that apply to custom-houses will apply also to marine hospitals. The third class of appropriations is for fencing, grading, paving, and furnishing buildings which will be completed before the next session of Congress. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LETCHER. One of the propositions embraced in this amendment is for $360,000 for the custom-house at New Orleans—a custom-house which has already had expended on it by the Government a sum of $2,675,258; and which has sunk an average depth of fifteen and three fourths inches since it was commenced. How long will it be after you pile this stone on it—

Mr. EUSTIS. Will the gentleman permit me—
Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman will excuse me, as I have but five minutes to reply to the gentleman. I refer the gentleman to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the accuracy of my statement. It is sinking still; for, in the last year, it has sunk on the average two inches; and the more you pile upon it, as a matter of course the more it will continue to sink. Then, besides all this, here is New York, the great importing port of this country, where a custom-house was built for $1,105,000, which answered all the purposes of the Government in 1842; while $2,670,000 has been expended on the custom-house in New Orleans, and $2,000,000 will probably be demanded to complete it. And here let me tell the gentleman that he is under a slight mistake when he says that the New Orleans custom-house is being built by contract; and there again I refer him to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, where it is stated, on page 134, that it is being built by the Government.

Now, let me take another case: here is Oswego, in New York, where $113,000 has been already appropriated to build a custom-house, and where, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, $12,000 has been paid for a job, and a contract made to build it for $77,000. There is $89,000 for which it was to have been completed, while there has been already appropriated $113,800, and they are here now asking for $10,000 more. Worse than that, at that point, after taking the postage and the revenue, the Government is annually left in debt $6,020.

Here is Cincinnati. It costs $6,437 53 to support the sailors at the hospital, while the whole income is but $2,000. They have expended there, as well as I recollect, about one hundred and thirty-six thousand dollars to build the marine hospital, and they want $50,000 more.

Here is Belfast, in Maine, where you are asking money to complete a custom-house—where the Government gets one hundred and sixty-one dollars each year, after taking the whole revenue and postage, and where they have got $18,000. Here is Ellsworth—the same over again. Now what I have to say to the gentleman from Louisiana is this: the custom-house at Oswego was contracted for to be built for $77,000, and the lot only cost $12,000. They have had $113,000 appropriated, and now they want more money to complete it. There is twenty thousand dollars odd, over and above the amount appropriated for the purpose, and yet they ask for more. I refer gentlemen, for full information on the subject, to the following tables:

‡ These estimates are such as would be asked for, judging by others for like places and purposes.

OFFICE OF CONSTRUCTION, TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 2, 1858.

A. H. BOWMAN, Engineer in Charge.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move to amend the amendment by adding a provision of $500,000 for the Treasury extension.

Mr. Chairman, I was a good deal astonished to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] who is usually very clear in his statements; and I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, a letter from Mr. Bowman, who sends up the information upon which the estimates are based.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 6, 1858.

SIR: In my annual report to you on the condition of the several buildings being erected under the Treasury Department, I had the honor to call attention to the appropriations required to be made, to carry on the works with economy—having a proper regard to the pecuniary embarrassment of the Treasury.

Since that period (September 30) the works have progressed with increased vigor, owing to the abundance and comparative cheapness of materials and labor, consequent upon the hard times. The result has been, that larger expenditures have been made than could then be anticipated. As most of the works are being done by contract, it was impossible to restrain the increased expenditures.

From this cause the unexpended balances that were expected to be available for the first two quarters of the next fiscal year are greatly reduced, and, in some instances, entirely expended. Owing to this increased vigor in prosecuting the works, many of them will be finished, if the necessary appropriations are now made, before the next meeting of Congress.

In view of these circumstances, and to avoid damages which the contractors will not fail to demand if the works are suspended, and at the same time to save the large amounts now annually paid for rent of buildings, which those in question are designed to replace, I would most respectfully recommend that Congress be requested to make the following appropriations: All designed to complete, in every particular, all the buildings named, except the custom-houses at New Orleans and Charleston, and the Treasury extension, of which latter the sum asked will finish the south, and a portion of the west wing.

I also submit other estimates in gross, accompanied by others in detail, of the amounts necessary to fence, grade, and furnish these buildings that are now completed, or that will be finished before the next meeting of Congress.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. H. BOWMAN,
Engineer in charge of Treasury Department.

HON. HOWELL COBB, Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Virginia refers to the report, he will find that the labor at New Orleans is done by the Government; but that, sir, is all that is done. The Government does not supply the materials. They contract for them; and that is one of the points which the gentleman seems to forget. He tells you that a custom-house has been built at New York for $1,000,000, and that upwards of two million dollars has been already expended at New Orleans. He tells you that the city of New York is the largest importing city in the United States; and that is true, and I am very proud of it; but he forgets to tell you at the same time that New Orleans is the largest exporting city in the United States; and that the people of New York have never complained that the custom-house is not sufficient, but are perfectly satisfied with it; whereas it became absolutely necessary to build a large custom-house at New Orleans. If too much money has been expended upon it, who is to blame? Is it the fault of the port of New Orleans, or is it the fault of the manner in which the building has been contracted for and carried on? What have this vigilant committee been about, that they have permitted money to be expended in this manner, that ought not to have been expended? The difference in the price of labor, and the difficulty of obtaining the materials necessary to carry on the work, may perhaps have made this building cost more than it ought to have done.

But the gentleman tells you that too much money has been expended at Oswego, New York. Why, what have we to do with that?—These are estimates furnished by the Treasury Department. Congress has already appropriated large sums of money for these points. The buildings are in course of erection; and are you going to stop now and throw away all you have done, and years afterwards begin again? Or will you go on and complete the works as you ought to do, and as the wants and interests of the country require you to do? It does seem to me that when the Committee of Ways and Means had these various estimates before them, they ought to have seen that upwards of two million dollars has been expended at New Orleans, and that $300,000 was necessary to carry on the work and complete the building. Why do they propose to stop the work? Because they say the Treasury is embarrassed. Why is it embarrassed? Is it because this custom-house has been improperly built or too much money has been expended upon it? If it is not, there is no just reason why the money should not be expended on it now that it is necessary to complete it. The Committee of Ways and Means have reported an appropriation of $800,000 for the Washington aqueduct, and $1,000,000 for the Capitol extension, and it seems to me that when they were doing that, they ought to have shown some respect to other sections of the country. I do not complain of these appropriations which they have recommended, for I am ready and willing at all times to vote for any sums which are estimated for by the Treasury Department; and if we have not got the money, let us borrow it and go on and complete these buildings.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman from Louisiana had better find out how I vote upon that aqueduct appropriation before he undertakes to arraign me before the House on that subject.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Your committee reported it.

Mr. LETCHER. Ah, that is another thing. But when I vote against it, as I shall do, that will be at least my justification before the country.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Louisiana has been very particular to say nothing at all about the sinking of the piles of this New Orleans custom-house, although it is to be found on page 105 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in a report from this identical gentleman, Mr. Bowman, whom he so strongly relies on. He says there:

The building still continues to settle, but with a diminished ratio, as the accompanying table shows. Whether this decreased ratio (as compared with former years, when more weight was added in a given time than has been added this year,) is due to the less weight added, or to the fact that it has reached firm ground, cannot be ascertained with accuracy.

Maximum settlement since Dec. 6, 1851,	19 339-1000 inches.
Minimum " " " "	11 29-100 "
Mean " " " "	15 67-100 "
Maximum settlement during year ending September, 1857.....	2 97-100 "
Minimum settlement during year ending September, 1857.....	75-100 "
Mean settlement during year ending September, 1857.....	1 71-100 "

Now, I put the question to the House whether, when it is reported here by the officer in charge of the construction of the building, that the building at New Orleans, on which we have expended over two million dollars, and which will require something more than two million more to complete it, is sinking, they are going on to expend that additional sum when the building is settling and sinking in such a manner as to jeopard it very much?

Mr. DAVIDSON. What are you going to do with the building?

Mr. LETCHER. If evidence is furnished to me that a house which has been begun is not going to stand, I shall quit right there, and not spend more money upon it; and when it is demonstrated to me that a house which is in process of building, is sinking under every row of stone, that is put upon its walls, I think it is time to stop and begin to ascertain the result of the expenditure.

But there is another thing in this connection. Why is it, I ask—the gentleman from Louisiana does not explain it satisfactorily to me at least—that it requires so much more to commence and prosecute the work on this custom-house at New Orleans than it took to build a custom-house at New York? The gentleman says that it is owing to the increased price of provisions and supplies. Now, mark you, it took $1,105,000 to build a custom-house at New York; and you have already spent $2,675,000 on the custom-house at New Orleans; and you are now asked for enough to make it up to $3,000,000.

Mr. DAVIDSON. It is twice as large as the New York custom-office.

Mr. LETCHER. Why should it be twice as large? If the business is not as great as that in New York, where is the necessity for a house twice the size to do it in? I apprehend there is none. Then, sir, it seems to me that, upon every fair principle, it is time that we should look into this matter.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I would ask the gentleman if he knows how much the warehouses at New York cost the Government?

Mr. LETCHER. I do not know how much they cost; but I suppose that the warehouses are not in larger number than is necessary to accommodate the goods to be stored. I suppose the gentleman does not mean to contend that the custom house at New Orleans is to supply the place of all the warehouses.

Mr. DAVIDSON. They are already in the custom-house.

Mr. LETCHER. Then it must be because there is far less trade there than there is in New York.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Look at the statistics, and you will see. I now withdraw my amendment.

Mr. EUSTIS. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I have to say, in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia in reference to the soil of Louisiana, that I am not responsible for the quality of that soil, nor for the difficulties which we have to encounter in the erection of public buildings. What the gentleman from Louisiana has complained of has happened in the erection of every public building of large dimensions in the city of New Orleans. If the gentleman will look on page 117 of the report of Captain Bowman, he will find it there stated, in reference to the marine hospital at New Orleans, that the soil was so compressible that piling was found necessary, and that piles have been driven under the whole building, sufficient, as it is believed, to secure it from danger of settling.

But, sir, this is not the first time that objections of this sort have been made. Somethirty, or forty, or fifty years ago—of course beyond my recollection—it was strongly believed that three-story buildings could not be erected in the city of New Orleans. After a while the eyes of the people were opened, and they found that buildings of three, four, and five stories could be erected.

It is true that this custom-house has settled enormously since the work was first begun; but by referring to the very tables which the gentleman has introduced, we find that within the last year it has only settled one inch, while for the previous years the average has been two inches per year; so that his arguments that the building sinks more with every new layer of stone, do not follow at all from his facts.

We might as well hold Captain Bowman, or the contractor for building the custom-house in New Orleans, responsible for the soil of Louisiana; you might as well hold me responsible for the crevasse that has lately taken place; you might as well say that because a part of our country is under water, that therefore we shall not have our custom-house completed. There is as much force, there is as much reason, there is as much logic in that proposition as in the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia.

The gentleman misunderstood me in another point. I did not say that the work for the completion of that custom-house was all under contract. When I said the work was under contract, I said it as a general remark. I made the remark because it was so stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter upon the subject, and because it was so stated in the report of Captain Bowman, who has charge of the work. And I have seen no reason whatever, in the arguments which have been made by gentlemen against this amendment, why this appropriation should not be made. If the House will consider this matter, if they will give it one minute's attention, they will find that, according to the substance of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and the communication of the engineer who has charge of the work, the Government will absolutely make money by voting these appropriations.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. EUSTIS. I will withdraw it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I object to the gentleman's withdrawing it; I wish to speak in opposition to it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I give notice to the gentleman that I shall insist on his confining himself to the amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well. In the first place I am opposed to this $500,000 for the Treasury extension, for the reason that I think the Treasury building already is capable of holding all the funds we have to put in it, or shall be likely to have for some time to come; I can therefore see no reason why we should appropriate $500,000 to complete the Treasury Department. I think it would be much better to take care of the money which we have in the old building.

And, sir, I am opposed to the original amendment, certainly, so far as the appropriation for the custom-house in Ellsworth, in the State of Maine, is concerned, where they collect $954 revenue, while the building has cost $18,000, and the cost of collecting the revenue is upwards of three thousand dollars per year.

In Portsmouth, New Hampshire, the amount collected is $5,034, while the cost of collecting it is more than ten thousand dollars per annum.

In Oswego, New York, the amount collected is $6,000 per annum, and the cost of collecting it $18,000.

In Newark, New Jersey, they collect the sum of $384, at an expenditure of $1,500.

At Galena, Illinois, the amount of revenue collected, is $763, and it requires an expenditure of $625 to collect it.

There has been already expended at Portsmouth, $116,000 for a custom-house, where they collect $5,000.

At Oswego, they have expended $113,000 for a custom-house, where they collect $6,000 per annum.

At Newark, New Jersey, they have expended $146,000 for a custom-house, at which there is collected the sum of $384 per annum.

Now, I ask with what propriety can this committee vote the amount of money which is asked for by the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana in regard to the places I have named? and with what propriety can I be called upon to vote an additional appropriation for Galena, in Illinois, when we collect there $763, and have already paid out $71,000?

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment in regard to the Treasury extension appropriation, as well as to the amendment which has been offered. And I am opposed to it for another reason, which is, that this whole question is now under investigation by the Committee of Ways and Means, and yet that committee, having more information than this committee can possibly have, are not prepared to pass upon it.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Davidson, and renewed by Mr. Eustis, and it was rejected.

Mr. GOODWIN. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana by increasing the appropriation to $400,000.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to reply very briefly to the remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] in regard to the custom-house at the port of Oswego, as those remarks are calculated to create a wrong impression in regard to the facts, and to the business of that port and that custom-house. In regard to the custom-house at that point, I will say that the contracts for the erection have been under the supervision and control of the proper officers of the Government. In regard to the making and executing of those contracts I have nothing to say, because they are not drawn into question here. I will simply remark that the money has been expended by the agents of the Government, and the propriety and necessity of the expenditure are recognized by the Department, and the building so far completed that only a few thousand dollars more is required to complete it so as to enable the Government to use it. They are now hiring a building for a custom-house and paying rent for it, while eight or ten thousand dollars would complete the custom-house in the course of erection so that it could be occupied by the Government for the purposes for which it was designed.

The gentleman from Virginia has spoken of the amount of duties received by the Government at that port. If the gentleman would go back to the years before the making of the reciprocity treaty, he would find that the revenue far exceeded then what it does at the present time; and yielded the Government a handsome income over and above all expenses. Let me tell that gentleman that the internal and coastwise trade and commerce of Oswego amounts to more than fifty million dollars annually; that it is the main point at which property and goods are imported into the United States from Canada under the treaty which allows certain articles to come in free of duty; that the work now performed at that port is greater under the provisions of that treaty in determining what goods are to be received as belonging to the free list, and in determining what are to be excluded, than it was before the formation of that treaty. As that treaty allows a large quantity of goods and property to be imported into this country from Canada free of duty, it necessarily follows that the duties collected at that port are less than before the adoption of that treaty, although the imports at that point, and the labor performed by the officers there, exceed what they did before the treaty. Therefore it is not fair, in computing the cost of the custom-house, and the salaries of the officers located at that point, to judge of them by the amount of money brought into the Treasury by way of revenue upon imports, because there are labors to be performed in regard to property and goods imported upon which no duties are to be collected. And the gentleman, in order to make out the cost to the Government of maintaining officers at that point, includes in his estimate the salaries of the very men who have to perform these duties in regard to goods upon which the Government collects no duties.

These are the facts in regard to the port of Oswego. The custom-house has been commenced and is nearly completed. It is an important point in our trade with the Canadas. Its trade with those Provinces is greater than that of all the other ports in the United States put together. Therefore it is easy to see the extent of the duties of those officers, and the amount of labor to be performed by them, and the necessity for a custom-house such as is being erected. In times past this port has yielded the Government a revenue, exceeding by hundreds of thousands of dollars the cost of its collection, and now its imports are double and its trade greater than in those times, but a large portion of the imports are not charged with duties; still, as is apparent, the labor to be performed is not diminished, but increased. The amount of its trade and commerce fully justifies this appropriation.

Mr. LETCHER. I have no desire to do any injustice to the port of Oswego, or to any other place in this country, and when I refer to the facts certified here, upon the records of the country, it seems to me that I am doing no injustice in presenting those facts to the committee, and asking them to give them that consideration to which they are entitled.

Mr. GOODWIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question just here?

Mr. LETCHER. I will.

Mr. GOODWIN. Is the gentleman not aware that the amount of revenue received at the custom-house at Oswego before the reciprocity treaty was adopted, considerably exceeded the cost of collecting the revenue at that point?

Mr. LETCHER. If the receipts did not exceed the cost of collection, all I have to say is, that the Government made a very bad bargain in erecting the custom-house. Since the reciprocity treaty was made, the revenue has run down very low, and it costs three dollars now to collect every dollar the Government gets at that port. Now, if the revenue was twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars before the reciprocity treaty went into operation, it cost $18,000 to collect it, leaving a surplus of only $12,000, while it cost $113,000 to establish a custom-house there. So that even in that point of view the Government made a very bad bargain.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask the gentleman whether the duties of the custom-house officials at that point, as well as at some other points in the country, are not rather to prevent smuggling than to collect money?

Mr. LETCHER. I should not suppose there would be much smuggling when there is a reciprocity treaty which allows goods to come in free.

Mr. GOODWIN. All goods are not admitted free.

Mr. LETCHER. If it took all these men to collect revenue when there was a full trade, it seems to me that we might reduce the number when business is slack.

Mr. HATCH. I would ask the gentleman from Virginia whether he would be willing to open the ports of the Government as a matter of economy, and abolish all the revenue districts in the Northwest?

Mr. LETCHER. I take it that the fact of refusing to build a custom-house, or of building a custom-house, has nothing to do with the policy of the Government in regard to free-trade or the collection of revenue at a port. This is a business of very recent growth. It has all sprung up since the year 1841. How did the Government collect its revenue before that time? There was no necessity then to build custom-houses. The system was begun in 1841, and has been carried on ever since. Within the last few years it has grown more extravagant and profligate, until now custom-houses are located at multitudes of points where the whole revenue collected does not pay the interest on the money expended.

Now, I say that this is bad policy. The appropriations are made to be dependent on the caprices of the members of the House, or on the influences which a log-rolling bill, embracing North and South, may bring here to aid such an operation.

Here is this amendment, which comes in with all the incomplete custom-houses and incomplete marine hospitals scattered from Galena to Florida, from the East to the West; and it does seem to me that, when they are left not to stand on the merits of each one of the propositions, but on the power and strength which the combined influences of all of them can bring to bear, it is not the sort of legislation that is calculated to promote the public interests.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. AVERY. I offer the following amendment:

For additional appropriations for a court-house and post office at the city of Memphis, Tennessee, and that the said buildings be used for a custom-house and post office, $100,000.

I will read from the report of Captain Bowman:

"Proposals have been received for lots in Memphis, from which to select a site for the building designed to be used for a post office and United States court. The sum of $50,000 was appropriated for the purchase of a site and the erection of the building. This is wholly inadequate; one of the sites offered, alone, exceeds the appropriation $25,000, and all of them are so near the amount appropriated as to leave a balance entirely too small to erect a suitable building. I would respectfully suggest that, as there are no United States courts held at Memphis, if Congress see fit to increase the amount sufficiently to purchase a site and erect the building, that they be requested to allow the rooms designed for the court to be appropriated to the use of a custom-house."

"Total amount of appropriation.....$50,000
"Amount expended to September 30, 1857.....28

"Balance available for completion of the work...$49,980"

This amendment is in conformity with the recommendation made here by Captain Bowman. At the last session of Congress $50,000 was appropriated for the erection of a court-house and post office in the city of Memphis. That was a mistake. It was intended by the members who proposed the appropriation, and by those who had any interest in the matter, that it should be for a custom-house and post office. As truly stated here by Captain Bowman in his report, there is no Federal court held in the city of Memphis. It was intended, as I say, for a custom-house and post office. This amendment is to increase the appropriation $50,000, the appropriation being, as stated officially by the gentleman in charge of the bureau, inadequate for the erection of a custom-house and post office at that place. As he states here, $50,000 would not buy the ground. In different portions of this Confederacy, where appropriations have been made to very large amounts for the erection of custom-houses and post offices, the revenue collected at those points does not begin to compare with the revenue collected at the city of Memphis. In some points the excess of expenditure over the revenue collected is a very large and extravagant amount. Now, how does Memphis, Tennessee, compare with these other places? The revenue collected at that point is $112,883 90.

Mr. EUSTIS. How much of that revenue is for railroad iron?

Mr. AVERY. I do not know. I have not looked into it.

Mr. EUSTIS. If the gentleman will examine it, he will find that much of it is for railroad iron—a mere temporary matter.

Mr. AVERY. I have not looked into the items; but I say that a very large amount of this revenue is for merchandise imported directly from foreign countries, irrespective of the railroad iron, which is really landed and subject to custom-house duties at that point. But I dare say that at a great many other of those points where the revenue collected does not equal the amount of expenditure to carry on the operations of the custom-houses, a large portion of the revenue is derived from railroad iron. In view of the appropriations that have been made at other points where the expenditure largely overruns the revenue collected, I ask that this appropriation be made for Memphis.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am opposed to the amendment, and I want to make a few remarks that will apply to all of them. The objection I have to this particular amendment is, that the work is not under contract, and is not embraced in the estimate sent in by the Secretary of the Treasury. I concur with my friend from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] in opposition to this whole system, which began five years ago. The Secretary of the Treasury did not send in the estimate until it was far on in the session, the reason being that he was determined to prosecute no public works except such as the Government had contracted for. It was in consequence of that, that the estimate now submitted by the gentleman from Louisiana did not reach the Committee of Ways and Means until within a few days past. It was presented by the Committee of Ways and Means as an amendment. I have no doubt that this Government is bound at law to pay every dollar of its obligations under contract.

I have been opposed to the whole system. I was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means six years ago when this log-rolling system commenced; and when we tried to limit the expenditure we were voted down in the House. Amendments were offered in committee by gentlemen from Louisville, Cincinnati, and St. Louis, for custom-houses and marine hospitals all over the country, beginning in Maine and running down to California, until millions were thus log-rolled in, and until the bill become almost too heavy to carry.

It was put through. But it was found that when it was left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, he adapted the buildings to the amount of money appropriated; and, in order to take it out of his power to do that, you will find, by referring to the past legislation of Congress, Congress prescribed for the Secretary the size of the buildings, and the materials to be used, so that when the Secretary came to order contracts to be made, he found that he was completely crippled, and had no discretionary power, but was obliged to make the buildings of a certain size, and of certain materials. But the money appropriated was not more than half sufficient to construct the buildings provided for, and he put up the contracts to the lowest bidders. The consequence was that some fellows got the contracts at low prices, and after living on their contracts for six months, threw them up. Well, the Secretary is bound to go on. He has no power to contract beyond the amount appropriated, and he is unable to prosecute the work until Congress makes further appropriations. Matters have continued in this way for five or six years. Under this system, the Secretary of the Treasury was obliged, during the last winter, to make contracts, and the present Secretary of the Treasury has sent in a list of estimates asking you to appropriate money, but not one single dollar more than is necessary to fulfill contracts entered into by this Government. I think it my duty to say to the committee that, unless this amount of money is appropriated, there will be failures of contracts on the part of the United States, and the parties will be entitled to claim damages at the hands of the United States.

I concur with the gentleman from Virginia that the system is all wrong; but it was commenced here in Congress years ago, and the question for the House now to determine is, whether they will complete the contracts which have been entered into by the Government or not?

I wish to add, that I oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. AVERY,] because the work which it provides for is not under contract, and has not been begun. If the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] is adopted, it should include a provision for the Treasury extension, because there is a contract for that.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KILGORE. I ask if it would be in order, pending this amendment, to move to strike out the enacting clause of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir, as we are increasing the appropriations instead of decreasing them, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe that one of the rules of the House expressly provides that every proposition touching an appropriation shall be first considered and discussed in Committee of the Whole House. There is one item in this bill of $1,000,000, and another of $800,000, not at all connected with, or dependent on, any of the propositions which have yet been under consideration; and if the motion of the gentleman from Indiana is entertained, it will be in disregard and violation of that rule which requires that every proposition touching an appropriation shall first be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The question was decided by the committee a few days since; the decision of the chairman of the committee was overruled, and it was decided to be in order to move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir, I insist upon my motion. I understand that the appropriations to which the gentleman from Tennessee has referred, are in accordance with contracts already made.

A MEMBER. So are the appropriations provided for in this amendment.

Mr. KILGORE. If contracts have been made, we ought certainly to vote the money.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to say a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Indiana is not debatable.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. It was decided to be debatable yesterday, or the day before.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken. The decision was the other way.

The question was then taken on Mr. KILGORE's motion; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. AVERY's amendment to the amendment was then rejected.

The question then recurred upon Mr. EUSTIS's amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move to amend the amendment, so as to reduce the appropriation for the custom-house at Galena, Illinois, $10,000, merely for the purpose of saying a word or two.

Mr. Chairman, the radical error into which gentlemen have fallen is in supposing that there is any valid contract in regard to these custom-houses. Now, in my judgment, there is no valid contract for the completion of any custom-house which requires the expenditure of one single dollar more than the amount already appropriated. By a simple clause in an appropriation bill, we authorize the expenditure of $50,000 for the construction of a custom-house. In my judgment, the executive officers having no right to make any contract to expend a single dollar more than the sum thus appropriated; when they do so, they violate the law; because, if they can make a contract for $100,000, when only $50,000 has been appropriated by Congress, there is no restraint on the power of the Executive over the expenditure of the Government. In my opinion, any contract for the expenditure of a dollar more than the amount appropriated is illegal, null, and void. We appropriated $50,000 for the construction of a custom-house at Galena. If the Department has gone to work and agreed to pay $60,000 for the construction of that custom-house, they have violated the law, and it is time the House of Representatives interfered to put a stop to these things. When we appropriate a given sum for a particular purpose, we simply authorize the executive officer to contract to that extent and no more; and when he goes one dollar beyond that there is no contract.

Gentlemen need not tell us that outstanding contracts require further appropriations, when there can be no legal outstanding contracts. There has been no law authorizing the construction of the Washington aqueduct, except a simple appropriation, made at the heel of the last session of Congress, authorizing the expenditure of $1,000,000 for the construction of the work; and yet I understand that, under that clause, the Department have gone to work, and made contracts which will involve an expenditure of $5,000,000! Now, under what authority of law are these things done? If they are legal and binding on the Government, then this House of Representatives is weaker, as respects the control over the expenditures of the Government, than the head of any bureau. I say, then, that if contracts have been made beyond the amounts appropriated by Congress, they are illegal, and I would punish the officers who made them.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I shall correct the gentleman in this particular: there has not been a single contract made except in accordance with law. The Secretary of the Treasury has not made a single contract that is not in accordance with law.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Captain Bowman says, in the paper before us, that the increased estimates of expenses are based upon outstanding contracts. Now, sir, if these contracts were made for sums of money exceeding the appropriations made, the contracts were made in violation of law; and it is time that the Representatives of the people should put a stop to such proceedings. Otherwise they will have no control over the disbursement of money upon the part of the executive officers.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I shall not occupy more than half the time allotted to me, under the rules, to oppose the amendment. I merely wish to look at some of the statements made by the gentleman from Ohio. I stated when I was up before, and I now say, in simple justice to the Treasury Department, that they have never made any contract whatever in which they have gone beyond the limitations of law. Every contract they have made has been made in accordance with some proviso contained in the bill making the appropriations—a proviso, for instance, that the building shall be completed for a certain amount of money.

There are some cases where an increased expenditure has been caused by the discovery of a quicksand, as in the case of Galena, of Cincinnati, and of New Orleans, where the Secretary of the Treasury has purchased the lot, as directed, and made a contract for the work. But after the expenditure of fifty or one hundred thousand dollars it is discovered that there is a quicksand, causing increased expenditure, which no human foresight could possibly have anticipated. What does the Secretary do? He suspends the work, and reports the facts to Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I wish to know whether there are quicksands under all these buildings?

Mr. HOUSTON. There are quicksands under the Treasury building. [Laughter.]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. No, sir. I believe the bottom of that building is entire.

Mr. LEITER. Yes, sir, there are quicksands under them all. There are quicksands under the whole Government. The Administration stands on a quicksand. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I move to increase the sum contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, for Plattsburg, $10,000.

Now, sir, I say to the gentleman from Georgia that if he had referred to the statistics, he would have found that the revenue collected at Plattsburg largely exceeded the expense of collection, even after the reciprocity treaty had nearly destroyed the revenue at that port.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman will recollect that I did not move to strike out Plattsburg.

Mr. PALMER. I am aware that the gentleman did not. But, sir, a misapprehension seems to prevail in this House that these buildings are designed exclusively for custom-house purposes. Not so. The building at Plattsburg not only accommodates the custom-house, but it furnishes a court-room, where the sessions of the United States courts are held, which accommodate nearly one half the State of New York; and not only these, but the post office for a large town. But, sir, the revenue collected at that custom-house exceeds the expenses by many thousand dollars; and there are a large number of foreign boats passing through that custom-house to the city of New York, and other points. The appropriations for these custom-houses, it seems to me, are far less objectionable than many reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, of which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER,] is a member; which are much more objectionable to the people of the country, though they may not be to the gentleman from Virginia.

I find appropriations here for building bridges across the Potomac. I find an appropriation of $5,000 for putting boxes around trees. I find an appropriation of $12,000 to purchase furniture for the President's house, in these hard times; and many other items of that kind which, in my judgment, ought to meet the condemnation of the Representatives of the people as much, at least, as a small appropriation of $10,000 for the purpose of completing a building for the purpose of holding the sessions of the United States courts, and for furnishing accommodations for the post office, as well as accommodations for collecting the revenue, especially when that building is almost completed, and only wants the small appropriation of $10,000 to complete it. The Secretary of the Treasury himself recommends this appropriation as necessary. It is recommended by the officer in charge of the work; and it is necessary in order to preserve the work which has been already done. I have heard no valid objection raised against it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What is the amount of revenue collected at Plattsburg?

Mr. LETCHER. I will tell the gentleman.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand it is only $3,000.

Mr. LETCHER. It seems that this amendment has awakened a considerable interest all around the House. It seems to be broad enough to cover a large part of the United States, as we see by the remarks of various gentlemen around us. Now, the gentleman comes forward and says that this building in Plattsburg is for the accommodation of a custom-house, court-house, and post office, where they collect a very considerable amount of revenue for the Government of the United States. Now, let us see. Seventeen thousand seven hundred and ninety-two dollars and fifty-two cents is the amount derived from customs; and $13,829 85 it costs to collect it. The post office yields $2,251 89; and it costs $1,141 60 to collect it. The whole amount derived from customs and from postages at that point, is $5,073 46. And how much money have they got for the construction of their custom-house, post office, and court-house? Sixty-six thousand dollars already. They now come here and ask for $10,000 more, making $76,000; so that it seems to me, after all, considering the expenses which have been incurred, and the amount of revenue collected, it has been rather an unprofitable outlay, and they could have got along very well there without a custom-house at so enormous an expenditure of the public means.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. LETCHER. For a moment.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I wish to suggest to my friend from Virginia that he should not direct his remarks in so loud a tone in the direction of the other side of the House, for I feel very much concern for fear that he will arouse from his quiet and peaceful slumbers that patriotic and vigilant Representative, his colleague, [Mr. CLEMENS,] who, a few nights since, on a call of the House, expressed an earnest desire that gentlemen upon this floor would be ever found following the example he sets of constant attendance and strict discharge of duty. [Great laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. One word more. A good deal has been said about the contracts which have been made by the Treasury Department in connection with these buildings. Now, I will tell my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] where he will find the entire information, which will show where contracts have been made for the entire construction, or for the construction in part, or where the Government is building a house in connection with the supplies purchased by contract. And I here take this occasion to say, that there are no contracts which have not been reported by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report upon the finances. So I was informed by him yesterday morning, and I thought the fact should be known, that he might not be held liable for contracts beyond his province.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to know of the gentleman whether the Executive Department has not made contracts in anticipation of appropriations?

Mr. LETCHER. I do not know. I was told yesterday morning that this table would furnish a statement of all the contracts.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. If contracts have not been so made, why is it that we are told by Mr. Bowman that these increased appropriations are necessary to meet contracts?

Mr. LETCHER. I do not know why it is so; but I went to the office yesterday morning, for I thought it remarkable that the Secretary of the Treasury should make a report stating the date of the appropriation, the date of the purchase of the lot, the date of the contract, and the date of the completion of the contract, if the fact was not as reported to this House; and upon inquiring there I was informed the matter is as I have stated it.

The question recurring upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York—

Mr. PALMER, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MILES. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, so as to appropriate $301,000 for the custom-house at Charleston, instead of $300,000. I desire to say a word or two in reference to this particular custom-house, because I think it really appeals somewhat to the common sense of the House, and I wish to make a few common-sense remarks upon it.

We have undertaken, whether wisely or not, to build a very costly custom-house in the city of Charleston. It may have been bad policy to build so expensive a structure. I do not hesitate to say that I would be willing to see all custom-houses abolished from one end of the country to the other, and the system of direct taxation resorted to as a means of raising revenue to carry on the Government. But that is not now under consideration. Congress, sir, has determined, however, to build a fine custom-house at Charleston. Are we now prepared to abandon this determination? In our southern climate the suspension of operations on a work already commenced, is to injure the work already done, very materially. In a small city like Charleston, with a population of not more than sixty thousand inhabitants, the bringing together of a body of workmen of the requisite skill, is a matter of time. It cannot be done instantaneously or rapidly. If you dismiss them after they are collected, all at once, it will cost a vast deal more hereafter to reorganize your force of artisans, and go on with the work.

And besides that, I contend that this is a matter of contract. It may be, as my friend from Virginia contends, that the carrying on of the work is a Government operation, and not a work under contract. But the most costly portion of the work, the quarrying of the marble, is under contract. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, alluding to the progress of the work upon the new custom-house in Charleston, says:

"The building is very large, and as none but the very best quality of marble is received, it tasks all the quarries furnishing the right description of marble to their utmost capacity to supply it as fast as it could be worked into the building."

In quarrying marble for such a building, the blocks taken from the quarry must be used for the part of the building for which they are best suited, without regard to what part of the building it may be. When a block is taken from the quarry suitable for a capital, architrave, window-jamb, door-jamb, &c., (all difficult stones to get,) it is cut for that purpose, though it may not be required until near the completion of the building. In this way, although the structure is not raised as high as it was hoped it would be at this time, yet a very large amount of the most difficult and expensive part of the marble is on hand, ready to be put up at the proper time."

Now, sir, I assert, from my individual knowledge, that the space around that new building in process of construction is absolutely incumbered with blocks of delicately sculptured marble, which lie exposed to the weather and accidental injury. They lie there because we are obliged to work them in as they are needed, and not as they come to hand. If you suspend the work, the contract for supplying the stone still goes on, and you keep accumulating a costly mass of worked stone; you accumulate the interest upon the money spent in quarrying and carving it, and you run the risk of being prosecuted for damages by the contractors for furnishing the stone; and at the same time the work is suffering positive injury from exposure to the weather.

I trust that the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, known himself to be in favor of strict economy, which he has exhibited again and again, and that the statement of Captain Bowman, one of the most accurate and able of our engineers, will be sufficient, together with the practical views I have presented, to induce this House to vote this appropriation. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GARNETT. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, to come in at the end:

Provided, That no part of the appropriation hereby made for any building shall be expended until such plans are adopted and contracts made as will insure the completion and furnishing such building within the amount appropriated.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Do I understand the gentleman to offer his amendment in good faith?

Mr. GARNETT. I offer this amendment with no design of withdrawing it, because I really think that it is right, and I desire that it shall pass. Neither do I offer it with any desire of embarrassing the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana. I did not rise to oppose his amendment, or to make any comments either for or against it. But I wish to say, that when these custom-houses were undertaken, we had a full Treasury, and a condition of great prosperity throughout the country. There is no doubt that large revenues induced us—as large revenues will always operate on individuals or Governments—to undertake many things which we otherwise would not have dreamed of. It induced us to undertake buildings on a scale of extravagance which is rarely equaled, and which the country would not tolerate had the operations commenced in the present condition of the Treasury and the country. I think that the country is generally of opinion that we have undertaken too many of these custom-houses. I think that the country generally is of opinion that those which we have undertaken have been built upon a scale altogether too extravagant, unnecessarily large, and unnecessarily fine. They have been like this Capitol itself. I have heard a gentleman say, who had seen all the best buildings in Europe, that he never saw a building carried on on the same scale of costliness and magnitude.

But, custom-houses are built for business. They are the workshops, if I may so express myself, of the revenue system of the Government, and while they ought to be built substantially, while they ought to be built with some regard to architectural proportions and elegance, yet they should not be built extravagantly. They ought to be confined within a reasonable sum. I do not undertake to say whether the precise sums proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana are the right sums or not. He is at liberty to change them, if he thinks they are not large enough. But I do say there ought to be an end of this thing, there ought to be a finality, somewhere, and whatever is appropriated ought to be appropriated with the understanding that that is to be the last of them; that Congress is not to be continually applied to, session after session, now under the form of a general appropriation bill, then under the form of a deficiency bill, but always with new estimates, new appropriations asked for, and new appropriations granted.

We ought to know once for all where this thing is going to end. We ought to put a stop to it, and not permit your Departments, if they have done so, (I do not undertake to say they have) to go on making contracts beyond the appropriations; or if they have not done so, then we ought to rid ourselves at once of these implied contracts, which the gentleman from South Carolina has just alluded to. I should think that it would be agreeable to the financial officers of the Government, agreeable to the Secretary of the Treasury himself, who has the burden on his shoulders of making one dollar do the work of two; agreeable to all those gentlemen to know at once how much we wish spent on these marine hospitals and custom-houses, so that they can go on understandingly, and have them completed for what we are willing to spend upon them. It ought to be equally agreeable to the friends of the custom-houses, (and I believe no gentleman has spoken in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, who has not a custom-house in his own district) that they should receive enough once for all to complete the works.

Mr. LETCHER. This amendment is not to complete the custom-houses at Charleston or New Orleans. It will probably take a million and a half of dollars for New Orleans, and how much for Charleston I do not know.

Mr. GARNETT. I am as much in favor of spending money for the benefit of New Orleans or Charleston as of anywhere else; but when I am told that New Orleans has had already $2,000,000 for a custom-house, I think that this $300,000 ought to complete it, and the same for Charleston; and if those sums will not do for finishing them on the original plan, then, I say, let some plan be adopted which will insure their completion for these sums.

Mr. EUSTIS. I would remark that with the exception of the Treasury extension, the custom-house at New Orleans, and the custom-house at Charleston, every dollar in the bill is appropriated for the purpose of effecting the very object which the gentleman has in view.

Mr. GARNETT. Exactly so; but what is to prevent them coming in next year and telling us that this money appropriated for completing the works was not quite enough for completing them, and asking an additional sum of ten or fifteen or twenty thousand dollars? Experience proves to us that this will be done. I want to prevent it. I want once for all to have the total expenditures fixed. I am exceedingly glad, whenever I can do so, to vote for money to be expended in the southern States, because I do not think that they have had a fair share of appropriations from this Government.

Mr. MILES. I agree with my friend from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] in his general proposition; but I cannot agree with him in saying that after we have commenced costly buildings we should abandon them, because we think they might have been constructed on a more economical and less portentous scale. Now, as I said before, when I had the honor of making a few remarks to the committee, I am not discussing the policy of putting up a costly custom-house; but I do say, that if you have commenced a costly building and have made great progress in its construction, you should finish it, and not throw away the money you have expended. Certainly that is a practical common-sense view of it. But I desire to say to my friend from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] who, with so keen a scent, and with such undying and determined pertinacity, opposes the expenditure of every dollar which he thinks is not absolutely required by the most pressing necessity—I would say to him that in a pecuniary point of view he ought to let this amendment go. With regard to my own city, I would say, that if the expenditure for the custom-house reached the entire amount which has been indicated of $3,000,000, the interest on that money will not be the half of the income that is collected at the port of Charleston.

But these are not arguments which I would desire to dwell upon in urging these matters on the committee. I think that a great country like this, with such wealth, such power, such dignity in the eyes of the world, should, whenever she does anything, whether it be the erection of a custom-house or the building of a navy, or the organization of an army, do it on a scale suitable to her dignity, consonant with her wealth, and indicative of her power; and, in that point of view, I would desire to see all her public buildings models of architectural beauty, and even of grandeur, where grandeur would be appropriate to their destined use.

Mr. LETCHER. My friend will allow me to make a suggestion at this point. He says he would like to have them built with due regard to architectural taste; I should like, in addition to that, that the Government should look to the length of its purse.

Mr. MILES. Do I understand my friend to intimate that the country is bankrupt? Really, from the manner in which the members of the Committee of Ways and Means and other gentlemen who are known as the especial guardians of the Treasury seem to shake in their shoes whenever an appropriation to complete a custom-house is made, one would really suppose that the country was quivering on the brink of ruin.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, if the Government is not bankrupt, it finds it very hard to borrow money.

Mr. MILES. Sir, the city of Charleston, from which I come, raises, by taxing its citizens, within a small fraction of $600,000 a year; and this whole amendment, about which we have been wrangling and talking and debating for so long a time, appropriates in all, taking in the Treasury extension, $1,700,000. Are we to be told that twelve hundred thousand or two millions of money is such an enormous sum to the Government of the United States as to provoke gentlemen to get up and make the strongest and warmest appeals to the patriotism and principles of members of the House, to prevent its appropriation to carry on works the most just and necessary, and to which the faith of the country is already pledged? Sir, I cannot so regard it. I look upon the amounts called for in the report of the Secretary as moderate and reasonable amounts for this Government to expend for the purposes indicated.

The question being upon Mr. GARNETT's amendment to the amendment,

Mr. LETCHER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON and KELLY were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—aye, sixty-four, noes not counted.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I appeal to the gentleman from New York to withdraw that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. It was the understanding that the committee should take a recess this afternoon.

Mr. HATCH. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I promised that I would move that the committee take a recess until half past seven o'clock. It is now a quarter to five, and we are not half through this bill. Tomorrow the report of the Fort Snelling investigating committee is the special order. Two days have been set apart for the business of the District of Columbia. There are also privileged contested election cases to come up. This is Tuesday. Friday and Saturday will be appropriated to the Private Calendar. Now, I wish to notify the committee that it will be utterly impossible to pass the appropriation bills by the 7th of June, unless more time is devoted to them. I can pass three bills to-day if the committee will give their attention to them.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Well, let us do it.

[Cries of "Agreed!"]

Mr. GREENWOOD. I want to make a suggestion with a view to facilitate business. I am satisfied from what I have seen exhibited in the House, both to-day and at former sessions of Congress, that an amendment like that of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] is almost certain to prevail. I take it for granted that it is the sense of a majority of the committee now to vote that amendment into the bill. I therefore propose that we should at once take the vote upon that amendment as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT.] When we have disposed of it, I think there will be no difficulty in proceeding with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask for a division of the amendment, so that we may have a separate vote on the various items embraced in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that a division of the amendment is not in order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EUSTIS. I object, then. I have offered the amendment as a whole.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Do I understand that we have to vote upon these appropriations in a batch?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes; you must swallow them all at once.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to divide the amendment.

Mr. STANTON. I think the decision of the Chair is wrong. There are sundry appropriations, and they are capable of being divided. I think we have a right to a separate vote on each.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that, in Committee of the Whole, the amendment, being offered as a single amendment, cannot be divided. It might, perhaps, be done in the House.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask for tellers on the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, as amended.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KEITT, and WASHBURNE of Illinois, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I offer the following amendment:

To assure the safety of passengers and vessels navigating the Missouri, Mississippi, and Ohio rivers respectively, by removing snags and sawyers from the channels of said rivers, the sum of $300,000 is hereby appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a point of order. This amendment is not authorized by law, and I submit that it is not in order.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If there is a law for saving life by life-boats, it is certainly in accordance with law to make provisions for saving life on those rivers.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order having been raised, the Chair decides the amendment to be out of order, believing that there is no authority of law for the appropriation.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" was taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I move the following as an amendment, to come in after the last amendment:

For the purchase of life-boats, to be used on Lake Michigan, in the State of Wisconsin, $1,000.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a point of order. There is no law allowing that appropriation, and I submit that it is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Chair thinks there is no law authorizing the appropriation.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I am told that there is a law providing for life-boats on that coast. Life-boats have been furnished, and there are some of them there now. It is in accordance with the usage of the Government to provide them; and I think the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman take an appeal?

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Yes, sir; I will take an appeal.

The question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I desire to make a verbal amendment in the amendment which has already been adopted—to insert, after the words "life-boats," the words "or other life apparatus," so that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not be confined to life-boats exclusively in expending the appropriation.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. WHITELEY. I move the following amendment, to be inserted between lines one hundred and thirty-three and one hundred and thirty-four:

And for the purchase of two thousand models of American fruits, executed by Townsend Glover, and the matrices for multiplying the same, for the use of the Patent Office, $10,000.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the amendment out of order, there being no law authorizing the purchase.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to strike out lines one hundred and thirty to one hundred and thirty-three, inclusive, as follows:

"For collection of agricultural statistics, investigations for promoting agriculture and rural economy, and the procurement and distribution of cuttings and seeds, $60,000."

I make the motion because I believe this whole matter is a humbug. I believe that the seeds sent from the Patent Office, in the main, are seeds of the most common description gathered in our own country. They are to be found in most every seed store in our cities and larger villages. When distributed to us, they are not distributed with reference to their adaptation to our particular climate. The distribution is made upon no system that is intelligible. I do not know how it may be as to other portions of the country, but I know that those which have been sent to the portion of country I represent have been, with one or two exceptions, of little or no value; and they can be procured by the citizens probably at less cost, and certainly in a fairer manner, than they are procured through their Representatives here. So far as I am concerned, I would like to dispense with all of them.

We make annual appropriations for these conservatories in front of the Capitol. I believe they are carrying on there by specific appropriations some investigations in regard to agriculture. That may be well enough. But this gathering up into the hands of men in the Patent Office, all the flower-seeds, all the morning-glories, all the most common flower-seeds, French poppies, sun-flowers, tomato seeds, and turnip seeds, and distributing them throughout the country, and this printing, as a part of the Patent Office report, somebody's reflection as to the different manners in which they plant this particular seed, and the different cultures they give to them, is all a humbug and ought to be stopped; and for that reason I have moved to strike out this clause of the bill.

Mr. WHITELEY. I differ entirely with the gentleman from Kentucky, and I think the House, and I know the country, will differ from his views in relation to this matter. It is no humbug. It may be true that some seeds are sent to some gentlemen which cannot be grown in their particular section of country. But gentlemen must recollect that the distribution through members of Congress is the smallest part of the distribution of seeds and plants from the Patent Office. It is a well-known fact that the agricultural interest of this country is the greatest interest in it; and this paltry sum of $60,000 is all that interest receives at the hands of the Government.

Mr. CLAY. There is also the Patent Office report.

Mr. WHITELEY. Yes; and the Patent Office report. It may be that many varieties of seeds are useless for certain localities; but this amount of money is not asked for the distribution of seeds alone; but also for the dissemination of information upon the subject of agriculture; which, I think, no man here or elsewhere will say is useless. It is true, sir, that so far as I am individually concerned, I would be willing that members of Congress should be saved the trouble of distribution; and I will vote now or at any other time, that this distribution shall be made by the Patent Office alone. But that great benefit results from this appropriation, I do not think any man who gives attention to the subject, will deny. The appropriation, as I have said, is small—one of the smallest in the bill. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move that the committee now take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it the object of the motion to go on with this bill to-night?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. It is.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I object to it.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ought, in good faith to the committee, to say that I stated that if the committee desired to rise, I would move to take a recess until half past seven o'clock, when no business should be transacted, except to adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee, and not the Chair, must decide that question.

The question recurring upon the motion that the committee rise,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and CHAFFEE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 32, noes 88.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move that the committee take a recess till half past seven o'clock, p. m.

A division was called for.

Mr. KEITT. The motion is with the understanding that no business is to be transacted.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can, by unanimous consent, come to such a conclusion.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I understand the proposition to be that the committee shall take a recess until half past seven o'clock, with the understanding that no business is to be transacted, and no motion made, except that the committee rise.

Mr. KEITT. I shall vote very cheerfully for that, as it is very clear that the House will do no more business this evening.

Mr. McQUEEN. I desire to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the printing of all speeches and gas let off in the evening sessions, after a recess shall be taken, shall be paid for by the member or members making such speeches out of their own funds.

The CHAIRMAN. The resolution is not in order. The question is on the motion to take a recess.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the last vote taken.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If there is no business to be done I object to a recess.

Mr. FLORENCE. I submit the point of order, that without unanimous consent no such motion can be entertained in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from New York for a recess is in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The question has been put, and a division has been asked.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the question: The committee was dividing on the question, Shall the committee take a recess until half past seven o'clock?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GROW. I submit that the motion is not in order. It is the last question on which we voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is now dividing. The Chair has put the question on one side, and is waiting to put it on the other.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to submit a question of order to the Chair. If we were in the House, a motion to take a recess could not be entertained without unanimous consent, and if objection was made, a motion to suspend the rules would not be in order to-day. Now, this committee cannot do what the House cannot do, and therefore the committee cannot entertain a proposition to take a recess.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I appeal to my friend from Tennessee to withdraw his point of order and allow gentlemen to have a recess. There can be no harm in it. I understand that it is not proposed that any vote shall be taken after the recess; and why not allow gentleman who have speeches to deliver, to come here and deliver them this evening, so as not to consume time which would otherwise be devoted to business.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, entertaining the motion for a recess.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask for tellers on the appeal.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I wish to know whether, if a recess is now taken, the consideration of this bill will not be resumed when the committee re-assembles, and whether it would be in order to discuss anything but amendments to this bill under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not undertake to decide those questions until they arise.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I merely ask the question in order to show that no practical good can result from a recess.

Mr. QUITMAN. I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee, that the committee has no power to take a recess unless the House has granted it liberty so to do, and that the committee has no right to originate a new order of business.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Has not the debate been closed upon this bill, and if the committee take a recess, will not the debate be limited to five minutes' discussion of amendments to this bill?

Several MEMBERS. Of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide that question when it arises. The Chair entertains the motion for a recess, because the Chair is not willing to overrule the former practice of the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There has been no such practice.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is stating what he understands to have been the practice of the committee. The gentleman from Tennessee appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Perhaps we can arrange this matter by a compromise. If the motion for a recess be withdrawn, will it not be conceded by all gentlemen here that, by unanimous consent, we will take a recess until half past seven o'clock, with the understanding that no business shall be done?

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I will withdraw the motion, if that will be the unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The motion for a recess is withdrawn, and the appeal falls with it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the motion of the gentleman from New York withdrawn?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand so.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The proposition to withdraw the motion was conditional.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BLISS. That motion is not in order.

Mr. GROW. I submit that that was the last question voted on by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has taken an appeal from the decision of the Chair since the motion was voted on, and business has intervened.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I withdraw the motion to take a recess.

The question was taken on Mr. SMITH's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly a bill (H. R. No. 200) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1859, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. RUFFIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, taken up and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. RUFFIN. I hope the motion to adjourn will now be put.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the yeas and nays upon that motion.

PAYMENT OF WITNESSES.

Mr. HOUSTON. I presume my friend from North Carolina will allow me to ask the House to pass a bill appropriating $12,000 to pay witnesses who are attending here before committees of the House.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to anything out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman cannot certainly wish to keep the witnesses here without their pay?

Mr. MORGAN. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RUFFIN. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I renew it.

Mr. MORGAN. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bowie, Branch, Bryan, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, John Cochran, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Eustis, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Huyler, Jackson, George W. Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Milson, Isaac N. Morris, Nicklack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phillips, Quitman, Reagan, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Underwood, Watkins, Whiteley, Winslow, Wood, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bingham, Bliss, Burlingame, Burlingame, Burns, Case, Chaffee, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Colfax, Comins, Cragin, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Daves, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Foster, Garnett, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodin, Goodwin, Grow, Thomas L. Harris, Hoard, Houston, Howard, Hughes, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Knapp, Lovejoy, Mattoon, Miles, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Sandidge, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, and Wilson—74.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 19, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. SMITH PYNE, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

The VICE PRESIDENT, in accordance with the order of yesterday authorizing the Vice President to fill the vacancy in the Committee on the Judiciary occasioned by the resignation of Mr. TOOMBS, appointed Mr. SEBASTIAN.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting copies of all correspondence, vouchers, and other papers, having reference to the accounts of Edward F. Beale, Esq., late superintendent of Indian affairs in California, which are on file or record in the Departments of the Treasury and Interior; which, on motion of Mr. GWIN, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the present condition of the finances of the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented resolutions of the Legislature of New York, against the enactment of any law which may remove the charge of the light-house system from the custody of the present board; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of New York, in favor of the Pacific railroad bill, introduced by the Hon. JOHN S. PHELPS, of Missouri, in the House of Representatives; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that a pension may be granted to Polly Egbertson, widow of a soldier in the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GREEN presented two petitions of citizens of Missouri, remonstrating against any change in the application of the proceeds of the lands granted to Iowa for the improvement of the Des Moines river; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BIGLER presented a memorial of presidents of marine insurance companies, composing the board of marine underwriters of Philadelphia, praying that an appropriation may be made for the construction of a breakwater on Crow shoal, in the Delaware bay; which was ordered to lie on the table, for the reason that the Committee on Commerce have passed upon the subject.

Mr. IVERSON presented a memorial of R. C. Jones, a master in the Navy, who was placed on the furlough list by the late board of naval officers, and subsequently transferred to the leave-of-absence pay on the reserved list, praying to be allowed the difference between furlough pay and that of leave of absence; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of Charles M. Perry, praying compensation for services as a clerk in the office of the Treasurer of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHIELDS presented a petition of William B. Herrick, a surgeon in the Army during the war with Mexico, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. POLK presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms or lots of limited size for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Yesterday, on my motion, the memorial of T. P. Shaffner, in regard to the oceanic telegraph, was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Other papers relating to the same subject have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and I move that the Post Office Committee be discharged from the further consideration of this memorial, and that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of the trustees of the Columbian College, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred two petitions of citizens of Maine in relation to the boundary line between the United States and the Province of New Brunswick, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Bromberg, submitted an adverse report.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Cynthia Cony, reported adversely thereon, and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mary E. Larnard, reported adversely thereon, and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, relative to the purchase of Lime Point, in California, for military purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to. It appears that the Secretary of War has suspended all negotiations for the purchase of Lime Point, and ordered all the papers to be returned to the Department.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the papers relating to the claim of J. M. Pommars, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of George M. Weston, commissioner of the State of Maine, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 380) to provide for the payment of the claims of the State of Maine for expenses incurred by that State in organizing a regiment of volunteers for the Mexican war. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 272) for the relief of Brevet Major H. L. Hendrick, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 225) to increase the pension of John Richmond, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment:

A bill (H. R. No. 214) for the relief of Regis Loisel, or his legal representatives.

A bill (H. R. No. 250) for the relief of Pierre Gagnon, of Natchitoches, Louisiana.

A bill (H. R. No. 327) for the relief of the legal representatives of Marie Malines.

A bill (S. No. 317) for the relief of Thomas L. Disharoon.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the subject, reported a bill (S. No. 381) to provide for the taking of private property for public use after allowing just compensation therefor; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred a number of resolutions on that subject, reported a bill (S. No. 382) to amend the existing laws relative to the compensation of the district attorneys, marshals, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 318) for the relief of Joseph Bard & Co., J. Caulfield, and Joseph Landis & Co., asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; which was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. There has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary an omnibus presentment from the grand jury of the United States for the northern district of Florida, recommending an increase of the salary of the judge of that district; an increase of the compensation of jurors, witnesses, and officers of the courts for that district; complaining of the irregularities of the mails throughout that State; recommending that the mail service between Savannah and Florida be changed to tri-weekly service; recommending that certain lots in St. Augustine, reserved for a marine barracks, be granted to the State for a seminary of learning; recommending the preservation of the ancient Spanish fort in that State, the construction of a prison, and the repair of the court-house in St. Augustine; and complaining of the negligence of the Government timber agent in that State. The Committee on the Judiciary make an adverse report on this presentment, so far as it relates to the subject of the salaries of the judge and other officers, and the repairing of the court-house; and ask to be discharged from the remainder of the presentment.

Mr. BAYARD. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of George Chorpennig, praying the passage of an act to construe the act of March 3, 1857, for his relief, and also the joint resolution (S. No. 36) on the same subject, have instructed me to ask that they be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, having no connection whatever with the action of the Judiciary Committee. I will state, in connection with it, the views the committee take: that it would neither be wise nor expedient that a construction which has been given to laws by the executive department of the judiciary should be revised by the Committee on the Judiciary. The law itself, if it does not carry out the intention of Congress, from any cause whatever, ought, of course, to demand further legislation. Whether that further legislation should take place, is the subject of inquiry, and ought to be the subject of inquiry by the committee that has jurisdiction over the subject-matter itself. It is on that ground that we ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of George Chorpennig, to submit an adverse report. In this connection, I will say that the claim, as presented, has one feature in it—that of a claim under the intercourse law—which the committee have reported against; but in the memorial and statement of facts in the documents, there is another claim, as a mail contractor, which ought to be considered by the Post Office Committee. The Committee on Indian Affairs, without expressing any opinion on that branch of the subject, choose to recommend that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFENSE OF LIEUTENANT ANDERSON.

Mr. CLAY. On the day before yesterday I offered a resolution calling for information from the Department of War in respect to the claim of Blocker, Gurley, and Davis, against the Government. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] objected at the time to its consideration. I understand that he will not now object to the consideration of the resolution, and I hope it will be taken up and passed.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate the papers filed in the Department in support of the claims of Blocker and Gurley, and James F. Davis, counsel employed in the defense of Lieutenant Anderson and his detachment, arrested by the civil authorities of Texas while in the discharge of their official duties under the orders of General Harney.

The resolution was agreed to.

POST OFFICE DELIVERIES.

Mr. KING. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire whether the Post Office laws authorize a postmaster to refuse to deliver letters to a person authorized to receive them by the persons to whom the letters are addressed, and whether any legislation is required on this subject, and to report by bill or otherwise.

I offer this resolution, having conferred with the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, who preferred that it shall lie over, to which I have no objection. It is offered on account of complaints which have been made of a refusal to deliver letters at the post office at Brooklyn, New York.

The resolution lies over.

WILLIAM WALKER'S ARREST.

Mr. DOOLITTLE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all correspondence, instructions, and orders, not heretofore communicated to either branch of Congress, connected with the arrest of William Walker and his associates by the naval forces under the command of Commodore Paulding, including all the correspondence between him and the Navy Department since the arrest of Walker in relation thereto, or in relation to the property or persons seized by the forces under his command, and including also copies of any letters, orders, or instructions, if any, addressed to Commodore Paulding, which may have been subsequently withdrawn from him by the Navy Department, and the reasons for such withdrawal.

ISTHMUS OF TEHUANTEPEC.

Mr. PUGH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether any efforts have been made or authorized by the executive department or any officer thereof, to induce the Government of Mexico to annul or impair the grant of February 5, 1853, for the construction of a plank road and railroad across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, as recognized in the treaty published at Washington on the 30th of June, 1854, and to obtain a new grant of the same or like character, for other parties; and, if so, that he communicate the names of those parties together with the terms, conditions, and considerations of the grant, and all the correspondence connected therewith. Also, that the President be requested to inform the Senate whether any contract for transporting the mails, troops, or munitions of war of the United States, across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, has been made, or is now in course of negotiation; and, if so, that he communicate a copy of such contract or proposition, with all the correspondence and papers relating to that subject.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (S. No. 378) to enable the Columbian College, in the District of Columbia, to found and establish a professorship of agriculture and mechanical science, and to complete her endowment fund, and for the benefit of the public schools of Washington, District of Columbia.

A bill (S. No. 379) to enable the Columbian College, in the District of Columbia, to establish a professorship of agriculture and mechanical science, and to complete her endowment fund, and for the benefit of the public schools of Washington, District of Columbia.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. HENRY, his Secretary, announced that the President this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be surveyed the tract of land in the Territory of Minnesota belonging to the half-breeds or mixed bloods of the Dacotah or Sioux nation of Indians, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1854.

An act to provide for the collection and safe-keeping of the public archives in the State of California.

An act for the prevention and punishment of frauds in land titles in California.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

On motion of Mr. IVERSON, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by him some days since:

Resolved, That after to-day, and for the remainder of the session, the special order shall not be taken up until the hour of one o'clock, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Mr. IVERSON. I think it must be obvious to the Senate that it is impossible to do any other business, except the appropriation bills, unless we devote two hours every day to the consideration of morning business. I think one o'clock is quite early enough to take up the special order. For the rest of the session it is probable that the reading of the Journal itself will at least occupy half an hour every morning. The Journal becomes larger and longer as the session advances to its close. Then petitions will be presented as they are now being presented very numerous, and also reports from committees. As the session comes to a close, the committees are reporting cases in their charge, and it will take up another half hour to make reports; and there are resolutions to be offered during the morning hour which must necessarily consume a portion of the time, so that one hour will not be sufficient even to read the Journal and transact the ordinary morning business. I propose to amend this resolution so as to incorporate the following:

And that, after the presentation of petitions, reports from committees, and resolutions, the remainder of the two morning hours shall be devoted, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, to the consideration of such bills upon the Private Calendar as shall not give rise to debate, until the Private Calendar shall be gone through with.

I suppose it will not take more than one or two mornings to consider the Private Calendar in that way. Then we can take up cases that are objected to, or any other business the Senate may think proper to transact. It is important to get off the docket the cases to which there is no objection. Doubtless there are many which are so meritorious that nobody will object to them. Let those bills be passed and go to the House of Representatives, so that they may stand some chance of being considered there.

Mr. BAYARD. If I understood the resolution correctly from its reading, I shall certainly object to it. We give one day to private bills, and I have no objection whatever to their being acted upon on that day; but there are other bills of a public nature on the Calendar; and if we take up the Private Calendar every morning of every day of the week we exclude those bills, for they cannot be taken up at any other time without interfering with the special order. There are three bills reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, which it probably will not take half an hour to pass; but still they are important to the general business of the country. Ought you to exclude them, as practically you will by this resolution, because the special orders and appropriation bills, after two hours, will take the whole day? If you appropriate an hour in the morning to the Private Calendar in addition, you practically defeat all other bills. If the resolution be modified so as to include other business besides private bills, I will not object to it.

Mr. IVERSON. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia to strike out the word "private," and say "bills on the Calendar."

Mr. IVERSON. The Senate can order what business shall be taken up. I think it better to postpone the special order each day until one o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I renew the amendment striking out the word "private."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the following amendment offered by the Senator from Maine:

"And that, after the presentation of petitions, reports from committees, and resolutions, the remainder of the two morning hours shall be devoted, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, to the consideration of such bills on the Calendar as shall not give rise to debate, until the Calendar shall have been gone through with."

Mr. HUNTER. Is that in order? It involves a change of the rule. Is it in order to make that change without a day's notice? I believe the rules require one day's notice to be given.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has been lying on the table for several days.

Mr. HUNTER. But not this change of the rules.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is a mere amendment of it.

Mr. HUNTER. The amendment involves a change of the rules; the original resolution does not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule only relates to the presentation of petitions and reports from standing committees.

Mr. HUNTER. But here is a new rule proposed to be established to consider only those bills that will not give rise to debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it is like making a special order.

Mr. HUNTER. We make a special order for a particular bill, but I do not understand that we can make special orders of all bills that do not give rise to debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a mere direction in regard to business.

Mr. STUART. I hope the Senator from Maine will withdraw the amendment. It will only lead to confusion and difficulty. If he will just let the original resolution pass, so that the special orders shall not come up of their own force until one o'clock, it leaves the Senate in the intermediate time to take up any business it thinks proper. I would say to the honorable Senator it may be just as important to pass a bill in the morning hour, of a public character, that will lead to a debate of ten minutes, as one that will not. It is altogether better, therefore, I submit to the Senator, to withdraw the amendment entirely, and let the original resolution stand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I differ with the Senator in opinion on that subject. That is the only trouble on that point. I do not think any of these difficulties will arise. It is very true that a public bill that gives rise to a debate of ten minutes may be as important, and more important, than others; but the difficulty is that you strike on a bill that gives rise to debate, and it prevents the passage of others. My desire is to accomplish something in the way of legislation; and at this late day of the session we cannot do much, unless by common consent we go through and pass such bills as are not objected to. It can take very little time; and as we include both public and private bills, we may accomplish a great deal in that way. Having done that—and it cannot take much time—we can return and take up bills that give rise to debate. I think a great deal of good will be done by it, and I will not withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. I have seen the operation of this rule in the House of Representatives, and occasionally we have had it in the Senate. I think it gives rise to a great deal of bad legislation. A bill is presented; you do not understand it; you do not like to get up and prevent the action of the Senate on it, because it does not seem to be courteous to the gentleman who presents it; and the consequence is that very often mischievous bills are allowed to pass without proper examination. It seems to me fair if we devote two hours each day to business other than the special order, that the Senate should determine at the time what business it will consider. There is a great deal of justice in what the Senator from Michigan has said. It may often happen that a bill which is very important and ought to be acted on, may give rise to a debate of ten, fifteen, twenty, or thirty minutes. If it gave rise to more, the majority could control it, could lay it on the table and take up bills that would manifestly not lead to debate.

Mr. IVERSON. My object is not only to facilitate business, but to prevent the confusion that arises every morning from moving to take up special and particular bills. Unless we have some regular order of business, we shall have propositions morning after morning, to take up a special proposition out of its order that gives rise to debate, and does injustice to the others. I think we had better have some regular order.

The amendment was rejected, and the resolution was adopted.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. STUART. I ask the Senate to take up a bill from the House of Representatives (No. 2) donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts. I gave notice that I should call it up yesterday, but I was not able to do so.

Mr. BIGLER. I desire to suggest to my friend from Michigan that I have a joint resolution of considerable interest to my constituents, relating to the regulation of public buildings in Philadelphia; and it is important that it should be disposed of.

Mr. SEWARD. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Pennsylvania; and that is, that he raise his voice so as to make his counsels heard on this side of the Chamber, where they are so much respected.

Mr. BIGLER. I was appealing to the Senator from Michigan to allow me to have a resolution passed in relation to the regulation of public buildings in Philadelphia. It is a measure of considerable importance, which will require but a very few minutes; but unless it be passed now, the work of changing those buildings must be stopped and delayed. The resolution, as reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, is satisfactory to my colleague, and I think to all the parties concerned, and I trust the Senate will indulge me by passing it. I know the bill of the Senator from Michigan will occupy time, and involve debate.

Mr. STUART. If I were at liberty, I certainly would withdraw the motion, but I am under obligations to call up this bill. I gave notice that I should do so yesterday, but the consideration of other public business prevented it.

Mr. BIGLER. This bill will occupy the whole day; and I appeal to the Senator—

Mr. STUART. It is not pleasant to me to deny a personal request of the Senator; but really I must insist on my motion.

Mr. PUGH. We might as well take a test vote on taking up that bill. It has never been favorably recommended by any committee of either House. Probably it is the largest proposition for the donation of public lands that has ever been here. We cannot consider it at this time; and I think, instead of wasting the precious hours that remain, on a question which, if it comes up, will be debated at great length, we may as well take a test vote on the question of taking up the bill; and I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered

Mr. YULEE. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Ohio to vary his motion to make it a motion to lay on the table the motion to take up the bill. That will make a more certain disposition of it. ["Oh, no!"]

Mr. PUGH. I do not think it is in my power to lay on the table a motion to take up a bill.

Mr. YULEE. Certainly you can.

Mr. PUGH. I adhere to my motion.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bright, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Kennedy, King, Pearce, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Henderson, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Shields, Sillidell, and Toombs—24.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2) donating the public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

The Secretary read the first section of the bill. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair feels it his duty to call up the special order at this hour.

Mr. STUART. I move to postpone the consideration of the special order until this bill is disposed of.

Mr. CLAY. I trust that motion will not prevail. It is now sixteen months and upwards since I introduced a bill to repeal the fishing bounties. The bill has been thoroughly debated. I presume the discussion on its merits has closed. It is on its third reading, or it has been read twice, and some amendments have been offered which I presume will not be debated, and it may be disposed of in the course of an hour, or less time. There is certainly a majority of the Senate in favor of the bill. That has been conceded on the other side, in the course of the debate. The bill might have been passed before, if I could have commanded the votes of that majority. If Senators will stay in their seats and will vote, that bill can be taken up and disposed of in the course of an hour, at the furthest, I presume. If this measure is taken up, it must occupy at least a week. It is a bill which cannot pass without debate. It is a bill which the Democratic party of this country has been committed against for thirty years past, and I presume, with the majority which that party has in the Senate, it cannot pass. I trust it cannot. I know it cannot without a protracted debate. Now, sir, if any action is to be taken upon the bill which I had the honor to present to the Senate to repeal the fishing bounties, I trust it will be taken now, and I hope it will not be postponed when we are within an hour of the close of its consideration for the sake of this bill, which will occupy a week, or at least considerable time.

Mr. STUART. If there is anything important at this stage of the session it is to act and not to speak, and I will endeavor to profit by that opinion. I only desire, therefore, to say that the friends of this measure do not intend to discuss it. It is a measure which explains itself. The reading of the bill prepares every Senator to vote upon it as well as if it were discussed a month. If the friends of the fishing bounty repeal wish to discuss this measure, and thereby keep back theirs, that is a matter they have in their own hands; they can do as they choose about it.

But, sir, I wish to protest against the authority of my honorable friend from Alabama, as well as his historical statement. I deny his authority to make party questions, and I deny the correctness of his historical statement that this is a party question, or has ever been made so. There has not been a question as to the granting of lands presented to the Senate that has been tested on a party division; and this is simply a proposition to grant less than six million acres, whereas it is but a short time since we passed a law—in 1855—under which there have been granted about sixty million acres. That was done by a Democratic majority, and approved by a Democratic President. I desire simply to say that all I wish is to have a vote. I ask for the yeas and nays on this proposition to postpone, and let the Senate decide the question according to its pleasure.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PUGH. What is the question now? Let me understand it. Is it to postpone the bill repealing the fishing bounties?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the question. It is moved and seconded to postpone the special orders with a view to continue the consideration of the bill granting lands for agricultural colleges.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understand that the proposition is to postpone all the special orders. I shall vote against it.

Mr. MASON. I think the Senator who asked to have the bill taken up will be disappointed if he expects it to pass without debate. It may be the policy of that Senator and those who think with him to let the bill pass as smoothly as may be; but as far as I understand it, it is presenting a new policy to the country altogether, being a direct appropriation from the Treasury for the encouragement of schools of agriculture—a direct appropriation from the Treasury, in the form of public lands, it is true, but it is in effect the public money to be appropriated in that manner. I am not aware that it has been known so far to the legislation of the country to make these general appropriations through all the States. I shall deem it my duty, for one, to expose its character, as I look at it, fully to the people whom I represent, and I presume that the disposition of other Senators is to do the same thing. Considering the character of the bill, I should look upon myself as derelict to a very great degree if I did not do all in my power to expose its character to the people of my State, at least; so that if the Senator thinks he can get it through without debate, he will be disappointed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Pearce, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Henderson, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Sebastian, Shields, Sillidell, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—29.

So the motion of Mr. STUART was not agreed to.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls up the special order—

Mr. SEWARD. I move to postpone the special orders for the purpose of taking up the bill for the preservation of the harbor of Chicago; on which motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I will state that this is the first of a series of bills for the protection of harbors; and that, if this motion shall prevail, and the bill pass, I shall expect to call up the others in their order.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Pearce, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Sebastian, Shields, Sillidell, Thomson of Kentucky, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—34.

So the motion was not agreed to.

FISHING BOUNTIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first special order is the bill (S. No. 10) repealing all laws or parts of laws allowing bounties to vessels employed in the bank or other cod fisheries. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL], to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALLEN.] The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island was to add:

Sec. 2. That all duties on salt imported into the United States from and after the 31st day of December, 1859, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment of the Senator from Illinois is, after the word "salt," to insert, "and sugar." The Chair thinks some question of order was raised in regard to these amendments a few days ago.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to have the sense of the Senate on the question of order that was raised the other day on this subject. We have been acting for many years on the idea that we had no right to originate in the Senate a measure to alter the tariff; that that was a matter which belonged exclusively to the other House. I should be glad to believe that we had the power. It is one of the few things in the Constitution which I would amend if I had the power to do it. I have always supposed, and the opinion of the Senate, I think, ever since I have been here, has been, that that was the settled rule of the body. There certainly was such a decision when Mr. McDuffie attempted to introduce a change in the tariff, which change consisted in a reduction. The bill which he introduced was referred to the Committee on Finance, at the head of which was Mr. Evans, of Maine. The Finance Committee returned the bill, with a resolution that the Senate had no constitutional authority to originate such a measure, and recommending its indefinite postponement. It was indefinitely postponed, I believe, there being a minority of only four in the Senate against it. Ever since then we have been acting on the supposition—I know it is so with the Finance Committee, of which I have been a member ever since I have been here—that we have no right to originate measures of this sort even by way of reduction. I should be glad to have a decision of the Senate on that point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the suggestions of any Senator on the point of order.

Mr. STUART. I only wish to say on this subject that it seems to me there can be no question of the authority of the Senate. I think this case clearly distinguishable from the one alluded to by the honorable Senator from Virginia. That was a bill which proposed to establish the rules for the raising of revenue. True, it lessened the scale; but still it would have been a bill to raise revenue if it passed. Now, sir, if all the duties were forty per cent., it certainly would not be competent to originate in the Senate a bill which would change the law, and make the duties but twenty per cent., because that would be a bill to raise revenue. But to repeal an existing duty is not to raise revenue; and I see no difficulty in carrying our authority to the extent of repealing the existing law; but you can substitute nothing in its place. If you were to repeal the entire tariff law, you would not originate a bill to raise revenue; you would only make it necessary to originate one, and that would have to be done in the other House. So, I say, applying the rule suggested by the Senator from Virginia to its fullest extent, this does not go beyond the authority of the Senate. Receiving a proposition to repeal an existing duty upon an article is not originating a bill to raise revenue. But this is a clause of the Constitution which is to be fairly construed, like all others. I think, as I said, it is clear that the distinction between this and the bill alluded to by the honorable Senator is a manifest distinction. That was a bill changing the revenue system; and, had it become a law, it would have been the law under which revenue was raised, and would have originated in the Senate, which would have been in violation of the Constitution.

I do not think the point very important, so far as this question is concerned; but it is important as a general principle, and I should be very sorry to see the Senate decide that they could not originate an amendment repealing the existing duty on an article. It seems to me that it would be a construction of the Constitution not warranted by its letter, and certainly not by its intent. I think that cases can be referred to. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] has placed in my hands a case where a bill was originated here to repeal the duty on salt. It came from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HUNTER. I think the Senator will find that he has not stated the case correctly. Suppose the Committee on Finance were to introduce a bill here which corresponded with the present tariff precisely, except that it made salt free. I presume everybody would say they could not do that. We could not originate a tariff bill which should be exactly like the present one, with the exception that it made salt free. Yet, although we could not do that, because the Senate cannot originate such bills, we may introduce an amendment which would accomplish precisely the same purpose. That is to say, we can, by the action of the Senate, substitute for a tariff which embraces a duty on salt, another tariff which imposes no such duty. That is the proposition. I deny it. That is a very different case from the one which the Senator puts of an entire repeal of all duties. I suppose we could do that; because that would leave no other revenue bill in the place of the old one; but if the Senate were to repeal this duty it would make another revenue bill in place of the old one. But, as I said before, my only purpose is to get a decision of the Senate on the point.

Mr. PUGH. I hope the Senator from Virginia will withdraw the question of order, and let us vote on the amendment. It is evident we are wasting a great deal of time on it. I am for the original bill; and I intend to vote against every amendment that is designed to fetter it; and therefore, without looking into the merits of these amendments, I am prepared to vote against them, and adhere to the original bill. I think we had better come to a vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to correct a supposition of the Senator from Virginia in regard to the bill to which he refers. That was introduced here in 1844. He says it was decided to be out of order. That point was never decided; but the question was taken on the proposition itself, which had but four members on this floor in its favor. I think that is the correct view.

Mr. HUNTER. I have looked at it lately. The question was taken on a resolution to postpone it indefinitely, because it was unconstitutional; and the Senator voted for it himself.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly I voted for the indefinite postponement, because I was opposed to the bill; and the bill was postponed. In such a case as that, the objection of the Senator from Virginia would apply, as I said the other day; because that bill, if passed, would have been the law under which the revenues would have been collected. I think, when the Senator introduced a bill here to issue Treasury notes and supply funds to the Government, he went much further to infringe this provision of the Constitution than we should do by striking out a duty on an article and make it free. That is not so much a revenue measure as the bill to issue Treasury notes. I suppose there is no difficulty about this.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The provision of the Constitution which forbids the origination of revenue bills in the Senate, is, I presume, copied from English precedents. There the popular branch alone is authorized to originate bills for the raising of revenue. It has been adopted in our form of government rather with reference to the precedent than with any regard to the reason of the case. We are as much the representatives of the country as the members of the other House. The reason of the interdiction in England as to one branch of the legislative body, does not apply here. There the Government is so framed that members of that body may be created at pleasure by the Crown, and a majority made for the occasion. It cannot be so here. The reason does not apply. I see no reason why the Senate should be over astute on this question to limit its own powers, to confine itself within stricter rules than a liberal construction of our Constitution would justify. I am not for surrendering a particle of the power which we can justly claim for the Senate.

By the Constitution we are forbidden to originate an act raising revenue. Now, can we not abolish or repeal a law for raising revenue? Can that be considered, in any fair sense of the term as applied here, as raising revenue? It would be a strange contradiction to common ears to be told that a prohibition to raise revenue is a prohibition to abolish revenue. There are some cases where the reduction of a duty would increase revenue; and where that is the object, such a measure would come within the prohibition of the Constitution, because it would be really for raising and increasing revenue. But the entire abolition of any particular duty or branch of revenue cannot, by any possible means, have that effect. By diminishing the duty in some cases you might increase importations and increase revenue. We have no right to do that. But to abolish revenue and to raise revenue, are terms directly in contradiction to each other; and of two contradictory propositions, as I understand, one must be true, and the other must be false. Now, here the contradictory conclusion is drawn from the terms of the Constitution, that we are divested of the power of relieving the people from a duty because we are inhibited from imposing a duty on the people!

I differ entirely on the constitutional question from my honorable friend from Virginia; but, whether I am right or wrong in that, I am quite clear that we cannot impose the decision of such a constitutional question upon the Chair as a mere question of order. We can neither impose it upon you, sir, nor can we rid ourselves of the responsibility of deciding it. Whether a great measure is constitutional or not is not a question of order. It rises altogether above it. It does not relate to the proceedings of the body; it is the solemn decision and adjudication of the Senate upon a great matter of law, and constitutional law. I am surprised, then, to suppose that gentlemen should regard this as a question of order, and think to have it ruled from us by the decision of the Presiding Officer of this body. There can be no such thing. It can neither be imposed upon him, nor by any decision can you take from us the right of adjudicating as we think proper; nor ought it to be done.

Mr. GREEN. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that this is not a proper question of order. It appeals to the Senate whether the proposition be constitutional or not. But we have a precedent here, and in the absence of argument I think precedents very safe to follow. I see that, in 1846—when the Senate was as able, perhaps, as it ever was, before or since; when there were such men here as Calhoun, Houston of Texas, Mangum of North Carolina, Simmons of Rhode Island, Allen of Ohio, Bagby of Alabama, Crittenden of Kentucky, McDuffie of South Carolina, Niles of Connecticut, Pearce of Maryland, Benton of Missouri, Bright of Indiana, Cass of Michigan, Clayton of Delaware, Dickinson of New York, Johnson of Maryland, Rusk of Texas, Webster of Massachusetts, Yulee of Florida, and so on—precisely a similar bill was brought in and reported from the Committee on Finance, in the Senate, and no question raised as to the constitutionality of the proceeding.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. What was the bill?

Mr. GREEN. The title of the bill was: "A bill to repeal the acts laying duty on imported salt, and to repeal also the bill granting certain fishing bounties and allowances to fishing vessels in lieu of a drawback of the duties paid on foreign salt used on the fish exported." It was brought in by Mr. Benton, from the Committee on Finance, of which Mr. Calhoun was chairman, all of these distinguished men being then in the Senate; and no question of Constitution or of order was raised.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Calhoun was never chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GREEN. The Journal shows that he was chairman. I do not know; I have the Journal before me, and it says Mr. Calhoun was chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GWIN. What is the date?

Mr. GREEN. Eighteen hundred and forty-six. Here is the Journal; look at it. Here were the distinguished Senators—and I only name them for the purpose of showing that they did not believe that a bill repealing a duty came in conflict with the provision of the Constitution which said that bills raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives. There is no difficulty about that. But, as the Senator from Kentucky properly said, even if there were difficulty, it is a constitutional difficulty, and not a difficulty growing out of the rules of the Senate; and the Presiding Officer of this body is to decide the rules of this body, and not constitutional questions. Constitutional questions appeal to the judgment of every Senator. We have a right to vote upon them, and decide according to our own notions of right and wrong. Enough of that.

I had intended at first to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island to repeal the duty on salt. I looked upon it as a tax upon the common necessities of the people. The poor man has to use as much salt as the rich man, and I think it an unfair mode of taxation; but the duty has been reduced so low—to fifteen per cent. ad valorem, amounting to only about two cents a bushel—and as it might endanger the passage of a bill to rid us of a great evil, I shall vote against this amendment. I believe it perfectly in order, perfectly constitutional, to make the proposition. It is according to the uniform precedents when the greatest men this country ever produced were in the Senate; but as it may endanger the passage of the bill, and as this duty is not very burdensome, I will now vote against the amendment.

Mr. CLAY. I trust the Senator from Virginia will withdraw the question of order; and let us take a vote directly on the amendments which are proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, with the leave of the Senate, will make a very brief statement in connection with this point of order. The Senator from Virginia objected to the amendments repealing the duties upon salt and sugar as not in order, upon the ground that they were against the clause of the Constitution which says that revenue bills shall originate in the House of Representatives. The Chair indicated the other day that he did not suppose it to be within his sphere to decide that question of order. Undoubtedly in one sense it is a point of order; for according to the standard of our proceedings, the law governing the proceedings of the body is composed of the precepts of the Constitution and of the rules of the body, and, where they are silent, of the parliamentary law; but it is quite obvious that it is one of those points of order the Chair ought never to attempt to decide, and if he was to do so it would involve very great and disagreeable consequences, and that mode of proceeding would soon become obnoxious to the Senate. The Chair, however, will take the view of the Senate upon that objection, for it is in the broadest sense a question of order. It is a question whether the amendment is or is not in order. If insisted upon, the Chair will put the question, "Is this amendment in order?"

Mr. HUNTER. I retain the same opinion. I do not believe it is in order; and I will merely say, before I conclude, that this is not obnoxious to the objection that is raised, that the Chair cannot rule out propositions merely because they are unconstitutional. That I admit; but there are certain constitutional rules of order. One is that one fifth of the members present shall have the yeas and nays recorded if they desire it. Whether there were any provision in your book of rules on that subject or not, there is a rule on the subject which you would be forced to apply. So I think there is a constitutional rule of order in regard to the origination of money bills. But I have been asked by my friends, particularly by the gentleman who has managed the bill, to withdraw the point of order; and saving to myself the right to renew it hereafter if it should come up on some other question, I will now withdraw it; not because I do not believe it is well taken, but that I may not embarrass the progress of this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question then is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not propose to take any part in this discussion, nor do I now; but this amendment has placed a new phase upon the whole matter. My constituents are in favor of repealing the duty on sugar. The honorable Senator from Missouri says the amount is so small, and so utterly insignificant—

Mr. GREEN. No; it was salt I spoke of. The Senator has mistaken salt for sugar. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. A very natural mistake. [Laughter.] I was merely going to correct him on that point, but I stand corrected myself. We are in favor of the repeal of the duty on both sugar and salt. We have very little interest in this fishing bounty; yet, believing that it is valuable, that it results in good, I shall vote against the repeal of the bounty. I am for a tariff justly discriminating in favor of American productions; but there should be some parity between the article produced and the amount of duties levied as protection.

Now, how does it stand on sugar? In 1855, the whole duties on sugar amounted to $3,985,000; and in 1857, they amounted to $12,478,000. In 1850, the whole product of sugar in the United States was $12,378,000. It would have been cheaper for us to have purchased the entire crop of sugar and thrown it into the sea, than to have levied this duty upon the people of the United States. The gentleman from Missouri says he is in favor of free salt, because it is an article of universal consumption. Sir, salt is no more an article of universal consumption at the North than sugar. It is eminently the poor man's luxury; it is a necessity with him. Its consumption is enormous. I trust that this amendment will prevail; and, while I should not vote for the bill without it, if the amendment be adopted, I shall vote for the bill as amended; for I consider the benefit resulting from the repeal of the duty on sugar greater than any benefit that may result from the continuance of the fishing bounty.

The honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SLIDELL] gave notice that, if this amendment prevailed, he should move, as an amendment, a provision abolishing all custom-houses. I do not know but that I am prepared for that proposition, if there is no other way to stop the enormous extravagance that now reigns through all the branches of this Government, and then come to direct taxation. I should be glad to see your army of custom-house officers all over the United States abolished. They are mere partisans. They are not placed in office to perform their duties as officers of this Government, but to act as politicians; and I should be glad to see them swept off the face of the earth as officers of this Government—I do not mean swept off literally, but figuratively.

Mr. SEWARD. In a Pickwickian sense.

Mr. CHANDLER. Put it in that light. I do not pledge myself to vote for that proposition when it comes up, but I should take it into very serious consideration; and I do not know that I might not vote for it. Why, sir, if your custom-houses were done away with, and you resorted to direct taxation in order to obtain the amount of money now expended by the Government—$70,000,000 annually—you would have to levy upon each congressional district a tax of $300,000. Now, sir, let a Representative in the other House go home to his constituents, and say, "I have voted to tax you $300,000, and the collectors will be around in due process of time"—how many of them do you suppose could stand up before their constituents in the face of such a tax as that? Alabama has seven Representatives in the other House. Her proportion of this direct tax would be $2,100,000, in gold and silver, to be collected from the State of Alabama, and carted up to Washington. Sir, do you not believe it would lead to prudence in our expenditure of money? I fear there is no other way to bring the expenses of this Government down to a fair basis, except direct taxation. Let the Representative meet his constituents with the bills, and they will call him to a rigid account. Under that system, I believe you would see the expenses of this Government reduced from $70,000,000 to $35,000,000 in less than two years. I do not say that I should vote for that; but I should like to see the present Administration try the experiment.

The votes of Alabama in the last presidential election were seventy-five thousand in all. The average assessment upon each voter, "poor white folks" and all, in the State of Alabama, would be about thirty dollars to the man. Well, sir, I imagine that some of those Alabamians would want to know where the money went to before they paid their thirty dollars a head. Louisiana has four Representatives, and her proportion would be $1,200,000 in gold and silver. Her votes at the last presidential election, in 1856, were forty-two thousand; and in the State of Louisiana thirty dollars to the man, including "poor white folks," would be the amount to be levied in gold and silver and carted up to Washington. I should like to see the honorable Senator from Louisiana meet that statement before his constituents, and justify his vote of $70,000,000 for the current expenses of this Government. Let the proposition be brought in—the sooner the better; and I should be glad to see this Administration adopt the policy; but, sir, it would be swept out of existence forever the moment the people had an opportunity to get at the men who cast the votes.

Mississippi gave sixty thousand votes at the presidential election, and has four Representatives. In Mississippi the proportion would be about twenty dollars a man. Florida cast eleven thousand votes, and has one Representative; it would amount to about twenty dollars there. Virginia has thirteen Representatives, and one hundred and fifty thousand votes. Her proportion would be $3,900,000 annually, or twenty-six dollars for every man in the State of Virginia. I should like to see the State of Virginia pay $3,900,000, in direct taxes, to support this Government. Sir, you would see economy, you would feel economy, in every vote that was cast in this body or the other House, under direct taxation. Let it come.

North Carolina has eight members, and casts eighty thousand votes. Her proportion would be $2,400,000 of direct taxes—nearly thirty dollars per man. Georgia has eight Representatives, and casts eighty-nine thousand votes, and her proportion would be $2,400,000, or twenty-five dollars per man, with the present expenditures of this Government. What they may be one year hence, God knows, at the rate we are going on in squandering the money of the people. Sir, I should like to see the honorable Senator bring in his proposition. I do not say how I shall vote upon it. I trust this amendment will be adopted, and that we may see free sugar and free salt, and then I will vote for the bill—not otherwise.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to say a word, simply for the purpose of notifying my constituents that I am attentive to their interests here, and not with the view of being drawn into a side issue, such as is presented by the Senator from Michigan. So far as the duty on sugar is concerned, we know that the amendment is merely presented to this bill with a view of defeating the fishing bounty bill; and I am not going to discuss that question under such circumstances. It is not put forward as a serious proposition. The very men who propose it, and who are going to vote for it now, know that they do not intend to carry out the purpose they pretend to have. They know that the Government cannot do without the duty on sugar this year; and they know further that the duty on sugar is not to be reduced by itself, any more than the duty on salt or any other particular article; but that the tariff is always to be altered when necessary as a general subject which requires revision, according to the interests of all parts of the Union combined.

I will say one word in relation to this question of revenue which the Senator from Michigan has brought forward, as gentlemen around me may not be quite familiar with the facts. He compares the duties paid on sugar last year with those paid some six or eight years ago. Why, sir, it is a matter known to every one that last year, owing to unfortunate accidents to the crop, the crop of Louisiana was reduced lower than it ever has been reduced since it became worthy of being called a sugar-producing State; and, under that state of things, the people of this country were saddled with an enormous increase of the foreign purchase of sugar, Louisiana not furnishing the supply which she usually furnishes. Consequently, the duties collected ran up very suddenly from three or four to twelve million dollars. Let the gentleman look at the end of this year again, and tell me what has become of the revenue of $12,000,000 on sugar? It will be back to $3,000,000, because the crop is a fair one. These contingencies occur in the cultivation of a crop of that kind, which is somewhat forced in our climate; liable to be cut off either by inundations or by early frosts, or by very late frosts. They have occurred once or twice in the history of that cultivation. The year 1857 produced the smallest crop ever produced by Louisiana since sugar has really been the principal culture of the State. From that accidental cause, there was an enormous increase of importation, and the price became enormously high by reason of the failure of the crop, and the importation being so largely increased for the same purpose. It is no ordinary state of things that produces that result.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not suppose there is any necessity for debating this proposition; but the Senator from Louisiana made a remark, and threw his hand this way, conveying the impression, without, perhaps, meaning any personal allusion, that there was a plan on this side of the Chamber to vote for this amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I had not the remotest idea of anything of the kind. I am sorry my gesture was an unfortunate one.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not intend, myself, to vote for the repeal of the duty on sugar, although there may be some good reasons given for it, or for the repeal of the duty on salt, or the repeal of the fishing bounties; I am against the whole; I am sorry to disagree with my worthy colleague in reference to the salt duty. I do not believe this is a time to repeal duties of any kind, and particularly it is not a time to repeal the duty on sugar. I was very sorry to hear the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SLIDELL] say the other day that if we agreed to this amendment, repealing the duty on sugar, he would then move to repeal the duties on textile fabrics. I am not in the habit of saying that I will or will not vote for one proposition, if another happens to receive the favorable action of the Senate. He seems to take the ground that we shall have taxed sugar and salt, or free silk and satin. I do not believe in either. I want to get the revenue in the most legitimate way I can get it.

I disagree, too, with the reasoning of my honorable friend from Michigan about the effect of the twelve million duty collected last year on sugar. He said it was so great a tax on the people that we had better buy the crop of Louisiana and throw it into the ocean. Now, sir, I believe that if it were not for the crop of Louisiana we should pay a greater tax than we now do. I am aware that some Senators, in the discussion of this bill have intimated that the old-fashioned doctrine of protection has become so obsolete that no one will rise up and defend it. I believe that enunciation was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] in connection with his remarks stating his disposition to get rid of the bounties, paid, as he said, to these aristocratic fishermen. That was the first time I ever heard fishermen, Cape Cod fishermen particularly, called aristocrats; but the Senator from Ohio thinks they are about the greatest aristocrats in the world.

Mr. PUGH. I think any man who is supported by taxing the rest of the community to keep up his business is an aristocrat. That is my definition of the term.

Mr. SIMMONS. These men are hard-working "aristocrats."

Mr. PUGH. I do not care whether they work or not; they tax other hard-working men.

Mr. SIMMONS. Every man to his taste. I do not complain particularly of the terms applied to these men; but when we have a proposition to reduce their wages from twelve to eleven dollars a month—for that I take it will be the effect of the bill—I do not want to apply any opprobrious epithet to them, or call them aristocrats.

Mr. PUGH. I did not apply any such term as the Senator mentions; but, as the Senator has chosen to speak of it, perhaps for the purpose of prolonging this matter, I will say that I consider it the essence of all aristocracy that a man should be supported by taxation on the body of the community.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator called them aristocrats, or something like that.

Mr. PUGH. No, sir; I did not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, sir, as to this matter of sugar, I suppose every one will admit, after our last year's experience, that it would be better to have the duty specific. Last year the price of sugar being double the ordinary price, and the duty being thirty per cent. ad valorem, it was just double in amount what it had been the previous year; and thus we had a double duty at precisely the time when we needed very little, and when it did not benefit the planters. This is the effect of the modern system of levying a percentage on the value of the article imported as duty. Last year, the sugar crop having failed in this country, and the price having gone to double the ordinary amount in other sugar-growing countries, and our duty being a percentage on the value of the imported article, we doubled the amount of duties at a time when there was a famine in the land as to sugar. That is the effect of levying duties by the ad valorem system instead of having specific rates. If we had a duty of a cent or a cent and a half a pound on sugar, which would do some good when the price was low, and give the producers here a chance for our market, it would not be a burden when the price was high. I have always been in favor either of a specific rate of duty, or of fixing for each article a specific value in the law, on which value to lay the duty. That used to be the distinction between protectionists and free-traders. We never have had any practical free-traders in this country. Persons have borrowed the term for the purpose of making a vicious system popular by putting a popular name to it—"free." The old-fashioned notion about protection was, that the duties should be certain and specific, and that was the very controversy here twelve years ago, when the tariff system was altered. Anybody who will take the trouble to look into the facts will see that, for three years after 1846, when we changed our duties from the specific to the ad valorem system, the duties actually rose. The amount of duty increased for the first three years under the operation of the bill we repealed last spring, and yet that bill was called a great reduction of duties and a vast approach towards free trade.

I suppose the amendment now before the Senate has been suggested simply with a view of calling attention to the fact that the benefits of laws for revenue are shared by all sections of the country, and in some degree to bring back the Senate to a rational consideration of these subjects. Until this proposition for the repeal of the duty on salt was offered, I did not know that there was salt now manufactured upon the Atlantic coast of this country; I supposed there was some salt in the interior that was protected by its location, principally by reason of the cost of transportation to the place of consumption. If, however, there is any interest that will be interfered with by the repeal of the salt duty, I am against that repeal. I am against any other proposition that will tend to depress any branch of the industry of this country, no matter where it is located; it makes no difference to me whether it is in Louisiana, or in the interior of New York, or in Missouri. I am sorry to see it connected with this bill, but it is legitimately connected with it. The Senator from Alabama says he has had the repeal of the fishing bounties in contemplation for eighteen months, but when the regulation of our system of revenue comes to be considered carefully it will be found that it affects the whole length and breadth of this land. I should be very glad if the Senator from Alabama would agree to postpone this bill for a little while, because it seems to me there are some indications that seamen may be wanted for the purposes indicated when this debate commenced, as the object for which the fisheries were encouraged.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no disposition to debate this matter, but I want to enter my decided and firm-settled opinion against the proposition which was laid down by the Senator from Louisiana. If I understood him, he distinctly stated that the increased price of sugars (I suppose he might say, or certainly ought to have said, all over the world,) during the last year, was owing to the failure of the sugar crop in Louisiana. He did not say all over the world; I suppose he meant to confine it here; but he might just as well have said all over the world. Now, sir, the diminution of the sugar crop in Louisiana was not a single drop in the great ocean of the world.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think if the Senator will enter into the discussion of that with me at the proper time, he will find that the statement he is now making is utterly without foundation.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have simply risen for the purpose of offering my opinion as briefly as did the Senator. He affirms the doctrine; I deny it. Now we will adjourn that question to a proper time, when we will discuss it. I say that other causes, the vast amount raised and consumed in other portions of the world, commercial speculations, and a hundred other causes contributed to produce that result; and I repeat again, all the sugar raised in Louisiana was not an ounce in the uncounted tons that were produced.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to correct the Senator from Louisiana, in regard to his supposition as to the motive with which this amendment to repeal the duty on sugar was offered. I am for repealing the duty on sugar in good faith; and if that amendment be added to this bill, I shall vote to pass the bill. My amendment is not offered for the purpose of killing the bill; and the Senator from Alabama can have my vote in support of the bill if this amendment repealing the duties upon salt and sugar shall be added to it. So gentlemen need not apprehend, so far as I am concerned, that the bill is to be defeated by the adoption of this amendment; and I disagree totally with the idea advanced by my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. SIMMONS.] I do not believe that sugar is cheaper because we pay a duty of twenty-five or thirty per cent. upon the value of the sugar which is imported into this country. I believe it adds to the price.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think I stated distinctly, not that sugar was cheaper because of the duty of thirty per cent., but because of the circumstance of the encouragement given to the cultivation of sugar in this country, and the competition between sugar produced in our country and foreign sugar. That was my proposition—not that it was nakedly on account of the duty.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I look upon the duty on sugar as one of the most objectionable of all the duties that are laid in this country. The production of sugar is confined to a very limited extent of country. According to the statistics which I have before me, only four hundred thousand acres of land are cultivated in the production of sugar in this country. The whole number of planters engaged in the raising of sugar was but two thousand six hundred and eighty-one when the census of 1850 was taken. Last year we paid in duties $12,478,000 on this single article. The whole value of the sugar crop was less than that. The whole value of the sugar crop raised in the United States was less than the amount of duties which we paid on that one article.

Now, sir, sugar is an article which enters into universal consumption; it is one of the necessities of life; and it cannot be raised, as the Senator from Louisiana has admitted in the remarks he has just submitted to the Senate, except by a sort of forced cultivation, in this country. I think, at the last Congress, we made an appropriation out of the public Treasury to send a vessel abroad to procure cuttings of sugar-cane for these two thousand six hundred southern planters, for whose benefit we are paying this enormous tax on a common article of universal use throughout the country. Why, I ask, should a few planters be pampered in this way? I know we must raise a revenue to defray the expenses of Government; but why not raise that revenue upon articles which all use, if you please, so that we may pay equally? Why not give us a bounty upon other agricultural products, where we may find, in some particular portion of the country, four hundred thousand acres of land which, by a sort of hot-house cultivation, would produce a particular article. I presume it would be possible, by great labor and expense, to produce many of the articles not indigenous to this country; and shall we lay a tax for the benefit of a few persons who may wish to engage in the cultivation of such articles?

I believe, sir, it will be found, as a general rule, that the difference between the price of sugar in the West Indies and this country is just about the amount of the duty we impose, with the cost of transportation added. Sugar at Havana is less than it is in the market of New York, to the extent of our duty and the cost of importing it into the market; and I have no doubt that the sugars used in this country last year would have cost the people of this country $12,000,000 less than they did but for the duty. I never believed in the doctrine that the higher the duty the lower the price. So far as our manufactures can be incidentally protected in the laying of duties for revenue purposes, very well. We have to raise revenue; and if, in raising revenue, we can benefit anybody, I am very glad to do it; but I am a disbeliever totally in the doctrine that the price is reduced by raising the duty. I recollect, in one of the electioneering campaigns that occurred in the West a few years ago, when there was some discussion on the tariff question, there was a torchlight procession got up at night in one of our little towns. It chanced to be a very rainy night, and it was a very muddy town. The mud was ankle deep. The procession was out in the rain, and among others a tall, gangling sort of man, with his pantaloons tucked into his boots, was treading along through the mud with a transparency reading, "the deeper the mud, the dryer the ground." [Laughter.] I think it was just about as reasonable as this idea that the higher the duty the cheaper the article. It was a very good burlesque upon that doctrine.

Now, sir, I am in good faith for repealing the duty on sugar, and I ask those gentlemen who are opposed to pampering one class of industry at the expense of another, to come up and help to repeal it. It is a very small number of persons, less than three thousand, who are benefited by the duty on sugar. According to a little statement which I have here, the amount of duty being over twelve million dollars, and the number of persons engaged in raising the sugar being two thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, the bounty per man is $4,658. Four thousand six hundred and fifty-eight dollars is paid by the people of this country for the benefit of every man engaged in raising sugar, while the whole sum paid out in bounties to fishermen amounts to $300,000, and there are fifteen thousand fishermen, being about twenty dollars per man. Well, sir, I am not much for the fishing bounties; and I feel very much inclined to vote for the bill to repeal them. It is only because it seems to have been the settled policy of the country from its organization, to pay a bounty to encourage the fisheries for the purpose of having seamen to man the Navy, that I shall vote against the bill, if I do vote against it upon the final vote. That, however, is a mere mite, compared with the enormous duty we pay upon sugar; and while we are getting rid of $300,000, let us get rid of these $12,000,000. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GWIN. I shall be prepared to vote for the repeal of the duty on salt and sugar, when that proposition comes up fairly in a bill to revise the tariff; but I am not disposed to put it upon this bill, which pertains to another subject entirely.

Mr. ALLEN. I introduced the original amendment as a second section to the bill to repeal the duty on salt. I thought, as we were taking off $300,000 bounty paid to the fishermen, we could afford to relieve them from the duties they paid on the foreign salt consumed in curing the fish which they export; but I had no idea, and never dreamed of that being connected with the duty on sugar, or any articles relating to the general tariff system. Should this motion prevail to repeal the duty on sugar, I shall be obliged to vote against my own proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. The argument of the Senator from Illinois directs itself against all those who advocate the principles of free trade, and vote against this amendment. I think he falls into several very material errors. Those who vote against this amendment—for myself, at least, I can speak—object to a free list altogether; they want duties imposed upon everything; and when you show them an article which, in the language of the Senator from Illinois, is one of universal consumption, it does not follow, because there is little production of it within the United States, that it should not be the subject of taxation. On the other hand, I would say that, just in proportion as it is every particle of it imported, so will the duty fall more equally on all those who consume it. If an article be of domestic production, and a duty be laid on that article, and we pay it on the article which is imported, we also pay it on that which is produced in the country; but that which we pay on the article produced in this country does not go into the Treasury: it is taxation for the benefit of him who receives it. If the Senator could show that the duty which is levied on sugar does not rest on the general basis of all other revenue duties—if he could show that it is what he alleges it to be, a duty which is laid for the benefit of a favored class—then I should unite with him to repeal it. Standing as it does, however, upon the same general footing with the duty which we lay upon all other articles, and being large, sometimes enormous, as he represents it, from the failure of the crop in the United States, it but serves to fill the Treasury, and diffuse the burdens of Government equally upon the great body of consumers.

But I was struck with the singularity of the Senator's argument in which, from some table, he has found the number of planters in Louisiana. He has discovered the number of persons engaged in making sugar, and then, in contradistinction to those persons, the whole number of fishermen. Why did not he give merely the number of merchants who owned the vessels? Why did he not throw out the men who navigate the ships and cure the fish? He threw out the labor in the one case; he threw out all the family connected with the great proprietor in the one case. Why did he retain it in the other? Does he not see that his comparison is utterly unfair?

If, in the whole class of articles consumed, there be any which deserves the description he gives of universal consumption, it is salt. I suppose, when he used the term "universal," he must have meant "general;" and if he had used the term general, I should have supposed he must have meant among men. Salt, however, extends greatly beyond human consumption. It is consumed by animals, consumed by domestic fowls and wild fowls. If there be anything, therefore, which would relieve the poorer classes of the community, the herdsmen, the pastoral class, it would be the exemption from duty of salt; and if I were seeking thus to confer benefits, salt would be the object I would select. But, sir, it is because it is of such universal consumption that I think it is the proper subject of taxation. All who derive the protection of Government should bear a portion of its burdens; and the duty laid upon an article of such universal consumption is more equally distributed than if it was laid upon an article more partial in its consumption. So farthen from adding to the free list, by withdrawing those articles which are of universal consumption, I much prefer to draw in such articles as tea and coffee, which are consumed all over the country, and which are made free because a duty on them does not benefit some class in the United States, made free because a tax on them protects no particular industry in our own country. That, I think, is no reason at all, for there the whole tax collected would go into the Treasury, and they would, beyond all other classes of cases, be those articles on which the duty levied would be for the benefit of the Government.

I merely rose to correct what I thought was an unfair presentation of those who occupy the position in which I stand myself, and not to prolong the discussion. I thought it was exhausted, and I will not, by going into the topics which have been suggested, and which, it seems to me, do not belong to the amendment, consume time upon it.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to say to the Senator from Mississippi that the doctrine he has just avowed is a doctrine to tax the people of the country for the benefit of the property of the country—to tax labor for the benefit of capital; and when the Congress of the United States settles down upon the principle he has avowed, that articles of general consumption—the absolute necessities of life, articles necessary to all men, rich and poor—are the special objects of taxation, then I say the time has come for the people of this country to overturn this revenue system altogether, as an odious and oppressive system, and to establish a system of direct taxation upon the property of the country.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose the Senator must have misunderstood me. I selected no object of special taxation; I spoke of those objects which were of universal consumption, as being such as most properly bear the burdens of Government. My theory is, as long as we collect the revenues by duties on imports, to lay duty on everything which will pay a duty; and therefore it was that I proposed to bring from the free list into the dutiable list two of those articles which had been placed there. That is not my theory—not a principle which I present; for the Senator is well aware that, on other occasions, I have stated that I thought the whole theory was wrong; that it had led to all the abuses which existed under our Government; and I would be glad to go back to direct taxation.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think I misapprehended the Senator's position, and I disagree with him altogether. I believe the system of indirect taxation by which we support the Government of the United States, unless proper discriminations are made, is a system that taxes the poor and laboring masses of the country for the relief of the wealthy of the country. The Senator says that, as sugar and salt are articles of general or universal consumption, a tax upon those articles is just and equal. Now, sir, it seems to me that the policy of the Government should be this: that these and other articles of absolute necessity, used by all men, rich and poor, should be taxed as little as possible, or placed altogether in the free list; and that the taxes should be levied upon the articles of luxury; articles consumed chiefly and mainly by persons able to consume them; articles that are, to a considerable extent, produced in the country. This policy would relieve the labor of the country, by putting the burdens of taxation upon the capital of the country; and it would protect the labor of the country, by putting the duties on articles produced in foreign nations. Sir, this system relieves and protects labor, develops the productive industry and power of the country, and imposes upon foreign labor and foreign capital a portion of the burdens of taxation necessary to support the Government.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SLIDELL] told us the other day, with much emphasis of tone and manner, that if the proposition to repeal the duties on sugar was pressed, he should move to include all textile fabrics, and go for the abolition of custom-houses. Now, sir, I want the Senator from Louisiana distinctly to understand that the threat he has made has no terror for me—none for the State I represent. Massachusetts does not live on your bounty or by your special favors. I believe the people of Massachusetts pay, in proportion to their numbers, to support this Government, three dollars for every dollar that is paid in the western or southern States. There are no people in this country, in no State, who are taxed to support the Federal Government so highly, in proportion to their numbers, as are the people of the State of Massachusetts. The people of Rhode Island and Connecticut come, perhaps, very near to them. And that grows out of our position. We are a commercial, a manufacturing and a mechanical people. Our land is poor, and we produce but little. We consume more largely in proportion to our numbers—vastly more so—articles taxed to support the Government, than do the people of any other portion of the Union. No man can doubt this who will take the articles upon which duties are levied, and see where those articles are consumed. If the doctrine avowed by the Senator from Mississippi is to prevail, if the policy of the Government is to be in harmony with his theory of taxation—a theory that imposes upon labor the burdens of the Government, while it does nothing to lighten those burdens by giving indirect protection and encouragement—then I say abolish your custom-houses altogether, and give us a system of direct taxation—taxation upon the property of the country, instead of taxation upon the labor of the country. Rather than adopt the policy indicated by the Senator from Mississippi, which he tells us is the policy advocated on his side of the Chamber, I would go for the entire abolition of your revenue system, and resort to direct taxation for the support of the Government; and I believe this to be the sentiment of the people of my State. Even now, under the present system, we contribute more than our proportion to the burdens of the Government, and the indirect benefits we get by your present tariff are almost worthless.

Now, Mr. President, the pending proposition is to repeal the duties on sugar. I am willing to place sugar in the free list. I have no doubt we paid in my State $1,000,000 last year in duties upon sugar. I agree with the Senator from Louisiana that what we saw last year is not likely to be repeated this year, or the next; but still this tax upon sugar is a direct and positive burden, a tax—a tax upon the consumption of the country, a tax upon the poor laboring men of the country, to whom sugar is rather a necessity than a luxury. It is like salt, and some other articles of prime necessity. But, sir, I must confess that this is not exactly the place to press this proposition. I feel that it is wrong to interfere with the system of bounties or allowances to the fishermen, and I regret that the Senator from Alabama presses this question as he has pressed it, with such vigor and determination. I had hoped that this proposition would be abandoned, and that the old policy of the country would continue. It may be somewhat difficult to defend this policy of allowances to the cod fisheries upon general principles; but that this policy, early adopted, has contributed to the benefit of the nation, I do not entertain a doubt. Why, then, press this bill now? Why strike at the policy that has raised a hardy and fearless race of men who have ever responded to the calls of duty and patriotism in peace and in war?

If Senators wish to save money to the Treasury, now exhausted, if they wish to adopt an economical policy, there are opportunities enough to do so. Let them go to work and reform their custom-houses. I have a list of the expenses of this Government for the collection of the revenues for each of the five years past. I will not detain the Senate by referring to the facts therein contained; but the extravagance, the corruptions of the Government in collecting the revenues are almost beyond calculation. Little collection districts where one or two men can collect the revenue—where a few men did collect the revenue when it was four or five times larger than it is now—have been increased in force and expense. I find that in the town of Burlington, Vermont, $8,581 is collected, and $16,000 is expended to do it; and thirty-three persons are employed.

Mr. FOOT. What year was that in?

Mr. WILSON. In 1857. In 1852, you collected $37,000 there, and expended $9,800 in the collection, and employed twenty-eight persons. There is the city of Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania, where they collect $3,500, and expend $2,400, and have four persons in service. In 1852, they collected $20,000, expended $1,200, and one person did the whole business. Here is a district down in North Carolina that collected forty-three dollars in 1852, and two persons were employed; now, we collect eighty-two dollars, and to do the collecting we have seven persons employed. This list, reported by the Secretary of the Treasury on a call made by the Senate, and in answer to a resolution I introduced, should be studied by Senators who have a fit of economy, for it shows that you can discharge more than one thousand men you now employ in collecting the revenue, and reduce the expenditures $1,500,000. Your whole custom-house system is a corrupt and extravagant one. If the doctrines are to prevail, that we are to tax the absolute necessities of the people, consumed by the masses of the country, that is, tax the labor and relieve the wealth of the country, then give us direct taxation. It will close these custom-houses, discharge three thousand men—three thousand mere politicians—employed there, and it will reduce the expenditures of the Government thirty or forty million dollars annually. I say to you, sir, that the people in my State, if you adopt that system, will pay their taxes, and we shall see whether the people of some other States whose Representatives are ever talking of free trade and direct taxation are able and willing to pay their taxes to support the Government. The people of Massachusetts are in favor of a revenue system, with incidental protection to capital and labor—they are for taxing lightly, or admitting duty free articles of prime necessity which we do not produce, and in favor of assessing the duties upon articles produced in the country, thereby giving incidental protection to American labor, and upon luxuries consumed chiefly by the wealthy, whose property is thus made to contribute to its own protection. Sir, this is our policy—a policy based on the experience of the country, and we believe it to be for the interests of the whole country, North and South, East and West, for labor and capital, for producers and consumers, that this should be the settled policy of the nation. The sooner we adjust our revenue system so as to secure to the labor of the country relief by making articles of necessity we do not produce duty free, and by assessing our duties upon luxuries and upon the products of our own industry, the sooner shall we give an impulse to the now depressed business interests of the country, and be able to fill your now exhausted Treasury, and to redeem your outstanding Treasury notes, and the sooner shall we be able to begin that great work, so much desired, the Pacific railroad. But whatever may be your action, sir, in regard to the tariff, I want the Senator from Louisiana, and all other Senators, to understand that a threat to resort to direct taxation and to abolish the custom-houses, will create no feeling of anxiety in Massachusetts.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Massachusetts presents a proposition the antagonist of that which he understands me to present, and I am perfectly willing to rest the question on a bare statement of the case. He insists that duties should be levied on those articles which are manufactured in the United States, and upon articles of luxury alone—not upon those of general consumption. I insist that as long as we support our Government by a revenue collected from duties on imports, those duties should be levied upon everything which will bear a duty, varying in the rates from revenue principles alone, and with no view to protect any favored class within the limits of the United States. He says, his relieves the people, and mine burdens the people. How is that? Does he relieve the people? Are the people to pay no taxes? Pray where do they get the money now to pay taxes except from the capital and property of the country? It is absurd to say that labor pays taxes. Property pays them. Property increases the wages of labor. Property must exist to pay the labor; the laborer's consumption falls back upon property at last. That great problem which has disturbed the world, the relation between capital and labor, is one with which the Senator ought to be familiar; it is one which belongs rather to his region of country than to mine; for there labor and capital, thank God, are the same.

I will suppose a case, however, under the Senator's theory, that we import a million dollars' worth of a particular article, and produce in the country the same value of that particular article: then the two millions are consumed, and the duties paid upon one million of it go into the pocket of the producer; the duties paid on the other million go to support the Government of the United States. The consumers, then, who are the people upon his theory, pay two dollars, only one of which goes to the support of the Government; and that Government, having no right to tax them save for specified purposes. The whole power of the Government to lay taxes is derived from its duties of protection to those on whom it imposes the burden. The purposes for which it shall levy taxes are declared in the Constitution; and among those the Senator will not find the protection of any favored class of labor or production. The only theory on which the duty can be equally distributed is that which imposes it upon consumption in every form in which taxes may be divided.

But he says if this is to be done, he is in favor of abandoning the whole system of duties upon imports. That declaration might be rendered by an opponent of his thus: "If you have no bounty, no protective duties for the benefit of yourself and your constituents, then you desire there should be no duties levied on imports at all." That the duty imposed upon sugar operates for the benefit of those who cultivate it, is certainly true. It is true of every duty which is imposed upon everything manufactured or produced within the limits of the United States. All that I asserted, and all that I am now prepared to admit, is that if it is imposed for protection alone which would be exemplified by making it prohibitory, I will then, as readily as any one who is opposed to the section where that exists, vote against it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, this question, it seems, is viewed in different lights in different quarters of the country. I disagree with the Senator from Mississippi in his view as to the taxes which are levied upon the producing classes being levied upon the property of the country. Sir, I consider that the source of wealth in this country is the labor of the country, and every production of labor which is made more valuable by your indirect system of revenue, adds to the wages of the labor of the country. It is for that very reason that I oppose this amendment. I do not care whether the labor be employed in Louisiana or in Rhode Island. I go for the protection of labor, be it employed where it may; and I would adopt a system which would benefit the producers of the country by incidental protection, or any other name you may choose to give it. The notion of taxing articles that do not come in competition with the producers of this country, as a means of equalizing your burdens, is a very fallacious notion, and it is to that simply that I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi. I can now do so, perhaps, and get his ear with more readiness than I could if the article in question happened to be produced in a different section of the country; but I hope not. I do not mean to intimate that he is not as well disposed towards my section of the country as he is towards his own.

I had occasion at a former time to speak of the influence of the introduction of the sugar culture upon the other great staples of the South; and I believe it is as important to the cotton-growers as it is to the sugar-growers. I think that region of country wants a diversity of labor; and if you were to throw all the labor employed in the cultivation of sugar upon the cultivation of cotton, you would break down the price of cotton and increase the price of sugar to the consumers. That is what I meant when I referred to the effect of the duties as stimulating production—not that the duty had no influence on the price.

Now, the Senator from Mississippi says that, if he could have his way, he would put a duty on tea and coffee. Well, sir, if I could have mine, I would not; I would keep it on sugar; but I do not suppose we can either of us have our way exactly; and it is, perhaps, fortunate for the country, and fortunate for us, that the question of protection, per se, has passed away. In obtaining the revenue that is necessary for the Government—provided its expenses keep anywhere within hail of what they are now—there can be no difficulty in extending incidental encouragement to any department of the industry of the country, so as to give it a fair opportunity for a competition with the productions of countries where labor is cheaper than it is here.

We are not going to get rid of these difficulties, as my friend from Massachusetts supposes, by abolishing custom-houses. Some people think that if we can get rid of the duty collected on sugar, it is so much saved to the country. But they will have to pay it in some other form; and if you get rid of custom-house officers, you will have tax-gatherers more numerous than they are and more oppressive, and burdensome, and insolent. I do not know of anything this Government could do so detrimental to freedom as to provide gatherers of direct taxes, going round into every man's house, and levying upon his cow or his pig in order to get his taxes. I will say nothing about the impossibility of it with your sub-Treasury system. Under that system it would be as impossible to pay a year's taxes to this Government in many States of the Union, as it would be to make a new world.

But, aside from all that, I come to the consideration of the present amendment, and to the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, that he wants to put tea and coffee, and articles not produced in the United States, on the dutiable list, and divide the duties between them and the articles produced in this country. Every one can readily see what would be the effect of taxing tea and coffee. Perhaps the value of the importation of those articles amounted to as much as the value of the sugar importation last year. Now, suppose you took $6,000,000 off the duties on sugar and put it on tea and coffee, your revenue would be the same as it is now. That is a fair statement, I presume. I have not looked at the tables lately, but formerly the proportion used to be about that. Now, I ask the Senator if it would make a farthing's difference to the consumers of sugar, tea, and coffee, whether you levied $12,000,000 on sugar, or $6,000,000 on sugar and $6,000,000 on tea and coffee, as a matter of tax? Supposing these to be as he says, articles of universal consumption: every man can see that the amount of taxes levied on the people of this country would be $12,000,000 on these articles, whether you impose a duty upon sugar alone or distribute it between sugar, tea, and coffee? Now, my proposition is, that instead of laying that amount of duty on tea and coffee which are not produced in this country, and by no possibility can be produced here to any extent, we put it on sugar which is produced in this country; and we thereby benefit the producer of sugar without impoverishing or injuring a single individual in the country. That is the distinction between a judicious system of protection to our labor, and the foolish theory of spreading the total amount of revenue you want over all articles of consumption, without reference to whether they are produced in this country or not. I take it that the Senator from Mississippi comprehends the force of this suggestion, and that he has public spirit and patriotism enough to know that, whether the duty be levied equally upon sugar, coffee, and tea, or whether it be on sugar alone, the beverage will be just as good when it comes to be mixed, and will cost no more in one form than the other; and if you can help the Louisiana planters to that extent, you do it without its costing anybody a dollar.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Rhode Island will allow me to interrupt him. I have so much more confidence in his knowledge of finance than I have in my own—for trade is a thing to which I have never paid any attention—that I am ready to admit that I know very little about finance. I will say to him that the position which he assumes, or rather the inquiry which he makes of me, belongs only to a case of universal consumption, where the duty on one article of universal consumption is taken away, and the duty of the two thrown upon another article of universal consumption.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand it so.

Mr. DAVIS. But I think, unless salt be an exception, there is no article of universal consumption.

Mr. SIMMONS. I believe there is no man, who drinks tea and coffee, that does not sweeten them.

Mr. DAVIS. Some persons do not. Some use maple sugar, some use molasses, some people drink coffee, and some drink tea; and when you fall on articles which are of consumption in a particular class, then I say the application of the principle is more evident. As the Senator from Massachusetts argues about luxuries being taxed, they are taxed, of course, if you lay a duty on everything—the wealthy use the luxuries, and they use the necessities too.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will not take in the Senator from Massachusetts. This matter is between the Senator from Mississippi and myself.

Mr. DAVIS. I was only introducing it for illustration, that if you take the taxes off luxuries, and impose them upon the necessities of life, then there would be an inequality; but if everything which is consumed is taxed, and taxed upon a revenue standard, that, I think, is more equal than any distribution which can be made, though I concede to the Senator that if he can find two articles of universal consumption, and if, instead of putting half the amount of duty on each, you put the whole amount on one, the result will be the same.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not choose to go about the country seeking articles. I took the precise articles indicated by the Senator himself. He said he would tax tea and coffee, which are now free.

Mr. DAVIS. They are not of universal consumption.

Mr. SIMMONS. They come as near to it as sugar.

Mr. DAVIS. I would not say that sugar is of universal consumption. All three of these articles are of very general consumption, sugar more general than the other two; but maple sugar is often substituted for that on which duty is levied.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator comprehends the position I have taken. I took the precise articles which he said, according to his theory, he would take from the free list—tea and coffee—and levy a duty upon; and of course if he did so, he would lessen the duty upon sugar, or he would be enabled to do it.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it would be more just, because it would be a distribution among all consumers. Tea and coffee are not of universal consumption. In some sections of the country the people use a great deal of coffee and very little tea; and in other sections, the reverse is the case. Sugar is an article of more general consumption than either of them, but by no means universal. I do not think, therefore, the exchange can be made upon the proposition which the Senator makes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not believe three articles could be selected in the whole class of imports of the country of more general consumption than sugar, tea, and coffee.

Mr. DAVIS. I think so.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the argument pinches, I know we are about to run off a little. I am not making these remarks for that purpose; but in order to call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi and others to what I consider to be the true principle. I am not to be got off from the argument by any compliments to my knowledge of finance and revenue.

Mr. DAVIS. What I said on that point was not intended in a complimentary sense, but as due in justice to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say that any man who will view the subject deliberately, calmly, and candidly, will come to the conclusion that it is right to discriminate in this very particular, and that you discriminate for the benefit of your own country, and to the injury of no living man in it, no matter where the laborer, the producer is. That is my ground as a statesman. A man in the remotest corner of this country, whether he produces, or over expects to produce, a dollar's worth in his life, is just as much bound to yield an incidental protection of this kind to the laborers of every other section as if he were a producer himself. That is the ground I go upon, and I claim it in return. I have a right to claim it, as an American Senator and an American citizen.

The clamor that is raised throughout this country generally by men who never earned a dollar by their hands in their lives, against this incidental discrimination for the production of labor is made without their ever having taken the time to consider the question. If it were not for that we should have no such disputes as we have had on these questions of labor. When I speak of labor, I never have drawn the distinction which is drawn by the Senator from Mississippi, as an antagonist interest to capital. I would as soon protect the rights of capital as the rights of labor; but I should forget every lesson that has ever been taught me, if I did not regard the capital kept out upon usury by mere money lenders as an antagonist element to labor. Capital invested in the actual pursuits of life, producing what ministers to the wants of society, just as much deserves protection by the legislation of the country as labor itself. That capital is usefully employed, profitably employed, and patriotically employed; but when you come to another class of capital, loaned out upon usury to the producing classes, it is the duty of every government in our country to restrain the exorbitant exactions of the usurers. That is the most oppressive way in which the earnings of labor are carried into the coffers of the rich—not by duties on the productions of labor, but by the exactions of money lenders, who never had a heart that deserved the consideration of a statesman.

I have stated the position of the Senator from Mississippi, as I understand it, candidly and frankly, with no purpose of forcing this argument, with a view to show that there is no necessity to resort to any extreme measures in reference to finance, for, as I said before, with our expenditures as they are, I can see no chance for making anything free that now pays a duty. For my life I do not see, with the rates of duty established last spring, how we are to get sufficient revenue to keep the Government at it. I hope and expect never to see such a calamity befall the sugar-growing States as cut off the crop last year, and forced us to buy in a market rendered high by a failure in foreign countries. I think whatever incidental encouragement can be given by the legislation of this Government to diversify the labor of that region of country whose climate is adapted to raising sugar, we are bound to give, and it is sound policy, sound statesmanship to do it, not only in order to be independent of foreigners, but for the purpose of preventing an over supply of other articles of production in the country. For that reason I cannot vote for the proposition to repeal the duty on sugar, although it comes from those who are in favor of continuing the bounty to the fishermen.

Now, Mr. President, I have a word or two to say as to the propriety of taking into consideration a question so important as this upon a proposition to repeal the fishing bounties. I think it has been suggested by the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] that it was an unwise policy to repeal the legislation of last year. For my part, I consider the tariff act of last year, as amended by the Senate on the heel of the session, one of the most disastrous measures that was ever passed by Congress. It was passed without proper examination. On the last occasion, when this bill was under consideration, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIGLER] appealed to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] to show that it was through his efforts last year the duty on iron was not reduced more than it was. I was astonished that he could flatter himself that there was any leniency bestowed at the last session on any interest of the producers in any section of the country. Sir, there was an indiscriminate onslaught upon the labor of this country in every department of industry. The only question with the Senator from Virginia, as I read his speech, was how low he could reduce the scale, how near he could approach to free trade; and when he got the bill to the scale in which it finally passed, he suggested to his friends that he had got about as near to that as he could, and that it was best to pass the bill as it was.

Now, sir, I say that when you take the rates of duty fixed by the tariff of 1857, and cipher them up and average them, you will find that you will have to add seventy-two and a half per cent. to them in order to bring them up to what they were under the tariff act, which it repealed. Very nearly one half was taken off in the aggregate. Anybody might know; when we were just "chin above water," as the boys say, contesting with foreigners for our own market, with money at thirty per cent. per annum, and everybody struggling as if for existence, that to take away the barriers to importations would inevitably lead to the destruction of the industry of the country. Anybody might have seen it; and I am astonished that it did not arrest the attention of Senators at the time. If I had not been here myself at the close of sessions, and known with what little consideration such bills are hurried through, I should have been utterly surprised at that legislation; but we had a redundant Treasury, and everybody here was worried for fear we should be overloaded with money, and people are excusable for going a great length in such times, because it is an evil for any Government to have more money than it can legitimately spend. That has always been a disadvantage to the people.

I said before that I considered the present an inappropriate time to press this measure. I admit that it will operate upon only a very small number of people, comparatively—some fifteen thousand, and it will not oppress them a great deal. The effect of it will be probably to reduce their wages about a dollar a month, from twelve to eleven dollars; and I dare say they can stand it; but I think this is an inappropriate time for such a measure. It is a time when the industry of our section of the country is entirely prostrated. It is a time, too, when the industry of the South is comparatively prosperous. I know of no region of this country that enjoys, to-day, so much prosperity as the South. Their crops are all bearing a remunerative and a generous price, except sugar, and that is reasonably well up.

A SENATOR. How about breadstuffs?

Mr. SIMMONS. Our southern friends are rather the buyers of breadstuffs than the sellers.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator is greatly mistaken about that. The southern States raise a great deal more of breadstuffs than they consume.

Mr. SIMMONS. It may have got to be so now, and it is greatly to their credit if it be so. They used to bring corn down there from Illinois and let it lie until the cattle eat it up. Because cotton was worth thirty cents, they would buy everything. That is a miserable system. If they raise what feeds themselves, they have got into the American system, which is, produce what you can for yourself, and buy as little as you can abroad. That is the true doctrine for getting rich, and I dare say our southern friends have ciphered it out for themselves by this time.

The questions which the Senator from Mississippi has raised demand the consideration of producers everywhere. He objected to the collection of your revenue upon articles of luxury. I agree that, so far as our system has worked, my experience is that it tends to carry the levying of duties upon articles of luxury alone, except in regard to food. Sugar is consumed by all classes; but when you come to textile fabrics, which are threatened to be made free, provided this amendment prevails, you will find that, levying duties as we levy them, the coarse fabrics of common wear are not imported at all, and that, practically, only the luxurious articles bear the burden, if burden it is, such as we do not produce here; and the worst effect of this system has been that whereas, when it was changed twelve years ago, we had a production of woollens to a vast extent compared with the population, there is not to-day a man in the employment of this Government who has got an American coat upon his back.

Mr. DAVIS. I think I have.

Mr. SIMMONS. I doubt that. If it is broadcloth, it was not made in the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think you do not. I happen to know, because I have not worn one for forty years that I did not inquire about, and a year ago I could not find a piece of American cloth anywhere within forty miles of me, and that is the reason I know whether a man has got it. I looked for it, and could not find it. The Senator says he did not inquire, and therefore he does not know.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, I do not know.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I am astonished that the Senator should venture to remark that he had one, if he did not know that it was so.

Mr. DAVIS. I thought so.

Mr. SIMMONS. If you will find me the place it is manufactured within the jurisdiction of the United States, I will give you two new ones. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I will try to hunt it up.

Mr. SIMMONS. No, sir; there is not such a thing made in the United States, to any extent, within my knowledge, as a piece of broadcloth. You have, by your system of what you call free trade, broken up the entire manufacture of broadcloth within the United States. It is suggested that nobody knows it. The misfortune of the country is, that you are prostrating and paralyzing your labor without knowing it, by a miserable theory about taxing tea and coffee in the room of sugar. I call it miserable, because it can make no possible difference to the consumer whether he pays duty on the sugar alone, or whether you spread it over the three articles, and you may help the producer of sugar, to some extent, by levying your duty on that article. However, I shall not pursue this subject, because I do not believe there is any danger of sugar being injured, nor do I suppose I can do good by debating it. I hope I have given no offense to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. DAVIS. I certainly take no offense at the remarks of the Senator from Rhode Island. His zeal leads him to speak strongly, but I always listen to him with respect and interest. Quite sincerely I acknowledge his superior information on all subjects of finance, and I will say of manufactures, too. I did not say so before, in a complimentary sense, or to throw him off from the line of his argument at all, but to acknowledge a fact. It is a subject of which I know very little, and he knows a great deal. His theory is different from mine, and he reaches opposite conclusions. His theory is, duties for protection, mine for revenue.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say the time has gone by when, for any object I ever contemplated in making a tariff, a protective duty is required. A duty for revenue is now adequate to all the purposes any man can desire. I am not arguing this as a question of protection.

Mr. DAVIS. I am very happy, then, to find myself under the shelter of one of so much financial knowledge. If he only wants a duty for revenue, and if there is to be no discrimination in favor of one manufacture over another—

Mr. SIMMONS. Not at all. The discrimination I thought I indicated by saying it should apply to articles produced in this country as against those not produced here.

Mr. DAVIS. And therefore the gentleman argues for duties for the purposes of protection. He would not so put it in the law; he would not so write it in the bond; because he knows that, under the Constitution, he has no authority to impose such duties. The constitutional authority is to raise duties only for the purpose of paying the great burdens of the Government; and among those is not the protection of manufactures. He now avows his purpose. His theory and mine are opposite. He imposes duty to collect revenue, it is true; but his purpose is protection, mine revenue only. He discriminates in favor of things manufactured in the United States, and insists that this makes the burden equal. I say no, because he cannot find two articles of universal consumption, both of which are entirely imported; and if he could find two of universal consumption, and one of them was partly imported and partly produced in this country, if he put the whole duty upon that, he must magnify the duty just in proportion to the production of the article in the United States, because the increase of price going to the producer in the United States goes into his pocket, and not into the Treasury; and thus he must go on magnifying the scale of duties he imposes upon the great body of the consumers just in proportion as he confines it to objects which are manufactured in the United States. My theory is different, and we reach opposite conclusions; and though he uses hard terms occasionally, by throwing in such adjectives as "miserable," and such substantives as "folly," as I do not pretend to be wise, and admit that he has much knowledge on finance, in consideration of what I know to be his good temper, and the general feeling he has to respect the feelings of all others, I waive such adjectives, and waive such application of epithets.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator knew I did not apply them to any remark of his.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly; I know the Senator did not apply them unkindly, and therefore I assure him I take no offense, and am replying to him now in the very best possible spirit. He takes the case, however, of sugar, tea, and coffee, and insists that these shall be the articles to which the standard is applied. As tea and coffee are not produced at all in the United States, and sugar is produced here, it would follow that if he collected the same amount of duties from the one produced in the United States that he might collect from the three, a part of that duty would go into the Treasury; and to get an equal amount of money the duty must be increased and the people taxed beyond what they would be if it was equally collected off those articles which were imported entirely. I say it is an increase of taxation, and it must be; for if you increase the price of sugar one cent on the pound, and one half of it is produced in the limits of the United States, that cent which is paid upon every pound produced in the United States goes to the producers and not to the Treasury, and you must increase the cost above the one cent in order to be enabled to get the amount which is to be paid into the Treasury. I think it is a simple proposition. I do not say it would be folly to argue the other side, but that is what I think.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not like to protract this debate; but I certainly endeavor to confine my words as I do my feelings, to respect for the arguments of Senators. The position I took was, that the day had gone by when there was any necessity for meeting this question as a question of protection directly. But the Senator says now, that if in the cases put—and I agree he puts them very fairly—we add to the price of sugar by the amount of duty imposed, we thereby aid the producer, as well as put money into the Treasury; and to the extent that we aid the producer we deprive the Treasury of revenue. That I do not think is a sound position. I say that there are two considerations on that point. Now, I will call the attention of the Senator to this fact: suppose we raised no sugar—and it would not be produced without the incidental protection the duty caused—is it at all certain that the price of sugar to the consumer would be cheapened?

Mr. DAVIS. It might not be.

Mr. SIMMONS. Would it not necessarily be increased in the absence of competition produced in the other country? Is it not inevitable?

Mr. DAVIS. A limited supply might cause that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly it would be. It may be that it would be dearer to the extent of the duty. In that case we save the entire sum, and the foreign producer pays the whole tax. I do not say we save the entire sum; but I do say there is no man who ever investigated this subject but will come to the conclusion, that in the competition between the foreign and domestic producer, a portion of the burden is to be inevitably taken out of the pocket of the foreign producer; and if you look to all our correspondence with foreign countries, and see the eagerness with which they endeavor to get our duties down, you will find that they so regard it.

Now I am not disposed to prolong this debate. I am not against commerce. I do not believe, however, that it is to the interest of any nation to seek out countries for the importation of articles it can produce at home. I do not believe there is any advantage in reciprocal treaties by which we import breadstuffs from Canada when we cannot sell half we produce ourselves. These are the questions on which I am at issue with those who go on the free-trade doctrine. I am willing to have a reciprocal exchange of products with any nation in the world; but when you come to get it in as we have been doing the last five years, it is an entirely different question. I will not pursue this subject further.

Mr. SHIELDS. I merely wish to say a word in explanation of the vote I intend to give. I want, as far as I understand the question, to be practical. I think that this is not a favorable time nor the proper way to tamper with the revenue. I should be very glad to vote for a repeal of the duty on salt, for I regard it like air, light, and water, as one of the necessities of life, and if such a measure were brought up properly I should vote for it; but on this occasion, and at this time, I am not prepared to vote for the reduction of any duty. I shall vote, therefore, against both the amendments. On the other point, with regard to the bounty on the fisheries, as a general principle, I regard such bounties as very unequal and improper. I have taken occasion to read the speech of the honorable Senator from Alabama very carefully, and I certainly give him great credit for the manner in which he has investigated the subject; he has thrown great light on it; but I will take the liberty of suggesting that that honorable Senator extend his investigation a little further, and not confine himself to this one particular interest, but give us a general system of retrenchment. I do not regard these bounties as in the nature of taxes, duties, imposts, or excises. I differ with the Senator on the constitutional point. This is simply a question of retrenchment, and the retrenchment of a bounty to a private interest. As a general principle the honorable Senator is perfectly correct. I think these bounties, as a general principle, should never be resorted to. There may be exceptions; there have been exceptions. This has been considered one of the exceptions; the wise statesmen of former times regarded it as a peculiar, exceptional case.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment? That has been repeated time and again here, and as I have regarded this whole debate as merely fighting against time and wearing out the patience and pertinacity of purpose on this side of the House, which it may be supposed is not as great as on the other, I have suffered the remark to be repeated without correction—but I deny it, and I think I have demonstrated, not only by moral but mathematical reasoning, that this was not the policy of the fathers. They never meant to give bounty, but only an allowance in lieu of drawback; and I showed that the Senators from the State of Massachusetts, and the Representatives in the other House disdained to ask favor, they disdained to claim bounty, and declared they demanded but justice. They asked nothing more than to be refunded their own money. They disdained to come here and beg favors, or to beg bounty, or to beg tribute from other people. That is what they said.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have taken great care to examine that distinction, and I recognize it fully. The honorable Senator presented it as I thought very fairly and fully. Certainly, in the first instance, the allowance was considered a drawback, but it has latterly run into what may be considered a bounty.

Mr. CLAY. Since 1830, by the reduction of the salt duty.

Mr. SHIELDS. I was about to say that I am unwilling at this time, in the present state of the prostration of the country, to strike at this single solitary interest, by way of retrenchment, lest we might entirely prostrate that interest. Now, the honorable Senator says this bill has been discussed in the Senate heretofore, and I am sorry that I may be treading upon ground that has been gone over before; but not having been here, I hope he will pardon me. I did not happen to have a seat in the body when the question was discussed.

It is an old system; and, notwithstanding it is now attacked, it has produced some of the best seamen and the bravest men this country has had. In addition to that, it was considered one of the best schools in the olden times for hardy, bold, gallant seamen, and the history of the country proves that that is the fact. But there is one consideration in which I have not examined it; and I must vote according to my own notions, utterly without regard to whether this is a party question or not. I do not care a cent whether it is or not. I mean to vote according to my honest convictions, I care not on which side of the Senate I may be found. I am afraid, with my want of information on the subject, to touch this old historic interest; if you please to call it so, that has been so favored by legislation, considered in the olden time as a school of brave seamen—hardy men—men who have manned the decks of your vessels in time of war, and can do so again, and will do so now, if necessary. To take that solitary interest, and strike it down, I am not prepared to do. Sir, systematize retrenchment. This is no kind of legislation, in my humble opinion, anyhow—taking up a thing by piecemeal, and striking at an interest in the South and an interest in the North. I have no kind of respect for such legislation. Take up and go through with a system of retrenchment, and include this in it, and I will go with you. One man strikes at sugar, another man strikes at the cod fishery. I do not like such a course of proceeding.

There is an additional fact which influences my mind. These fishermen who constitute, as I remarked, a hardy, hard-working, bold, daring race of seamen, enter into competition with European labor, which is much cheaper than our labor, and if they are to be kept up at all, it may be necessary to give them some encouragement. That may, or may not, be so. I am not prepared, however, to give this vote lest the effect might be to destroy that interest which is now in competition with the most energetic people in the world. I shall vote, therefore, against the honorable Senator's bill, and against the amendments.

Mr. CLAY. I do not wish the Senator from Minnesota to place me in a false position. I deny that I am striking at this interest. That is an abuse of the word, and it is arraigning me to charge me with striking at an interest, especially when the Senator couples it with my locality, and talks of striking at a northern interest. Here is a bounty paid these men out of the Federal Treasury, collected by taxing other people; and because I am opposed to levying tribute off my people, or off his people, to raise bounty for these men, he charges me with striking at them, and then talks about striking at the sugar interest, as if they stood upon the same basis, when there is no parallelism between them. A duty is levied upon sugar for the support of the Government; but here you levy duties for the purpose of raising bounties in this instance. There is no parallelism whatever in the cases.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not speak of the honorable Senator striking at the interest. I spoke of my own course—that I am not prepared to vote against that interest in its present condition. That is what I spoke of, not of the course of the honorable Senator.

BRITISH AGGRESSIONS.

Mr. MASON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow a message which has been received from the President to be communicated to the Senate, with a view that it may be printed. It is a message communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, information called for relative to alleged aggressions on ships of the United States, at Cuba, and in the Gulf of Mexico. I merely mean to ask that it may be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I hope it will be read.

Mr. MASON. The message is a very short one, merely communicating documents. I shall not ask that anything be read, but simply for its printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) If there be no objection the Chair will lay the message before the Senate. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CLAY. I must object to its being read. I know that the temper of the opponents of this measure is to defeat it by every sort of parliamentary strategy. I do not complain of that. It is perfectly fair. It is usual for minorities to do so. But if the Senate has that message read it may provoke some debate before it is referred, and I object. If this bill be deferred much longer I fear we shall be without a quorum.

Mr. MASON. I hope the Senator does not include me among the opponents of his bill.

Mr. CLAY. Of course not.

Mr. MASON. I know it is a measure of public interest.

Mr. CLAY. It is a matter of no great public concern to have this message referred now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.) The Chair decided, after calling for objection, that the message should be read, no one making objection.

Mr. CLAY. I suppose before it is read I have a right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama objects to the reading of the message.

Mr. MASON. I will state to the Senator that the message is a single page of paper, merely communicating the documents.

Mr. CLAY. It may lead to debate.

Mr. MASON. If it does, I shall waive it.

Mr. CLAY. It will be too late then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take the sense of the Senate on reading the paper, if the Senator from Alabama objects.

The question being put, whether the message should be read, it was decided in the affirmative; there being on a division—ayes 21, noes 17.

The Secretary read the message, which transmits, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, reports from the Secretaries of State and of the Navy concerning the recent search or seizure of American vessels by foreign armed cruisers in the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. MASON. I move that the papers be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask for the reading of the documents.

Mr. MASON. I hope not.

Mr. CLAY. I think that is too late now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order of the Senate having been to refer the papers to a committee, the Chair apprehends they are not now before the Senate without a reconsideration.

FISHING BOUNTIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill to repeal the fishing bounties.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise without any purpose of prolonging this debate, but simply to state, in order to guard against any future misapprehension, the ground of the votes I have to give in the further progress of this question. The Senator from Alabama has said, no doubt as sincerely as he always speaks, that he sees no analogy between the protection of certain branches of industry, which are protected by the incidental effect of our revenue tariff, and the protection of the fisheries by bounties. To me, they seem to be but a part of the same system, that the principle of protection is just as clear and distinct and palpable when you give a bounty as it is when you give protection by imposts upon articles of foreign manufacture or production on coming into competition with American manufactures and productions. Regarding it in this light, as I have had occasion to state before, I shall vote against his bill for abolishing the bounties upon the cod fisheries. In order to carry that measure more successfully through, as I understand it, one honorable Senator has proposed to make the loss of those bounties fall lighter upon the fishermen by remitting the duty upon salt; thus to mitigate the misfortune, or the evil, or the grievance of the fisherman at the expense of the manufacturer of salt. I wish to protect equally the manufacturer of salt and the fisherman. I am, therefore, opposed to abolishing the duty on salt. Another honorable Senator, by an amendment, combines the remission of the duty upon sugar with the proposition to remit the duty upon salt. If the duty upon salt is to be remitted, then I am to go further, and go for a general remission of duties, as far as I can, for the purpose of arresting the whole operation of this embarrassment to the industry of the country. When we vote, I shall vote for the amendment to repeal the duties on sugar by way of amendment to the remission of the duties on salt. When I come to the question, if I shall reach it, I shall vote against the remission of the duties upon either salt or sugar, or the abolition of the bounties.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.]

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Seward, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Sebastian, Shields, Simmons, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—37.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POLK, before the vote was announced, said: My colleague [Mr. GREEN] has paired off with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALLEN,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 18, nays 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wade—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Cameron, Clark, Clay, Clingman, Crittenden, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Green, Gwin, Hale, Hammond, Henderson, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Slidell, Sumner, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—41.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the question was stated to be on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which is to fill the blank in line one, with "the 31st day of December, 1859;" and in line four and five, to strike out the words, "and allowing bounties to," and inserting, "allowances or bounties upon the tonnage," so as to make the bill read:

"That from and after the 31st day of December, 1859, all acts, and parts of acts, giving allowances or bounties upon the tonnage of vessels employed in the bank, or other cod fisheries, be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "1859," and inserting instead, "1862."

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays on the amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. CLAY. I will simply state that that amendment has once been voted down in Committee of the Whole. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. HAMLIN. No; that was an amendment changing it to 1865.

Mr. CLAY. As I have said two or three times before, this bill gives them two years; or, in other words, about seven hundred thousand dollars of bounty, provided they realize as much this year and next year as the average of the last ten years. This proposition would give them five years, which would be equal to nearly three million dollars. I give them, in the way of time, as long as several of the original acts granting the original allowances were intended to continue. Many of them were limited to but two years. I give them but two years, and, in addition to that, they had notice, more than eighteen months ago, that this measure would be pressed.

Mr. WILSON. I do not wish to detain the Senate, or to subject myself to the charge made by the Senator from Alabama to-day, that we were unnecessarily interposing obstacles to the passage of the bill. I think the charge was not well founded. I wish simply to say that the amendment extends the time three years longer than the Senator proposes. It carries it to 1862, instead of 1859, making a difference of three years. I offer the proposition in good faith. If we are to repeal these bounties which have existed, with the exception of three or four years, since the foundation of the Government, I think the Senator ought to be willing to agree to this amendment, and give the capital and persons employed in the cod fisheries an opportunity to work gradually out of the business, or take such other action as they please, so that they will be affected as little as possible by the change.

Mr. CLAY. I must correct again, for the fifth or sixth time, an error of the Senator's. They never got bounty before 1830, if the advocates of the allowance spoke the truth. It is only since 1830 they got bounty. Now, the Senator speaks as if the withdrawing from these men of what is said to amount to about twelve dollars a man is going to break up the cod fishery. My own opinion is, that it will not reduce the number of fish caught, or the cod-liver oil that is made, and that we shall get as many fish as we did before the repeal of the bounty; and as to giving them five years, or, in other words, upwards of three million dollars instead of the $700,000 I propose to give them, it will only delude them, and keep them in the business; whereas, if the bill pass, allowing two years, if they can find a more profitable employment in the coasting trade, or mackerel catching, or whale fishing, they will go into it.

Mr. WILSON. As to the word bounty, the Senator says he has corrected us several times. I use the word bounties, allowances, or drawbacks, in the same sense. It is a matter of protection early commenced by the Government. Now, the Senator says if the extension I propose be made, it will be some three million dollars. It will only be allowing for the whole five years, according to his own statement, some one million five hundred thousand dollars and it is only $900,000 for the three additional years, supposing the amount to be $300,000 annually. It is less than a million dollars. I think it fair if the repeal is to take place at all, as I suppose it is, that these additional three years should be allowed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Douglas, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—30.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment made in Committee of the Whole was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have heard with some attention the discussion upon this subject, and I do not intend to detain the Senate by any lengthened remarks of mine. Under another state of affairs I might be disposed to vote for the passage of this bill; but I think the indications of this morning bespeak for us a prospect of difficulties on the ocean. The message which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations a few minutes ago, would seem to indicate that there is, perhaps, trouble ahead; and that will be, to a great extent, confined to the ocean; and a marine will be necessary; and it ought to be the most efficient we can muster under the auspices of the nation. Our present Navy I consider as practically abolished or disbanded. It is in no situation to compete with the navy of any nation upon earth in its present disorganized state. Our seamen and marines are generally foreigners. They have no tie that binds them to our service but the pay that they get. They are mercenaries. They are not citizens who have at heart the interests of the country. They do not feel concerned for the honor of the national flag. They serve where they can get the best pay. We cannot rely on such men on board our vessels to the extent that is necessary in case of a maritime war. It is essential, then, that we should pursue that policy which is best calculated to strengthen our marine. If war should grow up between the United States and England it will be mainly conducted—at least the efficient part of it—by privateers, manned by active seamen; and I feel satisfied, on reflection, that this policy, inaugurated under the administration of General Jackson was intended with reference to that very object—to foster and increase our mercantile and fishing marine as fast as possible, so as, in the event of war, to enable us to maintain our position on the seas.

Under these circumstances, and with these impressions, I am prepared to vote against the bill before us, believing that even if such a measure were proper, this is not the time to adopt it, as we shall require the most efficient aids possible to maintain our position on the ocean as a maritime Power; and I cannot believe that any good will be brought about by this measure.

Furthermore, the multiplication of seamen and seafaring men will be of advantage to the section of country which I represent, for it will produce competition in the carrying trade. As our products are of a character that require a commercial marine to transport them, I think the increase of a marine force will be of advantage to the South. Therefore, I am willing to encourage that policy which is calculated to increase the number of our seamen and our competition in the carrying trade in time of peace, and then, in the event of war, we shall be in a better situation to meet its emergencies.

The yeas and nays were taken on the passage of the bill, and resulted—yeas 30, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Douglas, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, King, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—25.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to amend the title to make it conform to the bill. The word bounty is used oftentimes inappropriately. In the law the term is allowance, though by some strange perversion of language they apply the term bounty to the drawbacks on the exported pickled fish, and the term allowance to the tonnage of the vessels. I wish to amend it so as to read, "A bill to repeal all laws or parts of laws allowing bounties or allowances to vessels employed in the bank or other cod fisheries."

The title was so amended.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. YULEE. I move to postpone the prior orders, and that the Senate take up the bill relating to the Patent Office, which was under consideration a day or two since. I think it can be disposed of during the session of to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next business in order is the homestead bill, which the Senator from Florida moves to postpone, with all prior orders, to take up the bill (S. No. 180) to amend the several acts now in force in relation to the Patent Office.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for the yeas and nays. The first special order now is the homestead bill.

Mr. YULEE. That bill can come up to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. If it is understood it will come up to-morrow morning, I have no objection.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not consent to that, but will insist on having the homestead bill taken up now.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish merely to remark to the Senate that the homestead bill has been the special order since January last. There are two hours now set apart in the morning for general business, and one sixth of the time, one day in the week, is also set apart for private business. I hope the Senate will proceed in regular order. I do not wish to be obtrusive, or interfere with the propositions of any Senator, but I have been patiently waiting, and I hope the Senate will take up the homestead bill, and let us vote on it.

Mr. YULEE. We have only a fraction of to-day left us now. Perhaps within an hour the Senate will proceed to the consideration of executive business. Within that hour, this bill, which was read the other day, and to which the attention of the Senate, therefore, has been directed, may be disposed of. It will not supersede the order of the bill of the Senator from Tennessee, but I take it—and if I am wrong the Chair will correct me—that, whenever the Calendar is resumed, the homestead bill will be next in order. To-morrow, therefore, as soon as we have passed through the morning hour, the homestead bill will be first in order, in preference to all other business. I presume it will be more agreeable to the Senator from Tennessee to proceed to-morrow with its discussion than to-day. I ask him, therefore, to agree that, by general consent, the consideration of the homestead bill shall be passed over. It need not be formally postponed; it may be suspended until to-morrow, in order that we may proceed to the consideration of the Patent Office bill, which will not occupy long.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. There is no one on this floor more disposed to accommodate than I am; but if this proposition is taken up, it is going to be discussed, and will consume considerable time. It will take no longer to consider it after we are through with the homestead bill than before. It is not more urgent, and I am in hopes we shall take up the homestead bill, and go on with it. I have information that it will be discussed. All the time we consider the homestead bill to-day will be just that time saved to-morrow, which can be appropriated to something else. I hope the Senate will go on with this measure. It is an important one, in which the country is deeply interested.

Mr. YULEE. I will not consume the time of the Senate by insisting on the yeas and nays. I will withdraw my proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to state, and I wish the ear of the Senator from Tennessee, that if the bill named by the Senator from Florida shall come up, and the Senate should consider it, and should adjourn while it is under consideration, it will take precedence of the special order in the morning as the unfinished business of to-day.

Mr. YULEE. I have withdrawn the motion, rather than consume the time of the Senate in foolishly calling the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to withdrawing the motion. It requires unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 25) to grant any person who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish now to indicate an amendment to the second and fifth sections of the bill, which will improve them and make them more acceptable to some of the friends of the bill. In section two, I propose to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, upon application to the register of the land office in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the said register that he or she is the head of a family, or is twenty-one years of age, and that such application is made for his or her exclusive use and benefit, and those specially mentioned in this act, and not either directly or indirectly for the use or benefit of any other person or persons whomsoever; and on making the affidavit as above required, and filing the affidavit with the register, he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the quantity of land already specified: Provided, however, That no certificate shall be given, or patent issued therefor, until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry; and if, at the expiration of such time, the person making such entry, or if he be dead, his widow, or in case of her death, his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry, her heirs or devisees, in case of her death, shall prove by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land, and still reside upon the same, and have not alienated the same, or any part thereof; then in such case, he, she, or they shall be entitled to a patent, as in other cases provided for by law: And provided, further, In case of the death of both father and mother, leaving an infant child or children under twenty-one years of age, the right and the fee shall inure to the benefit of said infant child or children; and the executor, administrator, or guardian may, at any time within two years after the death of the surviving parent, and in accordance with the laws of the State in which such children for the time being have their domicile, sell said land for the benefit of said infants, but for no other purpose; and the purchaser shall acquire the absolute title by the purchase and be entitled to a patent from the United States.

I also propose, in section five, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That if, at any time after filing the affidavit as required in the second section of this act, and before the expiration of the five years aforesaid, it shall be proven, after due notice to the settler, to the satisfaction of the register of the land office, that the person having filed such affidavit shall have actually changed his or her residence, or abandoned the said entry, for more than six months at any time, then, and in that event, the lands so entered shall revert back to the Government, and be disposed of as other public lands are now by law, subject to an appeal to the General Land Office.

I offer these two amendments as an improvement on the sections as they now stand in the bill; and I will remark in this connection, that the bill has been submitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with a view to have the sections made as practicable as possible when brought into operation. It has undergone a thorough scrutiny there; all the sections have been examined, and he thinks that the bill, with the amendments proposed in the second and fifth sections, can be put into successful practical operation.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee a few amendments. The first section of the bill reads, "any person who is the head of a family, or a citizen of the United States, at the date of the passage of this act," shall have a right to enter one hundred and sixty acres. I suggest the striking out of the words, "at the date of the passage of this act," because, as it now reads, no person born after the passage of this act, in case the bill should pass, would ever have a right to make an entry under it. That, I presume, is not what the gentleman means.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I have no objection to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move to amend the first section by striking out the words, "at the date of the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have an amendment to propose in the second section. It provides that a person on making the affidavit prescribed may enter the land, and it then goes on to provide, in lines seventeen, eighteen, and nineteen, that the person making the entry, or his widow, or representatives, "shall prove by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they, have continued to reside upon and cultivate said lands." There is no suggestion as to how long the residence shall have continued. It is to be observed that the person is authorized to enter the land upon making an affidavit. It is not necessary that he should then reside upon that land. There is no requisition that the person entering the land should at that time reside upon it. He is to make the affidavit that he is the head of a family and has no other land, and he may then make the entry. Probably it is not expected that he will be a resident upon it then. I presume a man cannot reside on the land until after he has entered it. When you come to the finishing up of the matter, and making proof so as to obtain a certificate, it is provided that they shall prove, by two credible witnesses, that they have continued to reside upon the land, but there is nothing said as to the term of residence required. It does not say whether it shall be a month, or a year, or five years. I move, in line nineteen of the second section, after the word reside to insert, "for the term of five years;" and the same amendment will be necessary in the substitute for the second section offered by the Senator from Tennessee, which contains the same phraseology.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I think the section fully covers that now; but I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume the Senator from Vermont does not mean to require that the devisees of the person who may originally have entered the land shall prove that they have resided on it five years. That, however, seems to me to be the effect of the amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. All I want is to prove a residence of five years by somebody.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment, I think, will hardly accomplish that object in the phraseology he proposes. It is that he, she, or they shall prove that they have resided on the land for five years.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is, that the person shall prove that the residence has been continued.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest that that would require a change of phraseology; for if the words proposed should be inserted, it would require that the devisee of the person making the entry should prove that he had resided five years on the land.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not think so. The word "they," as there used, is a word expressive of the persons who made the entry, and his successors. The person making the entry, whether man or woman, and those who represent him, are included in the plural number, "they." It does not refer to the two witnesses.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The proposition is that they shall prove by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they, have continued to reside upon and cultivate the land.

Mr. COLLAMER. The words "he, she, or they," there used, are words descriptive of the person who made the original entry, and his successors.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to inquire whether an amendment to the first section would be in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is now a pending amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MASON. I have looked at the bill, and I find that it has been before the Senate for more than four months. It is one of a good deal of detail, and a good deal of interest, and I should not be satisfied to look into the subject at all until I could have the opportunity of doing so with more consideration than is allowed us by the mere presentation of an amendment, which, I understand from the Senator from Tennessee, is a substitute for the second and fifth sections of the bill. I think it would be better to pass the bill over, and let the amendments be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The amendments are not long; they are printed amendments; they are only a slight variation from the sections of the bill as they now stand, and I think they can soon be disposed of.

Mr. MASON. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow; and that the amendments be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The amendments I propose are printed. I understood that I had the floor, and I gave way to the Senator from Vermont to suggest an amendment.

Mr. MASON. I ask the indulgence of the Senator. I did not know that the amendments had appeared in print. I thought they were now offered for the first time. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. These amendments can be agreed upon, and then we shall have the bill before us in its perfected form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question then is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the substitute offered by Mr. Johnson, of Tennessee, for the second section as amended, was adopted. The substitute for the fifth section was also adopted.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill. It is, after the word "entitled" in the fifth line, to insert:

—"to have issued to him by the Commissioner of Public Lands a warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, to be located in the same manner as that under which the bounty land warrants heretofore issued have been located on any of the public lands of the United States subject to entry, the applicant being required to make proof in support of his claim in such manner and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

So as to make the first section read:

That any person who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, shall be entitled to have issued to him or her by the Commissioner of the Public Lands a warrant, &c.

It will be seen that this is an important proposition. It will give to every head of a family who is a citizen of the United States a land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of public land. I am not at this time in favor of the policy of surrendering the public lands in this way. I rather think that, in the straitened circumstances of the Government, they ought to be retained and held; but, if they are to be given away, I think it obviously right to make, and every Senator will see the importance of making, such a distribution of them as is equitable and fair. The operation of my amendment may be readily seen by an illustration: probably in the State of North Carolina there is not one man in twenty who will emigrate to the new States to settle on a tract of public land; the other nineteen are just as meritorious; they are always ready to bear arms in defense of the Government; they pay taxes to support it, and they have the same interest in the public lands, and the same equitable right to them as the people who may go there. Now, with what propriety can I go before my constituents, and say to them, "those of you who may choose to emigrate to a new State shall have the privilege of taking up one hundred and sixty acres of public property, which belongs to all of you; and those of you who do not think proper to emigrate, shall have none?"

It is obvious, therefore, that the effect of this amendment will be to put all citizens of the United States on the same footing; and it will be no injury to those persons whom the Senator from Tennessee wishes to benefit. On the contrary it will be more beneficial to them; for if I understand the provisions of his bill he declares that they must go on the land, remain there for five years, and cultivate it. This is a hardship. We all know that it frequently happens that a poor man settles upon a piece of land, and before he cultivates it for five years he wishes to go somewhere else. He may be disposed to give it up on account of some misfortune; or perhaps, from some inducement to emigrate to another place, he is disposed to abandon the land. In that event, under this bill, he would lose all his labor and lose the title, whereas if my proposition prevails he has his warrant; if he thinks proper to take possession of the land and cultivate it, he has a title at once; but if he emigrates he still may sell the land to somebody else. There is this great advantage in it: the citizens of the old States who do not think proper to go may either realize the money by the warrant, or they may retain it, and when their children emigrate they may always avail themselves of it.

I have another reason, Mr. President, for being in favor of this amendment. The original bill, as it stands, seems to be an inducement, an encouragement to men to emigrate into the new States. I think all the States ought to stand on an equal footing, and I do not see why you should tempt my constituents, or those who live in your State, sir, to go into a new State. I presume Kentucky and North Carolina are just as good as the new States. Why not, then, give equal privileges to everybody? If it is intended, as has been sometimes argued, under this system, to encourage industry by compelling men to work who do not want to work, I would inquire of every Senator, what right have we to compel American freemen to work land if they do not wish to do it? I hold that every citizen of the United States should be free to do as he pleases; and the idea of obliging men, before you give them title to property, to perform this amount of labor, I think is certainly unjust. I do not hold that we, as Senators or members of Congress, or as a part of the Government, have any right to say to our people: "You are too lazy; we want to stimulate you to go off and get to work cutting down trees and cultivating land."

I think, therefore, every Senator will see, in a moment's reflection, that if any such system as this is to be adopted, an amendment like mine is free from all these objections. In the first place, it leaves all the States on an equal footing; it holds out no unjust inducement to our people to engage in a particular line of business which they may not have a fancy for, and it puts those who may choose to remain in their own States, and attend to their business there, upon an equal footing. I ask them if there be anything more just, if this system is to be adopted, than such a proposition as that? I hope the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. PUGH. It seems to me that my friend, the Senator from North Carolina, misunderstands the principle of the bill itself. I propose no gratuity in voting for this bill; nothing of the sort. I think it will appear, from the Congressional Globe, that I said here two years ago that I believed the work and labor, paid at the ordinary wages, that had been bestowed in the improvement of the land, was worth more than the land itself. All the millions of acres owned by the Government of the United States are not worth a shilling—not one of them—until you put a man on them. Nobody will buy them; they are of no use. But, if you bring all this vast unoccupied domain into the occupation of the actual settler, the man who will improve it; you will improve the revenues of the country, because the revenue of this Government, after all, is derived from duties—duties on imported articles. I consider that the man who will go into the Territories, or unoccupied domain of the United States, and cultivate one hundred and sixty acres for five years, has earned thrice, and more, the value of it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will ask my friend (for I believe he and myself agree in the general principles of free trade,) if it is to the advantage of this man that he should go there, why not leave him to decide on it for himself? It has been argued that you should induce men to manufacture by holding out bounties or protection to them. He and I belong to the party that say the people are capable of judging what is their own interest, and if they do not choose to embark in manufactures, let us not impose any restriction to encourage them in doing so. I ask him if the same principle does not now apply. If it is to the advantage of these persons to go West and cultivate this land, let them go and do it. If it is not, why shall we, by depriving the Federal Government of this land, hold out inducements to compel men to go there when they would not otherwise be inclined to go.

Mr. PUGH. I say again, I propose neither to drive them there nor to persuade them there. I really think the prices at which the public lands are held are too high altogether; and, as I said before, I believe the man that goes upon the land and actually cultivates it for five years, has earned more than the value of the land itself; and I believe, to-day, that you may take all the real estate of the State which I have the honor to represent, and appraise it independent of the improvements, and it would not pay for the daily work, estimated at ordinary farm wages, which has been bestowed upon it since that country was first settled. I think there never was such an error—

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then the gentleman will see if that be the true view of it, instead of encouraging men to go there and do work by which they will lose, he ought rather to discourage them.

Mr. PUGH. I do not encourage them to go there for any benefit they will do themselves. I think it is an absolute advantage to the whole country; I think it is a great advantage that the thousands of persons in the various cities, who are living precariously, should go to some useful industry, which would relieve the community from the burden of their present maintenance.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will ask this further question: is not my friend running into the same argument by which some persons insist that Government shall compel the people to be temperate, to occupy themselves in industry, and not idle their time? Do not all sumptuary and restrictive laws rest on exactly the sort of argument my friend uses, namely, that the people are neglecting their interest and damaging themselves by staying in the old States, and he wishes to induce them to go abroad? Can he defend it on any principle that will not cover the other cases to which I have just alluded?

Mr. PUGH. I stated before, I do not propose it for any great benefit they will do themselves. I think it will be a benefit to the whole community. I do not propose to compel a man to go to the new States; but I simply say to every man in the United States: if you are disposed to go on the public domain and cultivate one hundred and sixty acres of land, you shall have it. It is no loss to us; for, as I said before, the land is worth nothing until the man goes there. Besides, I believe the bill is confined to the alternate sections, and that certainly gives us all the advantage of the railroad grant system.

Now, I ask the Senate of the United States what good all this land will do us? You are proposing to donate vast tracts of it for a Pacific railroad. Why, sir, you will never make a railroad until the afternoon of the day of judgment by such a system; but if you allow the country to be settled, the railroad will be made by the parties interested. What do we want with the land? What good will it do us? There is a bill on the table from the House of Representatives granting millions on millions of acres for the endowment of agricultural colleges. The public lands of the Government have become a source of mere plunder for every scheme—endowing insane institutions, endowing colleges, endowing literary institutes. If you give the land to actual settlers, you are really benefiting the whole country, and you are rendering more benefit to the cause of agriculture than ten thousand such agricultural bills as have been sent here from the House of Representatives.

Mr. POLK. Allow me to suggest to the Senator that as I have heard the sections of the bill read, I do not think it requires any cultivation of the land at all, but merely that the man shall reside there.

Mr. PUGH. Five years. I think he will cultivate it if you require him to reside on it five years. I think if you require him to remain on the tract, and actually stop five years, you will insure a good deal of cultivation; and that is practically what the bill amounts to. It is only the principle of your preemption law, except that you reduce the price of the land.

Mr. POLK. I suggest, if the object is that he shall cultivate and improve the land, would it not be better to require him in the act to do that thing?

Mr. PUGH. I have no objection to that. That

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1st Session.

THURSDAY, MAY 20, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 141.

is a mere verbal matter. My friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ALLEN] calls my attention to the bill. The word "cultivate" is in it, in the second section:

"Shall prove, by two credible witnesses, that he, she, or they, have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land, and still resides upon the same."

I was about to say—and it was only to guard myself against misconstruction—that I do not propose to vote for this bill on the idea of gratuity to the individual. I think, if he goes upon that land, resides there, and cultivates it for five years, he has earned the full value. I think it will be for the public interest. I think it will redound to the advantage of the revenues of the General Government; whether you estimate upon the principle of direct taxation, which would bring the land itself upon the tax list, or whether you estimate upon the increase of the duties on imported goods. I think it will encourage the cause of agriculture far more than the bill for the endowment of colleges sent to us by the House of Representatives.

At present, the public lands are here a source of plunder. We have granted millions on millions for the construction of railroads; and we have not only debauched Congress itself, but we have debauched the Legislatures of many of the States of the Union: It was only last evening that I saw in one of the New York papers an abstract of a report made to the Legislature of one of the States as to the amount of pensions, gifts, and bribes that had been given to the members of the Legislature of a State to influence it in the distribution of our bounty for railroad grants, by which it appeared that an absolute majority of the members of each House of the Legislature and of the State officers had been bribed by promises of stock and bonds of the company for the distribution of the lands.

It is well known to the Senate that I have opposed all the railroad grants without exception in the beginning, and that I am opposed to the agricultural bill that has come to us from the House of Representatives, and I am satisfied that the only way to remedy the abuse of the public domain is to give it to the actual settler. I would rather give it to him under a preemption law, or if that is too high, under a graduation law, but I am satisfied that it is not sufficient to correct the evil. I am willing to give it to him for nothing, and therefore I shall vote for this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Mr. President, I was in hopes this bill would pass with little or no opposition. The subject has been before the country for a considerable length of time.

Mr. MASON. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. As he is going into the general subject, I think it due to him and the occasion, that we should hear him at an earlier hour in the day. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 19, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. Mr. ROGERS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I am instructed by the Committee of Elections to report back the memorial of H. P. Brooks, contesting the right of H. WINTER DAVIS to a seat upon this floor, and ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

While I am on the floor, I wish to give notice that the reports in the Ohio contested-election case are printed, and I propose calling up that case in the House to-morrow.

The motion to discharge the committee from the consideration of the memorial of H. P. Brooks was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. BOYCE. I ask the consent of the House to present the report of the select committee on the subject of the expenses of the Government for the purpose of reference.

There being no objection, the report was received, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is that the report on the tariff question?

Mr. BOYCE. It is.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit the motion, that five thousand extra copies of that report be printed.

The motion, under the rules, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. What is the regular order of business this morning?

The SPEAKER. It is the consideration of the report of the select committee on the Fort Snelling investigation.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Will that take precedence of a motion to call the committees for reports?

The SPEAKER. It will.

SLOO GRANT.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is requested, to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, all the information which may be in the possession of the Government as to the position of the work across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, which has been heretofore prosecuted under the Sloo grant, and all the instructions which have heretofore been given by the Executive to the Minister of the United States in Mexico, touching, or in anywise affecting, the operations of the said Sloo under said grant; and especially whether the Executive of the United States has been privy to the annulling of the grant to said Sloo by decree of the Mexican Executive to that effect; and that he further communicate to this House whether said grant has passed into the hands of other parties under the advice or suggestion of the Executive of the United States, or with any other person connected therewith, with the knowledge of the President. If so, who the said party is, and upon what terms the said party has acquired the claim, and such information as may be in possession of the Executive as to the prosecution of said work on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec by that party since the obtaining of the said decree, and also whether any mail contract has been granted to the said persons by this Government or any Department thereof, and if so, upon what security and authority.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 312) to provide for the collection and safe-keeping of the public archives in the State of California.

Also, that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 239) for the admission of Oregon into the Union, in which he asked the concurrence of the House.

JOSEPH CLYMER.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the consent of the House to submit a motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the adverse report of the Court of Claims on the case of Joseph Clymer, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims. The report states that the court has no jurisdiction in the case, leaving it in the discretion of Congress. I hope there will be no objection.

There being no objection; the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the report, and it was referred to the Committee of Claims.

CORRECTION.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a personal explanation. The matter is this: I notice in the Globe of yesterday that I am not recorded as voting upon the resolution for expelling the Doorkeeper. I was present, and voted in the negative.

PRINTING OF AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. SINGLETON. I rise to a privileged question. I submit from the Committee on Printing the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives two hundred thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Patents on agriculture, for 1857, and ten thousand for the use of the Patent Office: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages contained in said report shall not exceed five hundred and sixty-eight, including ten pages of illustrations on wood: And provided further, That the entire amount of copy necessary to complete said report be placed in the hands of the Superintendent of Public Printing on or before the 31st day of August next.

Mr. GARNETT. I object to that report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire if that report has been submitted to the House?

The SPEAKER. A portion of it has.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, sir, I am opposed to printing one word more than has been communicated to the House.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will make a very brief explanation of the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask whether this report has been ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. When?

The SPEAKER. About a week ago.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, sir, I have been watching this thing all along, and I have seen nothing of it. I think it is time to stop the printing of these documents which have not been written, and that we might as well commence now.

Mr. SINGLETON. If I can have the attention of the House for a short time, I will explain this matter. I intend to make no long speech about it. The number which we have printed is identically the same which has been printed of the agricultural part of the Patent Office report for some years past—two hundred thousand copies.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Not more than two sessions. The number which was formerly printed was one hundred thousand. The House at the first or second session of the last Congress, I do not recollect which, for the first time printed two hundred thousand.

Mr. SINGLETON. Well, sir, I know it was the case for several sessions back.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not think it went back of the first session of last Congress.

Mr. SINGLETON. I have to say further in regard to the matter, that the Committee on Printing have determined that there shall be no colored plates in the agricultural report for the year 1857, as there have been for several preceding years. We have determined to dispense with these colored plates entirely. This a saving to the Government of from forty to fifty thousand dollars. We also provide that there shall only be ten pages of wood cuts in that volume, the cost of which will scarcely amount to anything. I think the cost of those cuts will not average over twenty dollars, and the placing of them in the volume will cost no more than ordinary printing. The committee are of the opinion, notwithstanding the gentleman from Tennessee differs from us, that this is a work which should be continued for the benefit of the agricultural interests of the country. We find that there is a great demand for the work; and, so far as my own experience is concerned, I believe it has been a source of great benefit to the country, and has tended more to create a spirit of emulation amongst the planters, and to get up the formation of agricultural societies, than anything which has ever been done by this body. The agricultural interest of the country is much larger than any other, and the farmers and planters are, to all intents and purposes, the tax-paying part of the community. We very well know that the producer is the man upon whom the taxes for the support of this Government must eventually fall. And it does seem to me that, although the expense of this work may be considerable, it is a good investment. The book will not cost a sum exceeding fifty or sixty cents per volume; and there cannot be procured, that I am aware of, at any bookstore, a work containing the same amount of information for the planter for the same money. I have much larger applications for this work than I can answer. I find that not only the wealthy planters, but the poor men are taking an interest in it, and that it is creating that sort of spirit of emulation amongst the planters which has heretofore been wanting in the community.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to say anything more in reference to this matter. It seems to me that every man must be impressed with the importance of printing the book; and if we print at all, we should have at least two hundred thousand copies of it. If you reduce that number, you might as well dispense with its publication altogether. I presume that every man has made up his mind on the subject, and I therefore call for the previous question.

Mr. GARNETT. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will withdraw the previous question for a moment, that I may say a few words.

Mr. SINGLETON. I cannot withdraw it for any one.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution, the House was divided. The Speaker announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it; whereupon—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays.

The House was divided on the call for the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes 21, noes 111; when—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is adopted. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could not make the motion, as the question had been taken.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I appeal from that decision. I have rights here which I wish to have protected. I made the motion before the result of the vote was announced.

The SPEAKER. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" The precise state of facts is this: the question was first taken by acclamation. The Chair stated that the ayes appeared to have it; the gentleman from Tennessee called for the yeas and nays; the House refused the yeas and nays. The gentleman then called for tellers on the yeas and nays. The House refused the tellers. Then the gentleman from Tennessee moved to lay the resolution on the table. The vote had been previously taken, and the Chair announced the result, stating it was too late for the gentleman from Tennessee to make a motion to lay upon the table after the House had determined by a vote to adopt the resolution. From that decision of the Chair the gentleman appeals.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to lay the appeal on the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the appeal was laid on the table.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House, for the remaining days of this week, at half past four o'clock, p. m., do take a recess until half past seven o'clock, p. m., at which time the House shall resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union generally, and that at such sittings of the committee no motion be in order, except that the committee rise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I object.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I think it would be better, if we intend to adjourn in June, to agree to the resolution, and have evening sessions for general debate. I trust, therefore, that the gentleman from Mississippi will withdraw his objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. No, sir; I do not withdraw it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to any recess.

FORT SNELLING.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered by the House, that to-day has been set apart for the purpose of taking up as the special order the resolution of the committee appointed to investigate the facts and circumstances connected with the sale of Fort Snelling. By agreement of the committee it is now desired—and it is hardly necessary that I should state the reasons—that this order shall be postponed; and I rise for the purpose of making the motion that the special order be postponed until Wednesday of next week.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF BOOKS BY CONGRESS.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House this morning to certain resolutions that are embodied in report No. 378. Some time since the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] introduced a resolution asking the attention of the Committee on Printing to the propriety of reducing the number of certain works ordered by previous Congresses. This report is in response to that resolution. It is short, and I ask that it be read, and I shall ask for action upon the resolutions accompanying it this morning.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is this a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. NICHOLS. Yes, sir, it is a report made in response to a resolution of the House.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask the particular attention of gentlemen to the report, as we are about to act upon it.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Joint Committee on Printing, who were instructed by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th of April last "to inquire into the propriety of suspending the printing of any books which may have been ordered by any previous Congress; and if the printing of any of said books has been commenced, that they inquire how far the work has progressed, and whether it is proper to discontinue their publication, and pay for the work which may have been done; and that they report by bill or otherwise," respectfully ask leave to submit the following report:

That they have carefully examined into the matters referred to them, and have found that all the reports ordered to be printed by Congress, previous to the present session, have either been completed, or are in such a state of forwardness that the suspension of either of them would result in the loss of much valuable information to the country, which has been collected at very great expense.

Their investigations, however, have led them to the conclusion that, while they recommend the completion of the printing of all the reports heretofore ordered, the number of copies may be so reduced upon some of the volumes not yet printed as to effect a very considerable saving of the public money, and, at the same time, furnish as many copies of each as will meet all the requirements of the Government and of the public.

The unfinished works are three in number; as follows:

1. The Report of the results of the United States Naval Astronomical Expedition to Chili, ordered to be printed at the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress. This work will comprise six volumes; four of which are printed, and the printing of the remaining two is progressing simultaneously. The number of extra copies being small—one thousand for the Senate and two thousand for the House—the saving of expense to be effected by rescinding the resolutions to print them would be so inconsiderable that the committee do not deem it expedient to recommend any interference with existing orders.

2. Reports of Explorations and Surveys to ascertain the most practicable and economical route for a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean. These reports will make twelve large quarto volumes, (including one volume of charts,) elaborately illustrated. The Senate has ordered the printing of twelve thousand four hundred copies, and the House eleven thousand five hundred and twenty copies. The printing of eight volumes has been completed; the ninth and tenth have been nearly finished; the eleventh (comprising the narrative of Governor Stevens's expedition) has not yet been commenced, nor the copy furnished; and the printing of the twelfth, being the volume of charts, has not yet been commenced, though the whole expense of engraving these charts on copper, amounting to about forty-five thousand dollars, has been incurred. Inasmuch as the volume comprising the narrative of Governor Stevens's expedition will not be prepared in time to commence the printing previous to the next session of Congress, and as a disposition is manifested to curtail all expenditures in reference to this work that can with propriety be made, your committee submit a resolution herewith which dispenses with the publication of this volume until Congress shall otherwise direct. The cost of this volume is estimated at $103,000.

The committee also recommend that the number of copies of the volume of charts be reduced from twenty three thousand nine hundred and twenty to three thousand nine hundred and twenty copies, which will give the usual number of copies for the two Houses of Congress, five hundred copies for the use of the War Department, and fifty copies heretofore ordered by the Senate to each of the officers commanding expeditions. This will effect a saving of upwards of eighty thousand dollars. Should the wants of the Government hereafter require an additional number of these charts, they could be procured at small expense, as the plates from which they are printed are the property of Congress, and will be preserved for future use.

3. Report of the United States Commissioner to survey the boundary line between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, ordered to be printed at the first session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress. This report comprises two volumes, the first of which has been completed. Of the second volume, the Senate has ordered the printing of two thousand extra copies; and, if the order of the House to print the report included also the printing of the second volume or appendix, there are required for the House ten thousand extra copies. This volume will contain about five hundred pages of text, and two hundred and eighty two pages of illustrations; and its estimated cost is $107,000. The engraved plates for this volume have all been contracted for, under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, and are nearly completed.

As the number of copies ordered appears to be more than the public interest requires, the committees recommend that it be reduced to one thousand extra copies for the Senate, and three thousand for the House, thereby effecting a saving of about sixty thousand dollars.

There are also six large index maps engraved on copper; but as they are not intended to be bound in either of the volumes of the report, and as there appears to be no general interest attached to them, it is recommended that they be turned over to the Secretary of the Interior, who could have copies printed from time to time, as the public interest might require.

The amount required to complete the printing and binding of these reports, with the illustrations, is estimated at $643,423. To stop all of them at present would effect an apparent saving of probably four hundred thousand dollars; but this would cut off entirely the fourth and fifth volumes of the astronomical report, four volumes of the Pacific railroad reports, and the second volume of the Mexican boundary report, and would render wholly valueless printed and engraved matter, which has either been paid for or yet to be paid for, amounting to more than half a million of dollars; much of which, doubtless, is absolutely necessary for the uses of Government, and all of which is valuable or interesting to the public. If, however, the recommendations of the committee meet the approbation of Congress, the sum of $306,000 will complete all the reports in reduced numbers, (though it is believed sufficiently large for all necessary purposes,) and a saving thereby effected of about three hundred and thirty thousand dollars.

The committee, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th February, 1853, directing the printing of ten thousand extra copies of the reports of the explorations and surveys to ascertain the most practicable and economical route for a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean, be so far modified as that no extra copies of the volume of charts be printed for distribution by the members of this House; and that the printing of the volume comprising the narrative of the expedition under Governor Stevens, be suspended until the further order of the House.

Resolved, That the resolution of this House of 15th August, 1850, which directs the printing of ten thousand extra copies of the report of Major Emory on the Mexican boundary survey, be so far modified as to authorize the printing of three thousand extra copies, for distribution by the members of this House, of the second volume or appendix to said report.

Mr. NICHOLS. I desire simply to state—

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he intends to call the previous question upon the resolution?

Mr. NICHOLS. That is my intention.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope the gentleman will do so.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. NICHOLS. I desire to go on without interruption if I can, and I say it with no disrespect to any member of the House. I will yield to the gentleman to propound a question.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Will the gentleman permit me to offer an amendment to his resolution?

Mr. NICHOLS. I desire to make my own statement in reference to this matter. I will allow the gentleman to indicate to the House his amendment hereafter, and then decide whether I will withdraw the previous question to admit it.

Wherever a work has not been commenced, wherever no contracts have been let, wherever no obligation has been incurred on the part of the Government under the orders of previous Congress, we strike the work all down. It is our intention to do so, and I call the attention of the House to one single fact in regard to the Pacific railroad.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NICHOLS. I beg the gentleman to understand that I wish to dispose of this question without interruption to the other business of the House. I think I shall anticipate the gentleman's question before I get through. I say that where ever no liability has been incurred, we seek to cut off the work, to stop it here, and to save expense. But we recommend the continuance of most of the work that has progressed so far towards completion that to stop it now would subject the Government to reclamations for damages, and would be productive of no good in the end. But where ever the work has not been commenced, it is recommended by the committee that it shall not be done, and that nothing more shall be commenced.

I call the attention of the House to these Pacific railroad surveys. Originally, the work was estimated for, and its publication was recommended upon the assurances of those who had it in charge that it would make only four volumes. It was subsequently ascertained that they proposed to make six volumes of it. And now we have information that a twelfth volume has been prepared during this session of Congress, and has been so far advanced in its preparation that they ask the Government to make it a supplemental volume to the work. Sir, if there is no check put to it, what assurance have we that the work ever will be completed? We propose a discontinuance of it, and a notification to those who have it in charge that their labors ought to conclude, if they have not done so.

In reference to the charts and maps, I desire to call the attention of the House to a practical question. We propose, inasmuch as they have been prepared, to turn them over to the Secretary of the Interior. They are public property, the property of the Government. They have been prepared under appropriations made by Congress under the direction of the Secretary of War, without the concurrence of the Superintendent of Public Printing at all, and whenever occasion requires the printing or publication of any more maps, then the property is in the hands of the Government, and Congress can order their publication. I will state, in conclusion, that the result which we arrived at was that, by the adoption of the committee's report, a saving of $306,000 would be effected. I now move the previous question.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. We have published, I believe, eight or ten volumes of the Pacific railroad surveys, all pertaining to southern routes. Now, I ask the House, if they are willing to suppress the only volume that we are to have in relation to the extreme northern route? I desire to move to strike out that part of the resolution.

Mr. NICHOLS. I will say in reply to the gentleman, that the surveys of Governor Stevens are embraced in the first volume, and the volume that he now proposes to submit is simply the narrative and natural history of these explorations. I insist on the call for the previous question.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I hope the House will vote down the previous question. The simple preliminary explorations of the northern route are all that are in the first volume.

Mr. GREENWOOD demanded tellers on the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. REAGAN and BUFFINGTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 44.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. WALBRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. COBB called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WALBRIDGE and SINGLETON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-eight.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I ask for a division of the question. There are two resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot now entertain the call for a division. If the gentleman had asked for a division before the previous question was seconded he would have been entitled to it.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I will not appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 115, nays 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Blair, Boeck, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Cobb, John Cochran, Corning, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Horton, Hughes, Huyler, Jack, son, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kilgore, Jacob M. Kunkel-

Lamar, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Moore, Isaac N. Washburne, Wilson, and Wood—65.

So the resolutions were adopted.

Mr. NICHOLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLS. I move to refer the estimates contained in the report to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. GARNETT. Mr. Speaker, my friend from South Carolina [Mr. BRYCE] made a report this morning from a select committee, of which I am a member. I desire to ask leave to present hereafter a minority report, which is not quite prepared.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, in the Chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 200) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the amendment of Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, to strike out the following clause of the bill:

"For collection of agricultural statistics, investigations for promoting agriculture and rural economy, and the procurement and distribution of cuttings and seeds, $60,000."

Mr. LOVEJOY. Is an amendment to the amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is open to amendment.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$60,000," and inserting "$100,000."

Mr. Chairman, we annually vote here millions piled upon millions, almost without discussion, and without opposition, for the Army and for the Navy—$10,000,000 in deficiency bills, and all that sort of thing; but when we come to a proposition to give a few thousands instead of millions for agriculture, for the benefit of the class which really bear the greater portion of the burdens of the Government, it is met with objection and opposition.

We have been chasing down doorkeepers and clerks and reporters and messengers and pages, we have set figure-fours for catching the mice which are eating Uncle Sam's cheese, while the wolves have been gorging themselves from the fold. Now I protest against taking out the little pittance that we vote here for the farming interest.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL] moves to strike out the entire clause. We have willingly paid for war-horses, and for warriors to ride them, and who do ride them until they are as destitute of caudal appendages as was Tam O'Shanter's mare, according to the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL] himself. And yet he cannot vote a small appropriation for seeds and cuttings for the farming population.

Mr. DEAN, (in his seat.) Turnips.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Yes, sir; there is an attempt to ridicule this appropriation on the ground that it is for the purchase of hollyhocks and morning-glories and mignonnettes and French poppies. Now, sir, I would as soon vote money for poppies as popinjays. It is well known that we vote means for grinding out popinjays at the Military Academy at West Point, who strut around with little epaulettes upon their shoulders, and red or yellow stripes up and down their pants. They are swarming over the country everywhere like the frogs and locusts of Egypt. You have no appropriate use for only a small portion of these persons. Some of them, it seems, are employed as lamp-lighters, and horses are provided for them to ride up stairs to pour oil into their lamps, I suppose; for I do not know what other use they have for horses.

But all this is right enough. I do not know whether these young gentlemen could couch a lance in an actual tilt or not; they no doubt understand the tournament of "les Lanciers." I do not know how well they understand the drill of the manual exercise; they are familiar with the mazes of the polka and the waltz. I do not know how well they understand marching to the sound of martial music to the field of battle; but they know perfectly well how to saunter around in your parlor hotel, stroking down their mustaches, and playing all the pranks of an exquisite.

To pay large sums to educate these dapper gentleman, is all well enough; but nothing can be voted for the farming interest. Why, sir, I would sooner vote money for good cabbage-heads. But, sir, the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky are all well enough against the abuses of this thing; but not against the thing itself. If you are going against everything that is abused, there would be but very little of the Government left. If you will look at the Administration itself, you will find, as I think, that it is composed of measureless abuses; but that is a matter of opinion.

Now, sir, these military men are to be found everywhere. The superintendent for constructing this Capitol must be a military man; and if you ask for their monuments, I would reply in the language of the epitaph of Sir Christopher Wren, in St. Paul's: "Si monumentum queris, circumspice." If you want a monument of military architecture, look at the meretricious and garish gilding of these walls, and the splendid specimens of fresco paintings in these panels. And then go down into the Agricultural Committee-room—at one end is a representation of Old Put leaving his plow; and at the other end is Cincinnatus, also leaving his plow.

Now, sir, the proper idea is, in my view, to have given some paintings that would represent the agriculture of the present time—of 1858—so that one or three hundred years hence those who see them should learn what was the condition of agriculture of the present year. There is one exception—that of a reaper. This is as it should be. That is on one side, in the middle of a field of wheat, and looks very well, except that it ought to have been at the side of the field, as that is where cutting begins. Over head, we have pictures of Bacchus, Ceres, and so on, surrounded with cupids, cherubs, &c., to the end of heathen mythology. All this we have; but not a single specimen of the valuable breeds of cattle, horses, sheep, &c., which are now found in the country. In another panel, we have a company of harvesters, with the sickle, which is well enough, only a quarter of a century too late.

But worst of all, there is not a single picture to represent maize. A panel ought to have been given to this single production. It should have been represented in its different stages; as it emerges, weak, and diminutive, from the ground; as it sways in its dark luxuriance of June and July; and then as it waves its tasseled crest, like the plumes of an armed host; and last, in its rich golden maturity.

The picture of Putnam would have been very well in the committee-room of Revolutionary Claims, but has no significance where it is, as it is a revolutionary reminiscence. In the place of this should have been the picture of a western plow, with its polished steel mold-board, with the hardy yeoman, with one hand resting on the plow-handle, and with the other holding a span of bays, with arched neck and neatly-trimmed harness. Pictures are symbols of ideas, and this would have told to the future the present mode of culture of free labor. At the opposite end, in the place of Cincinnatus and his plow, (the plow of two thousand years ago,) there should have been a negro slave, with untidy clothing, with a slouching gait, shuffling along by the side of a mule team, with ragged harness and rope traces, drawing a barrel of water on the forks of a tree. This would represent the idea of slave labor. Thus we should have a symbol of the two systems of labor now struggling for the ascendancy.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I presume the House will very readily concur with me in the opinion, as a matter of courtesy at least, that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] had the management of this great Republic, things would be infinitely better managed than they are at present. He reminds me very much of the man who was always finding fault with the weather, sometimes complaining that it rained a little too much, sometimes that it was a little too dry; but always finding fault with the arrangements of Him who rules on high, and governs all things well. I do not, however, intend to indulge in criticism, and I will therefore address myself to the question now under consideration. I will not discuss the question of the jurisdiction of the House over this question, or of the propriety of making the members of the House the great seed distributors of the Republic.

In the first instance, allow me to say that one objection I have to the measure is, that it is utterly impossible for the members of the House to send seeds to all their constituents. There is not a member here who has not experienced the inconveniences arising from that fact. It is utterly impossible for him to obtain a supply sufficient to furnish every constituent, and the effect of discriminating is that while he flatters one he offends another.

Mr. STANTON. Yes, a dozen others.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Yes, that is true. A MEMBER. Send them in smaller parcels.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Gentlemen may scatter their seeds in small parcels and spread them over more surface.

Mr. STANTON. That makes the matter still worse.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Yes, sir; I say it is a great labor for the Representatives upon this floor to engage in this business of distribution. It is impossible to be performed without giving more or less offense, and I have no doubt it is a source of much unpopularity.

But there is another view of the subject. Is there any necessity for this appropriation? Can the people of the country derive their seeds in no other way than through this channel? I say they can usually do it, for where there is a demand, there is enterprise enough to supply that demand. What right have we to come into competition with the seedmen of the country—with that legitimate individual competition which is for the benefit of the whole people? What right have we to set up an establishment, in a marble building here, to come into competition with the seed-stores of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other cities? That is what we are doing. We are the rivals of the private enterprises of the American people. Ought we to occupy that position? There is not a gentleman here who will not admit that what we do here is within the reach of private enterprise.

In these two aspects, it does seem to me that we ought to rid ourselves of this duty, because, in undertaking to perform it, we render no substantial interest to the country. I trust the amendment of the gentleman over the way will not be adopted, and that the appropriation will be materially diminished.

Mr. LOVEJOY, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I offer the following amendment:

That no portion of the sum hereby appropriated shall be applied to the purchase of flower seeds.

The House has this morning ordered the printing of two hundred thousand volumes of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report. It was alleged by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SICKLES]—and very properly too—that the object of printing this work was for the purpose of advancing the farming interest of the country. If that be true, and I do not doubt it, I think the amendment now pending is in furtherance of that object—that it is for the purpose of procuring such seeds, through the instrumentality of the Patent Office, as will improve the agricultural interests of the country. My experience is that a large amount of the sum heretofore appropriated for the purpose of purchasing seeds and cuttings, which are proper to be distributed among the farmers of the country, has been appropriated for the purpose of buying flower seeds, which are of no earthly benefit to any person whatever. A large portion of them upon fair trial have proved to be utterly worthless. The Patent Office has been imposed upon to a considerable extent in the purchase of these seeds; but if it is the determination of the House to make an appropriation of $60,000 for the purpose of purchasing seeds for distribution among the farmers of the country, I think it is right and proper that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to strike out the entire clause should not prevail. I trust, however, if the motion should not prevail, the restriction contained in my amendment may be adopted, so as to prevent the Patent Office from expending any portion of the amount for the purchase of flower seeds.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would rather have the flower seeds than anything else. Bless my soul! the ladies must have the flower seeds.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I cannot agree with the gentleman in that particular. I take it that they have no power to purchase any character of seeds for distribution which are merely for ornamental purposes. We have the right, however, in my judgment, according to the Constitution, to encourage agriculture, and this is one of the modes of doing that.

As I said before, if this clause is to be retained, I hope my proviso will be adopted.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to oppose the amendment offered to my amendment, and more particularly for the purpose of saying that I offered my amendment in good faith. Speeches are constantly made by public men here, readily understood, for carrying the farming class of this country to the groves of "Blarney." Now, let me say to gentlemen who indulge in this sort of thing, that there is no class of men in this country, whether considered in reference to their number, their substance, or their intelligence, ahead of the farming class, and that there is no class that can more correctly discriminate between those who pursue their substantial good, and those who keep up an appearance of it only, in promoting and maintaining a system that annually carries an expenditure of money which comes out of the farmers' pocket to an excess, without accomplishing any useful purpose.

Look at the rise in these appropriations! When I first came to Congress there was appropriated annually $500 for this purpose. Afterwards the appropriation rose to $1,000. Afterwards, when you had got this seed bureau in operation, and a man at the head of it, the appropriation ran up to $10,000. In the last Congress, under pretense of getting sugar-cane for the purpose of resetting the fields of Louisiana, we put it up to $75,000; and now here is a standing appropriation of $60,000. Gentlemen on that side of the House, and indeed on all sides of the House, are complaining every day of the condition of the Treasury. When I propose to take the snags out of the Mississippi and the Missouri and the Ohio rivers, I am told of the condition of the Treasury, although the returns of the Government show that more than a million's worth of property of the western people is sunk annually in these matters. And yet you stand here, and, with smiling faces, spend $60,000 a year for morning-glories and johnny jump-ups! [Laughter.]

Sir, if I wanted to do something substantial for the farming classes, I would select a tract of from three to five thousand acres from the Government lands in the fertile west; and I would give $60,000 a year as a fund with which a model farm might be established under the guidance, not of politicians, as here in the bureaux of Washington, but of a class of men selected from the body of the agriculturists of the country. If this $60,000 was annually expended in this way, it might result in some actual good to agriculturists. Think of it, sir, $60,000 a year is six per cent. on a fund of $1,000,000. You can give them such a farm without costing you anything. You may make a reservation for agricultural purposes, as you do for military purposes, out of your public lands. Allow $60,000 a year to make experiments on such a tract, in agriculture and horticulture, and you will soon find that instead of its being an annual drain on the Treasury of $60,000, it will be a matter which every agriculturist would be willing to pay out of his own pocket.

The question was taken on Mr. GREENWOOD's amendment and it was rejected.

Mr. TALBOT. Feeling a deep interest in the agricultural and mechanical interest of the country, I move to amend by striking out "$60,000" and inserting "$70,000." If I did not conceive, Mr. Chairman, that this proposition was an entering wedge against the Patent Office, the great agricultural and mechanical department of the Government, I should not open my mouth; but the speech of my honorable colleague [Mr. MARSHALL] satisfies me most thoroughly on the subject. How is it, and why is it? I confess I am at a loss to know why it is, that whenever we want men to make up the armies of the country; we go to the farmers and to the mechanics; whenever we want men to make up the navies of the country, we go to the farmers and the mechanics; whenever we want food and raiment, we go to the farmers and to the mechanics; and whenever we want men and money, for any purpose whatever, we go to the farmers and mechanics. But whenever money is proposed to be appropriated for their benefit, we find the most gifted men of the House rise in their places, and with scorn and contempt, bring their mighty minds to bear against the project. Gentlemen endeavor to throw ridicule on the proposition to collect statistics and investigations for promoting agricultural and rural economy, by saying that the money is squandered for cabbage seeds and morning-glories. They are not willing to vote to their wives and daughters even cabbage seeds and morning-glories. How much money does this bill propose to appropriate for the purpose indicated? Only the pitiful sum of $60,000. To how many people? To thirty million people, in thirty-three States. How much do you think it is to my congressional district? Only about one hundred and fifty dollars—about twelve dollars and fifty cents for each county I represent. And I believe there are at least one hundred men in each county who would be willing to pay that sum out of their own pockets every year for life rather than not enjoy the benefits to flow to them from the appropriation in question.

I am surprised to hear the proposition from any quarter, to strike out this appropriation. But I am the more astonished that this proposition should have come from my own State, and from my honorable colleague, who has the honor to represent one of the richest and proudest agricultural districts in that noble Commonwealth. My honorable colleague is one of the only two delegates from the State of Kentucky, to the convention of the great National Agricultural Association, gotten up solely for the purpose of promoting agriculture and the mechanic arts, and yet he is the first gentleman on this floor to move to strike out this appropriation. What, sir, is his proposition? To reduce the appropriation? No, sir. To make it $30,000? No, sir. To make it $20,000? No, sir. To make it $10,000? No, sir; not a solitary dollar does he propose to give to collect statistics, &c., to promote the great agricultural and mechanical interests of this country; but he brings his mighty mind and his mighty arm to the work, and with one fell swoop strikes out the appropriation altogether. Sir, Kentucky is one of the first agricultural States in the Union, and the last State from which a proposition of this sort should have emanated, and my honorable colleague, representing the great agricultural interests he does, is the last man from whom I should have expected such a proposition.

I am, sir, for retrenchment and reform; but I am not willing to strike down, first of all, the great agricultural and mechanical department of the Government.

Mr. KEITT. I rise to oppose the amendment rather formally than otherwise. My judgment is against this whole scheme of distributing seeds, and in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL.] Still, I do not think that anything is to be gained by prolonging this discussion. We have had it here every session for the last five years, and every member of the House has made up his mind about it. I do not regard it as a blow to the agricultural interests. The question that presents itself to my mind is this: does anybody derive any advantage from this expenditure? Are the seeds, scattered through the country, grown by the Department or by the farmers?

Mr. TALBOT. I will answer the gentleman. I believe the State of Kentucky has, within the last three years, profited to the amount of $1,000,000 by the distribution of the simple article of wheat.

Mr. KEITT. I am very glad that some good wheat was distributed to the State of Kentucky. I find here that $12,000 is annually paid for salaries. I want to know from what fund these salaries are paid, whether out of this appropriation or not?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The appropriation of $60,000 is made by Congress directing the Secretary of the Interior to collect these seeds and distribute them. The estimate shows that to collect these seeds it requires $60,000, which embraces payment for men of skill and talent to select them.

Mr. KEITT. Then the salaries of $12,000 do come out of this $60,000?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Certainly.

Mr. KEITT. So far as my knowledge goes, these seeds are usually bought in the city of Washington.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Many of them are bought in Europe.

Mr. KEITT. I have sometimes gone into the Patent Office, and been told that they had not the seeds I wanted, but that they would have them in a day or two. I do not think that this matter is worth the trouble of going into now. I wish to hasten the passage of the bill. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] to strike out the whole thing; but I do not think it is worth wasting further time on it.

Mr. TALBOT withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Patents to submit to the Committees of Accounts of the House of Representatives, at the commencement of each session of Congress, the invoices of seeds and cuttings purchased with the money hereby appropriated, and also a statement of the expenses in procuring agricultural statistics, and the incidental expenses in procuring seeds, cuttings, and information.

I am satisfied that this whole appropriation is entirely unnecessary; but if it has to be made I think it is important to the country to know how it is to be expended. The only way to correct the abuse is to hold the person who has control of the money to a strict accountability to show how it has been expended.

My impression is that so far from the Patent Office being a matter of competition with the seed stores in Washington, they derive a large amount of their support from it in the sale of a quantity of useless seeds. If we send agents to Europe to buy seeds, I want the accounts of their expenditures exhibited. I want to know the precise amount paid out for agricultural statistics and for any other information. I want to know the precise amount paid for salaries; and I want to have all in separate items, and to have the account presented to Congress. If we cannot defeat the system in any other way, I think we can in this way show up the abuse of the system, and so have it broken up.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman modify his amendment so as to let the accounts be settled at the Treasury Department?

Mr. SEWARD. I accept that modification.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I wish the gentleman would also accept this modification:

Provided, No salary or compensation to any person for services in collecting or distributing seeds, cuttings, &c., shall be paid out of this appropriation.

Mr. SEWARD. I have no objection to that. All I want, is to have a record of the transaction of the Patent Office connected with the purchase of these seeds. Here is $60,000 appropriated, and no person held accountable for its proper disbursement, either to the Treasury Department or to Congress. The seeds that I have had to distribute since I have been in Congress were not worth the paper that they were wrapped in. They were seeds common all over the country. There seems to be a sort of mania in the Patent Office in favor of turnip seeds—green and blue and yellow and black, broad and narrow, and long. The flower seeds are not worth talking about. I have been really abused by my constituents for sending them to them. Besides, it is a very great expense to the Post Office Department, to be sending out these worthless seeds. I do not know how many tons of such matter go annually through the mails, and have to be paid for out of the Treasury. By stopping this system, we will disburden the mails, and save a large amount of transportation by railroad and stages. I want to have it broken up, and think the only way to do it is to hold these gentlemen to a strict accountability.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I want to say, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] that very likely there may be blarney in speaking of snags in the bottom of the Ohio river, and of old "sogers," as well as in speaking of the farming interest. I am the last man in this House to blarney farmers, or any other class of men. I insist that these objections of gentlemen are against the abuse of the system, and not against the system itself. I know that these seeds are very much valued by the farmers; and I insist that we ought not to strike out this appropriation, and that we ought not to lessen it, but that we ought to allow this system to go on, and to permit the valuable seeds to be introduced into the country which are being introduced under the system. I am sorry that I have not time to refer again to the extensions of this Capitol.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope we shall now come to a vote.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to strike out the paragraph as amended.

Mr. COLFAX. I move, pro forma, to increase the appropriation from $60,000 to $80,000.

I move the amendment for the purpose of saying a few words on this $60,000 appropriation. In the remarks which have been made, no reference has been made to the fact that this system of distributing seeds by the Patent Office has been the means of introducing into the country a variety of seeds which are worth far more to the agricultural interests of the country than the whole amount of the appropriation for this purpose. I refer, as a single instance, to the Mediterranean wheat, which was originally introduced into this country under the auspices of the Patent Office. I am familiar with the effect of its introduction into the northern States, and it is well known that the kind of red wheat known as the Mediterranean, is much more hardy and the crop more certain all over the northern States, than any kind of wheat before sown. It is not, from its early ripening, so liable to rust, and the stalk is so much stronger than the white that it defies the Hessian fly, unless in seasons when that pest of the farmer is unusually destructive. I mention as another instance, that the Patent Office have introduced the Chinese sugar-cane into the country, by which, although almost universally discredited as a humbug at the outset, the people of the northern States, and of all parts of the Union, indeed, have been able to raise saccharine matter in the shape of molasses, if not in the shape of sugar also. I also feel at liberty to state that it is proposed by the Patent Office to introduce into the country the culture of the tea plant, and that it is expected that this plant will be introduced into the whole South, if not also into the middle States. They are also now introducing the Chinese yam, the chufa, and other varieties, into the country, with what success the future of course must determine.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will allow me to say that we have five appropriation bills yet to act upon, and I am very anxious to get through with this bill.

Mr. COLFAX. I will detain the committee but a moment longer. I desire to say, that out of this very appropriation, two years ago, a scientific man was sent through the whole South to make investigations in regard to insects which infest the cotton plant; their peculiar habits and characteristics, and how they can be destroyed. I understand, and sincerely trust, that the assurances made to me will be verified; that it is now contemplated by the Patent Office to extend the system of investigation to the various insects which infest the wheat crop in the northern States; and I present this fact as an additional reason why the appropriation ought to be made. I appeal to the House, when so many millions are voted for far less beneficent objects, that this small appropriation, almost the only item, in an entire series of appropriation bills, which relates directly to the agricultural interests of the country, shall be retained; and if there have been errors heretofore in distributing seeds which are not novel and rare, the expression already made upon this subject, during this debate, will doubtless cause their correction hereafter.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not wish to make a speech upon this subject; but I wish to call the attention of the House to an item of expenditures for this seed-room for 1856. There is here the receipt of a man named Samuel Perkins, of fifty-four dollars for watermelons. Now, I suppose these watermelons were purchased in this city for the purpose of saving the seeds for distribution.

A MEMBER. What became of the watermelons?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not know.

The question being on the amendment to the amendment, offered by Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded tellers. Tellers were not ordered.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I move to amend, by adding the following:

Provided, That said seeds and cuttings shall be sent by the Commissioner of the Patent Office to the presidents of the agricultural societies of counties of such States and Territories which have such societies, and to the clerks of the county courts of those counties which have not such societies.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I merely wish to remark that I approve of that amendment, which merely provides for the distribution by the Commissioner of the Patent Office, instead of by members of Congress, thus relieving them from the inconvenience of distributing them.

Mr. SEWARD. I offer the following proviso to the amendment:

Provided also, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Patents to divide into equal parts all the seeds among the two hundred and thirty-four members of the House of Representatives, the sixty-four Senators, and seven Delegates from the Territories, having regard to quantity and quality, and shall send the same to the clerks of the county courts in the several counties of each State, giving to each State its quantity in proportion to the number of Representatives and Senators of said State, to be distributed by said clerks among the people of the several counties aforesaid.

That amendment relieves members from the trouble of sending seeds to their constituents. It makes it the duty of the Commissioner of Patents to divide the seeds in equal quantities, having regard to qualities; and that he send them to each State in proportion to their Representatives and Senators, to the clerk's office in each county, for them to divide among the people, so that the people can have a fair distribution, without in any way inconveniencing members of Congress.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. I wish to say, sir, that I entirely agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] that this appropriation by the Government of $60,000 per annum for seeds is all wrong, and I am opposed to the action of this Government in relation to this expenditure. I regard it as a great waste of public money. Nine tenths of the seeds which are procured and distributed by this Patent Office department are collected in our own country. A swarm of Government employes are paid large sums for eating melons in this city, and selling the seed to the Patent Office for distribution. A very large amount of this $60,000 is annually wasted in taking care of and distributing these seeds; and what are they at best? Nine tenths are such as are to be found at every good farm-house in this country. They are made up of seed-corn, tomato-seed, Maryland tobacco-seed, sweet corn, water-melon seeds from Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Long Island—in other words, it embraces a class of seeds found at the door of every good farmer throughout the land.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY.] It is all a humbug. He mistakes the character and common sense of the farmers if he believes he is to flatter them with appropriations of that character. Ten dollars, annually expended upon the part of each county agricultural society, would furnish more and better seeds than those we are now receiving. Read the names on those seeds, and I venture to say that hardly a man in this House can determine what they are. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] may be versed in French. He seems to have a large amount of Latin on hand to read upon occasions of this kind; and in his attempt to manufacture Buncombe for his constituents, he made a most unwarrantable and contemptible attack upon the naval and military institutions of this country. It may suit his purpose, and the purpose of his constituents, to purchase these seeds; but I can say for myself that I can see no good, as derived by the farmer, commensurate with the expenses. Go to the public barn here, and examine the amount of public building required for storing these seeds; go through the length and breadth of that department and see the army of employes, fed at the public crib, in order to distribute them; and if, perchance, you cannot find there the seeds which you or your constituents want, you are immediately told that you will find them at the seed-warehouse. Sir, they can be always found there, better and cheaper than they are furnished by Government.

The gentleman himself admits that a large proportion of these seeds are purchased at the seed-stores of the different cities of this country. I know the distribution of seeds is productive of some good. Undoubtedly they have been, and so they should be; but we have to pay too dear for the whistle. The farmers would be greatly encouraged, too, if we would import and supply to them the best plows from different parts of the country; they would be benefited if we would introduce some fine stock; the wool-grower would be pleased if we would import some fine sheep for distribution to him; and so as regards other matters. Now, I am opposed to the Government going into these operations at all in competition with farmers. I believe that private interests would bring about all the advantages desired, and at a less expense. I am the devoted friend of the agriculturist, and no man feels a deeper interest in his welfare, or places a higher estimate upon his intelligence.

Mr. CLAY, by unanimous consent, modified his amendment so as to make it read as follows:

Provided, That such cuttings and seeds shall be sent by the Commissioner of Patents for distribution to such public institution or society in each congressional district as may be designated by the member of Congress for such district.

Mr. SEWARD. As the modified amendment nearly covers the ground I desire, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GREENWOOD called for tellers on Mr. CLAY's amendment.

Tellers were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUFFIN. I move to amend by striking out lines one hundred and thirty-four, one hundred and thirty-five, and one hundred and thirty-six, as follows:

"For drawings to illustrate the report of the Commissioner of Patents for the year 1858, $5,000."

I desire to say a word in explanation of the amendment. I understand that the report of the Committee on Printing recommended that these illustrations in the Patent Office report were not to be inserted hereafter. There were great complaints made of them here. I know that in the last Patent Office report there was a ridiculous set of illustrations of squirrels, that were not worth a cent. It seems to me that if these reports are to be published for the benefit of the agricultural interests of the country, there is no need of having a number of the pages filled up with these cuts at great cost. The reports would be just as valuable without them; and I suppose there will be no difficulty as to striking out this item. It is true that it will effect but a small saving; but still it amounts to something; and I hope the amendment will prevail. As I understand it, the committee have taken the ground that these illustrations are wholly unnecessary; and if they are, I say they should be stricken out. That is the ground I put it on—that they are useless and unnecessary.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If that is the result of the report of the Committee on Printing, I hope the committee will accept the amendment. The estimate was made at a time when we had no information from that committee. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing, whether he concurs in the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. NICHOLS. I am not chairman of the Committee on Printing, but I will tell the gentleman, as far as I understand it, what the effect will be. The gentleman from North Carolina entirely misapprehends the effect of his amendment. The appropriation contained in this bill is one which was inserted in the appropriation bill on my motion in the last Congress. This relates not to the squirrels, the bugs, and the insects; but it is to pay those persons who have in charge the illustration of the patents.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I can get at it better by asking the gentleman a question or two. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina if his motion was not to strike out the whole item?

Mr. RUFFIN. That was my motion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the Committee on Printing believes that it is expedient and proper that it should be stricken out?

Mr. WHITELEY. I offer the following as an amendment to the amendment:

Amend the bill by striking out the word "six," in line one hundred and thirty-six, and insert the word "sixteen." Amend the bill by adding, in line one hundred and thirty-two, the word "sixty," and insert after the word "dollars," in said line, the following words: "of which sum there shall be paid to Townsend Glover the sum of $10,000 for the purchase of two thousand models of American fruits, and the matrices for multiplying the same, for the use of the Patent Office."

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is no new thing. A majority of the members of this House recommended this collection to the Commissioner of Patents, and by his recommendation the appropriation of $60,000 for agricultural purposes was increased to $75,000, of which sum $12,000, as appears from the letter of the Commissioner of Patents, was intended for the purchase from Mr. Glover of these models of fruit now in the Patent Office, and which I suppose a majority of the members have seen. The purchase was recommended by the Commissioner, and the appropriation was made; but the specific item not being put in, and Mr. Glover being away, the appropriation was expended before the purchase was made. I think it just to him, and just to the intention of the Commissioner and of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, that this amendment should be made.

Mr. MASON. What kind of fruits are they?

Mr. WHITELEY. They are models of all the American fruits, and are now in the Patent Office. I will read what the Commissioner says about them:

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE, May 9, 1857.

Sir: In my absence from this office, a communication was addressed by you to the acting Commissioner, requesting information in relation to Mr. Glover's collection of models of fruits. I have the honor to submit some facts, which were not within the knowledge of the acting Commissioner.

1. The collection consists of over two thousand models, finished and colored, and matrices for multiplying the same, with an exceedingly valuable descriptive catalogue. The collection is entirely unique.

2. Mr. Glover was employed constantly for six years, prior to his employment in this office, making these models at his own cost, including his own time, traveling expenses, material, fruits, and subsistence.

3. The sum asked by Mr. Glover for the models and matrices, is $10,000, which has been estimated by competent persons as a reasonable price.

4. Mr. Glover has been employed in this office for three years, in anticipation of the purchase of his collection, at a salary of $2,000 per annum, paying his own traveling expenses. During this period he has been employed principally in investigations relating to insects injurious to vegetation, particularly the cereal grains, fruits, and the cotton plant. It is proposed that he continue these investigations, and at such times as he cannot be profitably engaged in that work, that he continue the modeling of fruits, esculents, grains, and other agricultural products, and the abnormal or diseased portions of the same.

5. The practical benefits to be derived from obtaining and continuing the collection are as follows: The collection will furnish a ready means for the classification and identification of fruits and other agricultural products; will indicate the soil and locality where each fruit or product will best thrive; will enable the agriculturist to select, by inspection, those varieties which suit his plantation or farm, and will attract his attention not only to the best varieties, but to such new ones as may be introduced.

The purchase of this collection has been recommended by the principal agricultural and horticultural societies in the United States, by a large number of practical and influential public men, among whom are the majority of the members of both Houses of the late Congress, who have recommended the payment for the collection to be made out of the funds of this office, appropriated for agricultural purposes.

I would further state that in the estimate of $75,000 made by me to Congress in 1856, for agricultural purposes, $12,000 was specified for investigations of fruits and insects, and was intended to purchase this collection, and that the whole $75,000 was appropriated.

It is desirable that the arrangement with Mr. Glover should be made at once, that he may lose no time in proceeding with his work.

C. MASON.

To the Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. Is this proposition provided for by law, or in any way, or has it any direct connection with the purchase of seeds or cuttings for the Patent Office?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It is intended for the benefit of agriculture.

Mr. LETCHER. It proposes to buy wax figures in imitation of fruits; and I submit whether that comes under the range of any law, or under the head of cuttings and seeds?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the question of order is not well taken, and that the amendment is germane to the bill.

Mr. WHITELEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have only one word to say further. I have here the signatures of more than half the members of the last House, recommending the purchase of these wax figures, and I have particularly the signature of the gentleman from Kentucky; [Mr. MARSHALL,] who pronounced this thing, yesterday, a humbug.

Mr. LETCHER obtained the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will permit me to make a remark, because the gentleman from Delaware directly challenges my consistency, at all events.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well, sir.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not know what the paper is which he produces.

Mr. LETCHER. He says you recommended these wax fruits.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have no doubt at all that I may have signed a paper presented to me recommending the article just for what it was worth, namely, that it was a first rate representation in wax of that which existed in reality. I suppose that I probably recommended it, but I had no idea at all that there was any appropriation, or anything concealed in this appropriation of $60,000, for the purpose of starting, for the benefit of agriculture, a museum of wax figures here at the city of Washington.

Mr. LETCHER. Now, I see very plainly where all this thing is going to. Gentlemen have been arguing here, both yesterday and to-day, that it is very important that we should have seeds and cuttings for the purpose of distributing them through the country, that parties by experiments might ascertain their value. And now, after the debate has gone on, and a proposition has been retained in the bill for the benefit of agriculture, the gentleman comes here with a proposition—to do what? To spend the public money for the purchase of representations of fruit made in wax, to be stored here in the city of Washington, with a gentleman to take care of them at a salary; and this is for the benefit of the farmers!

Mr. WHITELEY. Will the gentleman allow me to say that they are already in the Patent Office.

Mr. LETCHER. Then, if they are in the Patent Office, and have never been purchased by the Government, it is high time that the officers in charge of the Patent Office should put them out, or charge storage—one or the other. [Laughter.] Are we to be used in this way? When an individual comes here to get his articles off upon the Government, are they to be deposited in the Patent Office, and to be allowed to remain there in charge of the officers; and then, after they have been there for some time, an appropriation is to be demanded from this House to pay for what has been left there on exhibition by the party himself?

Now, let us look at this thing in a practical point of view. Can any member of the House undertake to tell me how many farmers in the United States will ever see the fruit? How many of them will ever have an opportunity to see these wax figures? A gentleman says, every one who comes here. Sir, those who come here are by no manner of means the best farmers, or a majority even of the farmers. The best farmers in this country, the most thrifty, the most valuable to society, are those who stay at home and attend to their business. But, sir, these fruits are to be kept here for exhibition to such as may be traveling through the country, who casually visit Washington, and stroll into the Patent Office to see them. Gentlemen do not pretend that they are of one cent's value to any human being under this Government; and we all know from the past, that if they are put there, it will not be long before we shall have to have some one to take charge of them, and employ his time in making an exhibition of them to such as have leisure to travel about the United States.

Mr. WHITELEY. I wish to ask that, by unanimous consent, the names of the members of the last Congress who signed the recommendation may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I insist that when debate is closed we may have the vote.

The question was taken; and Mr. WHITELEY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. NICHOLS. I move to increase the original appropriation one dollar. I offer this pro forma amendment for the purpose of responding to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in order. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, some time ago, would not have effected the object he had in view. These illustrations which accompany the Patent Office report are not covered by this appropriation. If gentlemen will take the trouble to examine this matter, they will find that for the drawings of the machinery of the inventors who have made applications for patents, the Government has, for some time, employed draughtsmen to illustrate the machinery alone.

Now, sir, I am familiar with this subject, for the reason, that before the last Congress they were in the habit of employing these men in the Patent Office; then referring them to the Committee on Printing for certificates of the amount of work done; then to the Committee of Finance in the Senate, and to the Committee on Accounts in the House, for their pay. Upon my motion, this system was changed, so as to have their compensation estimated for by the Department precisely like other appropriations, and paid in the same manner.

This appropriation is founded upon law; and if it is stricken out the effect will be to prevent the illustrations accompanying the mechanical part of the Patent Office report; for it is to provide for nothing else.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to ask whether, in the book which we have ordered to be printed, reference is not made to these illustrations in the letter-press?

Mr. NICHOLS. Undoubtedly such reference is made, and the book will be of no value without them. The book was prepared by the Patent Office with especial reference to these illustrations, and this appropriation is for them alone. It is not to pay for pictures of squirrels, which gentlemen have talked so much about. It is confined exclusively to illustrations of mechanical inventions.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his amendment, I propose to offer another.

Mr. NICHOLS. I will withdraw it.

Mr. BURNETT. I move to insert after the word "drawings," the words "for the mechanical report."

Mr. NICHOLS. That is right.

Mr. BURNETT. A word of explanation.

Several MEMBERS. No objection to it.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand the amendment meets the approval of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NICHOLS,] and that it will meet with no objection. I will, therefore, not trouble the committee with any remarks upon it.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I desire to say that these engravings have already been executed.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question was on striking out the whole paragraph as amended.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to strike the following paragraph from the bill. I will state to the committee that the appropriation is provided for in another bill.

The paragraph was read as follows:

"For purchase of the 'Masonic Temple,' in the city of Boston, for the accommodation of the United States courts, upon the terms agreed on by the Secretary of the Interior and the proprietors thereof, in addition to the sum of $100,000 appropriated by the act of 3d March 1857, for the erection of a building for said purpose, $5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to amend, after line one hundred and fifty-six, by adding the following:

For protecting the site of the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, from the encroachment of the Ohio river, $7,000.

Mr. Chairman, I will state in explanation of the amendment that it has always been contemplated by the officers of the Government to pave the bank of the Ohio river, in front of the marine hospital recently erected at Evansville, Indiana, to prevent it from being washed away and injuring the building. I have before me estimates showing that it will cost about seven thousand dollars. The recent freshet on the Ohio river, and which has extended very generally to the western rivers, has washed away about ten feet of the bank, and it is feared that unless this protection is afforded it may render the site of the building unsafe.

I will state further, that a bar has commenced to form at the commencement of the bend on which this building is situated, which will serve to increase the tendency of the river to wash away the bank of the river at that point; and the sooner this grading is done, the better. Any one at all acquainted with the location must know that the nature of the bank is such that any building on it will be strained by the action of the water in time of a freshet unless it is protected. The city has commenced grading the bank for the protection of its own buildings, and this will be but the extension of the grading which the city is carrying on.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana how far this building is from the bank?

Mr. NIBLACK. Some fifty or sixty yards.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana for this reason, among others: the committee, yesterday, after full discussion, refused to vote appropriations for continuing the work on the custom-houses and marine hospitals in the various parts of the country, the estimates for which amounted to about one million seven hundred thousand dollars. These appropriations were to carry out contracts which have been made under law. But, in consideration of the condition of the Treasury, the committee has determined not to appropriate money for them; and the same reasons will apply with still greater force against this amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move to amend that clause which makes appropriations for the hospital for the insane of the Army and Navy and the District of Columbia, by adding the following:

Provided, That the money herein appropriated be, and the same is, expended under the direction of a board of trustees, to consist of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, the Mayors of Washington and Georgetown, and two members of the levy court of the county of Washington, to be designated by said court, and that the revenue of said infirmary, over and above its expenses, shall be expended in enlarging the hospital facilities; and further, that the said board of trustees shall have power to appoint all medical attendants, their services to be rendered free of charge, the duties of said attendants to be so distributed by said board that they may alternately be discharged by all members of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia desiring to do so.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a question of order. That amendment provides for independent legislation, and hence it is improper in an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move to strike out from line one hundred and seventy-three to one hundred and seventy-six, inclusive, as follows:

"For annual repairs of the President's House and furniture, improvement of grounds, purchasing trees and plants for garden, and making hot-beds therein, and contingent expenses incident thereto, $12,000."

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the unconstitutional mode by which, for a few years past, we have been increasing the President's salary. I find that, by the appropriation bill of 1840, Congress appropriated $25,000 for the annual salary of the President, and that the entire amount of the appropriation in that bill for all other purposes pertaining to the President's House was $4,165. I find that now, by indirect legislation, we have increased the President's salary from $25,000 to $56,000 per annum. I have in my hands a table, showing appropriations for the President, and for his house, garden, and grounds, in 1840 and in 1859. It is as follows:

A table showing appropriations for the President and for his house, garden, and grounds, in 1840 and 1859.

	1840.	1859.
Salary.....	$25,000	$25,000
Secretary, steward, and messenger.....		4,600
Contingent expenses and stationery.....		750
Purchasing plants for conservatory.....		1,000
Repairs and furniture, trees and plants for garden, and making hot-beds therein*..	4,165	12,000
Fuel.....		1,800
Furnace-keeper.....		600
Lighting President's House, (estimated),		3,000
Laborers and gardeners, (estimated).....		4,800
Books for library.....		250
Doorkeeper and assistant.....		1,200
Two night watchmen.....		1,200
		$56,200

Indeed, sir, we now supply and pay for all, or nearly all, the servants about the President's House except his cook and coachman; and chamber-maid, if he needs one. I am in favor of a liberal allowance to the President of the United States. Gentlemen will not find me backward in providing for the President a good income, but I desire to do it directly, and not by indirection. The Constitution of the United States provides that—

"The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected; and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States or any of them."

The point I make is, that the appropriations reported here are emoluments to the President, for they pay private expenses of the President, such as pertain to the housekeeping of every gentleman. We pay for nearly all the incidental expenses of the President's mansion, and it is only necessary for the Committee of Ways and Means to report an additional item for sundries, to pay Monsieur Gautier the expenses of the President's table.

If gentlemen desire to increase the compensation of the President, let them say so, and report a bill for that purpose. I am opposed to doing it in this unconstitutional and indirect mode; I am opposed to paying all these expenses of the President's House, and still give him an annual compensation of salary.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman from Ohio seems to have a particular hostility to that presidential White House; and I take it for granted because he will never get there himself. He has referred to the Committee of Ways and Means as having provided for these appropriations. I wish to say to the gentleman that the Committee of Ways and Means have not put in one dollar except what the law provides for; and, if the gentleman would change it, he shows his disregard for law.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to say that the amount appropriated by this bill for these purposes is larger than it was last year; and last year was a season of unbounded expenditure.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have not yielded the floor to the gentleman from Ohio; and, when I yield to that gentleman, I will signify it to him. Perhaps the gentleman's offense is, as I have heard it intimated, that he has not been invited to dinner at the White House. [Hisses from the Republican side of the House.] I wish to assure the gentleman from Ohio that the appropriation in this clause does not pay for the dinners of the President to members of Congress; so that, if the gentleman is not invited to dinner, I want his conscience to be at ease by knowing that those who do get dinners there do not have them paid for out of the appropriation bill.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that I am obliged to respond to a speech of this kind upon an appropriation bill. I think it is undignified, and I think it is scarcely reputable for any member of Congress to rise in his place at this time and object to an appropriation for draining and fencing about the presidential mansion, which has been uniformly done from the days of the foundation of the Government. The gentleman objects that the expenses are increased. What does it concern the President of the United States if Congress chooses to put up a fence, or do any other thing about the presidential mansion? Is that a reason for an assault to be made upon the Executive? I am sorry that he has not more manliness. [Hisses from the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman—Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not yield. I want to say what I have to say now. [Cries of "Order!" on the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. PALMER. I rise to a question of order. Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not want these interruptions taken out of my time. I just want to say, once for all, while I will never flinch from meeting gentlemen upon the opposite side of this House, here or in the country, upon any question, I will never shrink from defending an Executive, whom I believe to be one of the purest men who ever presided over this country. [Laughter from the Republican side of the House.] That is the answer of the Black Republicans—a horse laugh. [Renewed laughter on the same side.] That is all the answer they have. Now, sir, I am glad to hear that your answer is a laugh, [laughter on the same side of the House,] because you have no other argument. I hope gentlemen upon the other side will not find fault with me, if, in consequence of the triumphs of this Administration [laughter upon the Republican side of the House] during this session of Congress they are reduced to the position of having nothing to do but to laugh.

I leave it to the House to say whether, during the whole session, I have made a single political allusion. I have kept my mouth closed; but when I see members on that side of the House make objections, with an insinuation that we are increasing a salary which was given to George Washington for necessary expenses sixty-seven years ago, by doing what Congress has been doing for years, not for the President's benefit, but for their own comfort, I cannot remain silent. These appropriations are not for the President; they are for you. For whom is that house and those grounds? Not for the President, but for you.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to modify my amendment by moving that the $4,000 shall not be expended for making hot-beds.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman has offered an amendment. What has become of it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman has no right to amend his own amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I can withdraw my amendment, and increase the amount to $5,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will withdraw my amendment if I am at liberty to move another.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I object to any conditions.

Mr. GROW. I move to amend the amendment by reducing it to $1,000. It is a rather singular spectacle, Mr. Chairman, when a gentleman rises on this floor to oppose an appropriation, and to give the reasons why a certain amount of money should not be expended, to see the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means rise here, and attempt to answer the objection by claiming it as out of character for a member to question the action of the Committee of Ways and Means on the salary given to any officer of this Government; and that he should answer the objection by dragging in the dinner parties of the President, and attempting to pronounce an eulogium upon his private character. It is a new spectacle, when an appropriation bill is brought into the House, that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who reports it, should have no better argument to give than that. We have often, this session, heard the motives of gentlemen arraigned for opposing appropriations here; and we have seen, when a member rises on this floor, and asks an investigation into the acts of officers of the Government, abuse poured back upon him personally for doing what he has a right to do under the Constitution of the country; for doing that which every man is bound to do, if he believes that the act of any officer of the Government was not in accordance with law; and for demanding an investigation. If the act has been in accordance with law, no harm can be done by the investigation.

But we have seen, from the beginning of the session, attempts made to arraign men's motives, and members have undertaken to read them lectures on propriety and legislative conduct, instead of answering their objections.

When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] proposed to inquire whether the President received a greater salary than is allowed by law, it was the duty of the man having charge of these appropriations to show that he did not receive a larger salary, and not to charge that it was unbecoming a member to raise that question here; not to hold that the Committee of Ways and Means cannot be questioned in their acts, or that the salary of the President of the United States can be enlarged by indirect means. Especially is it improper that such an argument should be used, as the reason why this side of the House would not vote to enlarge the salary of the President was because we had not been invited to his dinner parties. It is beneath sound argument for the appropriation of money anywhere, and is unbecoming a legislative body.

Why should men have lectures read to them on the propriety of their proceedings when they are only doing what they have a right to do? We stand not here to have lectures read to us about propriety whenever we oppose appropriations, or propose to inquire into the conduct of any officer of the Government. It is not becoming any legislative body that its members should be lectured on the propriety of their conduct, instead of having their arguments answered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman. I have no participation on either side of this question; but I must rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, as well on the right as on the left, are out of order; and will rule them out of order.

Mr. GROW. I was only answering my colleague—but it was the duty of the Chair to rule him out of order before.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and will give my reasons for it. I am opposed to limiting the President to the expenditure of $1,000, for this simple reason: that in 1840, $4,000 was deemed sufficient for all the contingent expenses connected with the executive department. I am willing now to give what we gave in 1840. Prior to that time no greater sum was given except for some specific purpose. I am glad that I have waked up the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, because I hope that he will now progress with his business. In respect to his imputations on me, or on my motives, any man who knows me knows that they are utterly unfounded. I did not seek to attack the President. I did not seek to drag his private matters in here at all, and I scorn the imputation. His imputation in regard to a dinner party at the President's House is beneath the dignity of a gentleman.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Will the gentleman allow me to answer him here?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. No, sir, I will not yield.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman is afraid to.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will confine myself to the rules of order. I am opposed to that provision in the appropriation bill for this reason, that I do not want this House to do indirectly what it cannot do directly. We have no power to increase the salary of the President of the United States. Congress has no power to do it. The Constitution has wisely withheld from us all power on the subject.

Now, during the last year there was appropriated for this purpose about eleven thousand dollars. This year they ask us for $12,000, so that the increase is about one thousand dollars a year. In thus doing the Constitution of the United States is violated. I stand by the Constitution, and by the law, and I care nothing for the imputations either of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or any other man. They never deter me or shake me in the least.

Now, I wish to appropriate for the repairs of the President's House, $4,000—not $1,000, but $4,000. I do not want this money to be expended for the ordinary current expenses of the President's household. I would not have a dollar of it spent for making hot-beds, or conservatories, or anything of that kind. If the President's salary is not large enough—and I think it is not, and I said so in the opening of my remarks—increase it. If $25,000 is not enough, let us give to all future Presidents $50,000, if you choose; but do not do indirectly what you cannot do directly. But when the agent and friend of the President comes here, and in his place in the House arraigns my motives, I hurl back upon him and upon the President his charges. I, as an independent member on this floor, am freer than he or the President. I care nothing for him, or for his executive officers. I have too good sense, I hope, to impugn his motives. I said nothing against him—nothing about him; and I did not drag into this Hall anything relating to the personal affairs of the President, but acted merely in the performance of my constitutional duty, which is as high as that of the President of the United States. I will perform my duty fearlessly; and when imputations are made upon me, as they have been made, I repel them with scorn. It only shows the truth of the very general remark that has been made since the beginning of this session, that the gentleman who occupies the position of chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means cannot perform the duties of that position with the ability and courtesy which it requires.

Mr. GROW withdrew his amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. SHERMAN's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. It is too late in the session to indulge in angry debate.

[Cries of "No! No!" and "Let us vote."]

Mr. ENGLISH. I am willing to withdraw it if the committee will go on with the bill.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to amend the clause under consideration by striking out "eight" and inserting "seven," for the purpose of making an explanation at this point. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the time at which these appropriations commenced and for whose benefit they were commenced, and to show that they have been regularly continued from that time to this, without reference to any occupant of the presidential mansion. All these recommendations come, not from the President of the United States, but from the officer who is in charge of the public buildings and grounds belonging to the Government. These appropriations were introduced, if my recollection is not at fault, in the first Congress in which I served as a member here, when Mr. Fillmore was President of the United States, and they have been continued from that time to this.

So far as this appropriation for the garden is concerned, gentlemen will recollect that when the Treasury building was extended, the garden of the President was destroyed by that extension; and in order to give him ground for a garden, it had to be made at the other end of the public grounds beyond the President's House. Now, with all that the President had no connection, in any way whatever. He has no idea now, I apprehend, unless he has read the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, of any of the recommendations contained in it, or of any provisions of law in regard to this subject.

I have made this motion for the purpose of making this explanation, in order that it may go to the country, and that it may be seen that these appropriations are in conformity with law; that they were begun a number of years ago; and that they are absolutely indispensable in consequence of the action of Congress, in erecting public buildings upon the grounds around the President's House. I now withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STANTON. I move to strike out the following clause:

"For fuel, in part, of the President's House, $1,600."

Mr. Chairman, I have no personal or political reference to the President in the motion that I make, or in what I intend to say about it. But I do intend to say that, in my judgment, this indirect mode of increasing the compensation of public officers is exceedingly objectionable, exceedingly liable to abuse, and ought not to be pursued. Here is an appropriation for fuel for the President's House. Now, the question for Congress is as to whether the proper mode of compensating the President is to give him an aggregate sum and let him pay the expenses of his own household out of his salary, or whether it is proper to go into details, and make an appropriation for fuel, and another for his table, and another for his wardrobe, and another for his servants—going into all the details of his household expenses—and then make his compensation an entirely different matter.

I submit that there is good sense in the constitutional construction which my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] contends for, that all these appropriations for meeting the current family expenses of the President are additions to his compensation not within the meaning of the constitutional provision, and that the proper mode of fixing his compensation is to give him an aggregate compensation, and let him pay his household expenses as other gentlemen do. That is what it ought to be. It is simply a question in regard to what is the proper mode of meeting the private expenses of the President—whether in the form of compensation, or whether we will go into details. I ask for a vote upon my proposition.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio; and I propose to give him just such an answer as I always have to give when I think a covert assault is not intended. In response to the other member from Ohio, I may have been in error, but I am informed that a few days ago he offered a resolution to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest members at the President's House.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania must confine his remarks to the pending question.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will do so, sir. The gentleman from Ohio has made some remarks about these appropriations in which I concur. But I desire to state how this matter has originated. The payment of the President commenced in this way: Washington said that he would take no compensation, but would keep a regular account of his expenses for the Government, and the Government might pay him in that manner; but the compensation was ultimately fixed at $25,000 a year. It has not been for the President nor for his accommodation, more than it has been for that of members of Congress, or for any of the officers of the Government. Prior to heating the White House with heated air, the President paid his own expenses for fuel. Prior to the introduction of gas the President paid for his own candles. But when Congress, by a law over which he had no control, made provision for putting into the White House heating apparatus for heating the house with heated air, it was unreasonable to require the President to incur the expense necessary for keeping up the furnace; and when Congress provided for introducing gas into the East Room and into every room in the house which was for their own accommodation, and for the accommodation of strangers, and not for the accommodation of the President, it was unreasonable to impose upon him obligations to incur the additional expense for lights which were provided for the accommodation of the public and not for his own accommodation.

The question was taken upon Mr. STANTON's motion to strike out; and it was not agreed to—ayes 76, noes 78.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move to amend the following item in the bill, by increasing the appropriation from $33,000 to $43,000:

"For lighting the President's House and Capitol, the public grounds around them and around the executive offices, and Pennsylvania avenue, and Bridge and High streets in Georgetown, $33,000."

The object is to provide gas for lighting the extension of the Capitol. The estimate was not received by the Committee of Ways and Means until after the bill had been reported and printed, which is the reason why it was not originally put there.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to know the necessity of this appropriation?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman will find a full explanation in the following letters upon the subject, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read.

The letters were read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 13, 1858.

SIR: I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of the Interior requesting an appropriation of forty-three thousand dollars ($43,000) in lieu of thirty thousand dollars, ($30,000), the amount named in the estimates heretofore submitted as the sum required "for lighting the President's House and Capitol," &c., for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, and for the same objects to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the present fiscal year the sum of five thousand dollars, ($5,000.)

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HOWELL COBB, Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JAMES L. ORR, Speaker of House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,

WASHINGTON, March 11, 1858.

SIR: For reasons assigned in the inclosed copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Public Buildings to this Department, dated the 26th ultimo, I have the honor to request that the following estimates of appropriations may be submitted to Congress, to wit:

"For lighting the President's House and Capitol, the public grounds around them and around the executive offices, Pennsylvania avenue, and Bridge and High streets, in Georgetown, $43,000, in lieu of $33,000, the amount named on page 46 of the estimates heretofore submitted, as the sum required for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and for the same objects to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the present fiscal year, $5,000."

With great respect, your obedient servant,

J. THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

Hon. HOWELL COBB, Secretary of the Treasury.

OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS,

February 26, 1858.

SIR: I have received a letter from Joseph F. Brown, Secretary of the Washington Gas Light Company, stating that he had presented to Captain Meigs bills for gas consumed in the Capitol extension for the months of December and January last, amounting to $1,450 75, of which sum Captain Meigs is only willing to pay $650, leaving a balance of $790 75, which the company expects me to pay.

The appropriation for the current year was made in the fall of 1856, when there was not any prospect of the extension being ready for occupancy for legislative purposes; and, therefore, the cost of lighting that portion of the building was not included in the estimate, and for the same reason it was not included in the estimate for the next fiscal year. I cannot, of course, pay out of the present appropriation, the bill for lighting the extension, as I should not be able to continue the lighting of the Capitol, President's house, Pennsylvania avenue, &c., which alone were contemplated in the appropriation. I have no data upon which to make a reliable estimate of the cost of lighting the two extensions.

I am informed that there are twelve hundred and sixty burners, besides fourteen or fifteen thousands jets above the glass ceiling in the new Representatives Hall. These jets are merely used to ignite the burners, and are then shut off. The twelve hundred and sixty burners will average eight feet of gas per hour each; or a total of ten thousand and eighty cubic feet per hour, at a cost of $35 10. In addition, all the offices, halls, passages, committee-rooms, &c., are profusely supplied with gas-burners, and of course will consume an enormous quantity of gas. The gas consumed last month in the old Capitol, President's House, President's square, Lafayette square, and from the navy-yard to Georgetown, on Pennsylvania avenue, amounted, all told, to $1,976 12. During the same period, I am informed, the gas consumed in the Capitol extension alone amounted to $1,000.

If you determine that I should pay for lighting the extension, I respectfully suggest that you ask for an appropriation of $5,000 additional for the current year, and $10,000 additional for the year ending June 30, 1859.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. BLAKE, Commissioner.

Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. GOODE. I have an amendment which I offer, to come in directly after that just adopted. I move to add the following:

For erecting thirty additional lamp-posts in Bridge and High streets, Georgetown, the sum of $810.

I will say that, during the last Congress, an appropriation was made for extending the lighting of Pennsylvania avenue to Bridge and High streets, in Georgetown. The appropriation was extended under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings; but was not sufficient to finish the work. I am informed that there are thirty lamp-posts yet to be erected, and that the cost will be $810. I hope the amendment will meet the concurrence of the House.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. COX. I move to amend by adding after the one hundred and eighty-fifth line the following:

For the purchase of books ordered for new members of the House of Representatives prior to the Thirty-Fourth Congress, the sum of $5,013 35, which sum has heretofore been appropriated, and reverted to the Treasury on the 30th of June, 1856.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I think that amendment is not in order. It is not authorized by existing law.

Mr. COX. Before the Chair decides the question of order, I ask him to hear an explanation of it—what the Clerk of the House says upon the subject, showing that the appropriation asked for is in accordance with law.

The letter of the Clerk was read, as follows:

OFFICE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,

May 18, 1858.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry relative to books due Hon. Jonathan Taylor, as a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, I have to say that there are no books on hand nor money out of which they can be purchased.

I have asked, through the Committee of Ways and Means, for the reappropriation of (about) five thousand dollars which has reverted to the surplus fund, for the purpose of supplying the few cases like that of Mr. Taylor, which remain unsatisfied.

Very respectfully,

J. C. ALLEN,

Clerk House of Representatives, United States.

Hon. S. S. COX, House of Representatives.

Mr. COX. The object of the inquiry to which the Clerk responded, was to furnish books heretofore ordered to members of Congress prior to the Thirty-Fourth Congress. The sum of $5,013 35 was heretofore appropriated for this purpose—to furnish books heretofore ordered to members of Congress prior to the Thirty-Fourth Congress.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. My question of order is that this would repeal a law which is now upon the statute-book providing that no appropriation of money shall be made to purchase books for members, unless the amount is deducted from the regular salaries of the members. What the gentleman from Ohio proposes is independent legislation, and is not in order in this bill.

Mr. COX. The gentleman does not understand my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that as the amendment does not affect members of this Congress, and as he understands that a resolution of a former Congress authorized books to be furnished to these members, the Chair is of opinion that it is in order.

Mr. COX. The amount that I state was repaid into the Treasury by a mistake of the Clerk of the House.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order upon another ground than that stated by the gentleman from Kentucky. It seems, from the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, that there was an appropriation to provide for the purchase of these books, which has lapsed into the Treasury under the law.

Mr. COX. I will explain that.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, sir, it has lapsed into the Treasury under the law providing that when an appropriation shall not be expended within two years, it goes into the general fund. Now, sir, it is proposed that we shall legislate and authorize an appropriation of over five thousand dollars, for the purpose of purchasing books that have not been before supplied.

Now, the question that I raise is, that this is independent legislation. It appears that this proposition is necessary because of the failure of these parties to obtain the books. For aught we know they do not want the books. We are not apprised that they are applying for the books now.

Mr. COX. Yes, they are.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. At any rate there is a way of making the appropriation in this case as in any other, by a bill founded upon a knowledge of the transaction, and which bill must undergo the usual forms of legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it is not for the Chair to decide whether the committee will make a second appropriation for the same purpose. The Chair knows the fact that the House did pass the resolution of which the gentleman from Ohio speaks; and if it is the pleasure of the committee to make a second appropriation for the same purpose, it is not for the Chair to decide it out of order.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. If the decision of the Chair is correct, and an appropriation has once been made for individual members who were heretofore entitled to these books and never received them, then this is a private claim, and cannot properly come in a general appropriation bill. If these individuals are entitled to the books, they ought to come before the House with a private claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has doubts about the question of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky; but thinks it probable that it is well taken, yet, not being fully advised upon the subject, will decide the question of order against him.

Mr. COX. I do not wish to delay the committee, or interfere with this bill, but it will be an act of manifest injustice to the members of a former Congress who failed to get their portions of the books, either because they were not as expeditious as others, or because the books were not printed at the time they were applied for. A great many members of Congress, prior to the Thirty-Fourth Congress, did not receive their books. These books have been applied for, but the Clerk was unable to supply them, because there was no money with which to purchase books theretofore ordered. A specific case which I have in my mind, is a predecessor in my own district, (Jonathan Taylor.) I inquired of the Clerk for his books, and, in response, he wrote me the letter I have read to the committee. It is nothing more than just that this should pass.

Mr. BURNETT. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and for the reason that it proposes to take money from the Treasury for the purpose of applying it to the purchase of books for former members of this House. The money which he now proposes to take out has gone back into the Treasury under a law of Congress. The gentleman says it would be unjust and improper to refuse to give these books to members who have served upon this floor. The whole system of voting money for the purchase of books for members of Congress, was, in my judgment, always wrong. It ought never to have been engaged in by Congress. I would ask the gentleman upon what grounds he would refuse to vote books to me? This is my second term here, and I have never received any books. We have provided by law for stopping this abuse, and now we are told that we should vote this money out of the public Treasury for that very purpose.

Mr. COX. The gentleman does not design to place me in a wrong position. This matter occurred before the compensation bill passed, and the books were actually ordered. This man was omitted, and to refuse this now would be an act of partiality.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand the gentleman's statement. What was the object of the friends of such an appropriation as this, and what were the reasons urged for voting money for the purchase of books? It was, that they were necessary in legislation, and for keeping members thoroughly posted in regard to affairs of the Government. But we might with as much propriety take out money from the Treasury, and scatter it broadcast to every citizen of the country, because every man in the country is as much entitled to such an expenditure of money as any man who has received it upon this floor. As a matter of justice, this claim has no merits whatever, in my judgment. The only matter of surprise to me is, that the amendment was offered by a gentleman of so much intelligence as my friend from Ohio.

Mr. LETCHER. I propose to amend the amendment for the purpose of getting information.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow me, I think I can throw a little light upon this matter.

I move to strike out $5,000. This is a proposition, as I understand it, to appropriate money to purchase books for a former member of Congress, by the name of Jonathan Taylor, of the Columbus district, Ohio. No such member has been here, to my knowledge, for the last fifteen years. I understand he was here about the year 1838. This book resolution was commenced, I believe, about the year 1834; and then it was that Congress had previously ordered and contracted for the printing of the State Papers, the American Archives, and some other works, and had a surplus of copies on hand. A resolution was passed to furnish them first to members here. At a subsequent Congress they were given to new members; and it was continued until all those editions were exhausted. Any gentleman who was here at that time was, I think, in default of his rights who did not claim his right, and take the books.

If I remember correctly, this practice of buying books and distributing them to members of Congress commenced about the Twenty-Eighth Congress. When I first came here I was told that there was a surplus number of copies on hand. Upon inquiry I found that there was not one; but that Congress passed a resolution for distribution, and the next session we came here and made an appropriation of $87,000 to pay for the books. I think that was the first appropriation that was made to buy books and give to members. But even in that day they put into the resolution a provision that nothing in it should be construed to authorize a reprint of those books. They were distributed at that time from the books which were purchased from the publishers, or persons who had contracted to publish them for Congress.

As I said before, the distribution was made until the surplus copies were exhausted, and then they finally passed resolutions for distribution, and afterwards made appropriations to meet them. But this is a case where the appropriation has gone back into the Treasury.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am opposed to the amendment and to the whole proposition, and I desire that the committee shall come to a vote.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask my colleague whether it has been the practice under the old book system, for the Clerk to procure the books, box them up; and if there was no disposition made of them by a member, to store them away in the crypt of the Capitol until he sends for them? I make the inquiry upon facts which came to my knowledge the present session. A predecessor of mine wrote to me that he had actually got only a portion of the books under the resolution passed while he was here, and requested me to apply to the Clerk for the balance of them. I did so, and the remainder being furnished, I sent them to him. If such is the practice, all the gentleman from Ohio has to do is to apply to the Clerk, and he will furnish the books.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe a great many members sold their books, or gave receipts for the money and never got the books, and never saw them.

Mr. LETCHER. This is for the Twenty-Seventh Congress I believe, is it not?

Mr. COX. It is.

Mr. LETCHER. Under the proposition as it is introduced here, this member, if he gets the books at all, gets a great many more than were allowed at that time. The number of books at that time were limited to specific works, a list of which I have in my hand. They were Diplomatic Correspondence, American Archives, Land Laws, Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates, Gales & Seaton's American State Papers, Contested Elections, Elliot's Debates.

Now what I was going to suggest is this: if the House is going back to a period of time so far distant as the Twenty-Seventh Congress, it would be well enough to amend the proposition, and go down among this recently-discovered pile of books, and select out a number of volumes corresponding to those that you give. I see no necessity for appropriating money to buy books while there is a room eighteen feet square full of them in the basement of the building. Let gentlemen go there for them, if they want them. But besides all that, I want to know why this gentleman did not get his books?

Mr. COX. I will tell the gentleman. I wish to be very frank and brief about this matter. Mr. Taylor, who is since deceased, was entitled to these books in the Twenty-Seventh Congress, under a resolution of the House of August 8, 1842.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman was in Congress in 1851, and was entitled to these books in the Twenty-Seventh Congress, why did he not get them?

Mr. COX. I offered a resolution here some time ago to that effect, but I could not get this House to pass it. It required the Clerk to deliver to the widow of Jonathan Taylor, out of the books in his hands, books of equal value with those to which he was entitled. I endeavored to get that resolution passed, but failed; and on inquiry the Clerk told me that there was an appropriation made to meet just this case; but that, by mistake, it was paid into the Treasury, and that probably the Committee of Ways and Means would recommend a new appropriation.

Mr. LETCHER. Was not Mr. Taylor in Congress in 1851?

Mr. COX. I believe he served four years.

Mr. LETCHER. Jonathan Taylor was here four years. He then had the whole of one Congress, and the whole of another Congress to get his books if he chose. He did not choose to take them. It seems to me that it is altogether proper, if his widow insists on this claim on Congress, that she should present her memorial to the House, and let it take exactly the same disposition as other claims take.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have here the names of the Representatives from Ohio in the Twenty-Seventh Congress, and his name is not among them. It must have been prior to that time that he was here.

Mr. COX. The Clerk informed me that he was here in the Twenty-Seventh Congress.

Mr. LETCHER. I must come to the conclusion, if the gentleman cannot tell when he was here, that it is doubtful whether he ever was here.

The question was taken on Mr. Cox's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. DODD. I offer the following amendment: To pay the residue of the salary due the engineer for constructing the bridge across the Potomac at Little Falls, $2,589 67.

I send up a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, which will explain my amendment.

The letter was read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,

WASHINGTON, April 19, 1858.

Sir: By act of 18th August, 1855, an appropriation of $75,000 was made "to complete the bridge across the Potomac at Little Falls, agreeably to the plan already adopted," which contemplated the construction of that work under the supervision of an officer of the War Department, receiving a fixed salary as such. It was subsequently found necessary, however, for the Secretary of War to otherwise employ the officer who had been detailed for that service, which rendered indispensable the employment of a civil engineer, to be compensated out of the appropriation. Even with this increase of expenditure, the work, it is believed, would have been completed within the appropriation, but for the unprecedented flood of last year, which swept away some portions of the work, requiring a considerable outlay to repair the damage. Owing to this circumstance, a small additional appropriation will be required to pay off the liabilities incurred, and I have the honor to invite your attention to the subject, and to request that such measures may be adopted by your committee as will be best calculated to secure it.

If the engineer under whose charge the work was executed be paid at the rate of $250 per month, which is perhaps not too high, the amount required will be $2,589 67; and I would respectfully suggest the appropriation of that sum. In further explanation of this subject, I beg leave to refer you to the inclosed copy of Mr. Coyne's letter, of the 3d ultimo, to this Department, and of the report made thereon by Mr. Whiting, by whom, as acting Secretary of the Interior, his services were engaged.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. THOMPSON, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM O. GOODE, Chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, U. S. Ho. of Reps.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. BOWIE. I offer the following amendment: For building a house for the keeper of the Anacostia bridge, $1,500, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PEYTON. I offer the following amendment:

For making improvements in the city of Washington provided for in the fifteenth section of the city charter, approved May 15, 1820, and the twelfth section of the amended charter, approved May 17, 1848, $5,000.

I ask for the reading of an extract from a report of the Secretary of the Interior.

The extract was read, as follows:

"The Government, however, is a large real estate proprietor in the city of Washington, and provision is made in the charter of incorporation, by which the Commissioner of Public Buildings is directed to reimburse the corporation a just proportion of the expense incurred in opening and improving streets passing through and along public squares. This expense has been heretofore defrayed out of money arising from the sale of lots belonging to the Government; but this resource has now failed us, and an estimate has been submitted for an appropriation out of the national Treasury on that account."

Mr. SEWARD. I raise the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is out of order, there being no law to provide for the appropriation.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to strike out lines one hundred and eighty-eight and one hundred and eighty-nine, as follows:

"For repairs of Pennsylvania avenue, $3,000."

I offer this amendment for the purpose of obtaining information as to how far we are expected to defray the expenses of the municipal government of the city of Washington. I know that the Government has paved Pennsylvania avenue, and that it pays for the gas to light it, and I should judge from the appearance of the appropriation bills that almost all the expenses connected with the municipal government of the city of Washington, are paid by Congress. Now, I want to know whether there is any law—for that seems to be a point made here frequently—that requires us to appropriate money to repair the avenues and streets in this city? If there is, perhaps it is our duty to appropriate this money. If not, I think it is about time that we should intimate to the citizens and to the municipal government of this city, that they should begin to defray some of these expenses themselves. I know they tell us, when we raise these objections, that they are already taxed as much as the law of Congress will permit them to tax themselves.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the gentleman will allow me, I will answer his question, for I do not propose to debate his amendment. There is no law requiring us to do this; but, as the Government owns a large amount of property in the District of Columbia, and in the city of Washington, and as Pennsylvania avenue is the thoroughfare between the Capitol and the Executive Departments, the Government has been in the habit of aiding the city of Washington in grading and repairing the streets, being part owner of the property. That is the principle on which it has been done; and these repairs are necessary, unless you choose to abandon your former practice.

Mr. KELSEY. I have heard the same argument in substance urged here before; and I want to know to what extent the people of Washington expect us to go? It is true that the Government is a large owner of property here; but it is also true, that but for that fact the property of the citizens would be worth nothing at all. The Government gives value to their property by putting its own here, and then they turn round and want us to bear all the expenses of the city because the Government has conferred these benefits upon them.

Now, for one, I am not disposed to go any further in this direction, and I want to test the sense of the House as to how long they are going to continue this course of conduct towards the District. I heard it remarked, the other day, by a gentleman on the street, that if we went on much further, pretty soon we should have to make appropriations to blacken the boots of the citizens of the District, and it seems to me that we have nearly reached that point. I shall insist on a vote on my amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to—ayes seventy, noes not counted.

Mr. PEYTON. I offer the following amendment, which is recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

For inclosing, with a suitable wooden fence, the public reservation on Missouri avenue, between Third and Fourth and a-half streets, with a view of extending the nursery of plants which the Government has on said reservation, $1,314.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to strike out the following clause of the bill:

"For taking care of the grounds south of the President's House, continuing the improvements on the same, and keeping them in order, $3,000."

I desire information of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. We have passed an appropriation for the annual repairs of the President's House, and the further improvement of the grounds, and so forth, and here is another clause for taking care of the grounds south of the President's House, and continuing the improvement of the same, $3,000. Now, I cannot see the use of that division of the appropriation. I know the condition of these grounds very well, and I hope this clause will be stricken out.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he has not been invited to the President's, [laughter,] because I must really refer him to my friend from Pennsylvania, to lecture him.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman has a queer way of showing his friendship.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not think that this particular appropriation is of any sort of interest to the President, and I believe that he would be very glad to have it stricken out, if it is here wrongly.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Virginia is mistaken when he supposes that the two clauses relate to the same public grounds. The first clause related to the grounds immediately about the President's House, but this relates to the grounds between the street south of the President's mansion and the canal, upon which improvements have been in progress for some time past. The Committee of Ways and Means thought this appropriation necessary and proper.

[Loud cries of "Question!"]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. There is not a dollar of the appropriation in the first clause that may not be applied to these grounds south of the President's House.

The amendment of Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, was rejected—ayes thirty-two, noes not counted.

Mr. COLFAX. I move to amend by striking out the words "continuing the improvements of the same," and reducing the appropriation to $1,000, in the following paragraph:

"For taking care of the grounds south of the President's House, continuing the improvements of the same, and keeping them in order, $3,000."

I offer that amendment in good faith. We are told that we have not money enough in the Treasury to continue the improvements in our rivers and harbors, which are necessary for the wants of our commerce, and for the protection of the lives and property of our citizens. We are told that there is not money enough in the Treasury to warrant us in continuing the work on the custom-houses in the various parts of the country, which are in process of construction, and which will result in a great loss to the Government in the shape of damages, in consequence of the work being discontinued. And yet the Committee of Ways and Means have reported, in this bill, items for which there is not a hundredth part the necessity that there is for those I have named. Sir, if the condition of the Treasury is reduced so low that we cannot afford the money to carry on the ordinary expenses of the Government, if we must carry on the work of retrenchment to this extent, I say, let us commence here in Washington. If we are not justified, in consideration of the condition of the Treasury, in continuing the work on public improvements throughout the country, we are not justified in making this appropriation for purchasing trees and plants in these public grounds. I move, in addition to reducing the appropriation, as I have indicated, to strike out the words "and for continuing the improvements on the same." This will leave $1,000 for taking care of and keeping in order these grounds, and which I think will be sufficient.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to strike out the following clause:

"For the payment of laborers employed in shoveling snow from the walks to and around the Capitol, the President's House, and the pavements along the Government reservations on Pennsylvania avenue, $800."

My reason for making the motion is that there is an abundance of laborers employed on the public grounds, who have nothing to do in the world; and who can be employed to perform that service.

Mr. CLAY. Will the gentleman name the parties he wishes to employ?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The grounds upon which the Committee of Ways and Means passed upon these appropriations were these: the estimates were sent to them, and they have cut the amount down to the lowest point. If the gentleman wants the snow to lie upon the walks next winter, if there should be snow, then he will vote to strike out this appropriation. It would be a still better arrangement if the gentlemen would provide that there should be no snow, and then there would be no necessity for the appropriation. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORGAN. If you will employ some of the men who are employed by the year, and who are idling away their time during the winter with nothing to do, there would be no need of making any appropriation for this purpose. There are men enough already employed to do this work, without employing any more.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman. If the House want this work done next winter, I do not believe they can get it done for less money, or in any better way.

Mr. MORGAN called for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to amend the bill by striking out the following paragraph:

"For casual repairs of the Patent Office building, $3,000."

I make the motion for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means what casual repairs are needed on the Patent Office building to the amount of $3,000? I supposed that building was of such a character that no repairs were needed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The word "casual," I believe, means incidental or contingent repairs, which cannot be anticipated.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Yes, sir, I know; but what makes the necessity of providing for such a contingency? The building is fire-proof; and is constructed of marble and granite. I do not see what repairs can be needed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The experience of the past shows that it is necessary to make provision for these contingencies. They will always arise; and I understand that this is the customary amount to appropriate.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move to strike out the following paragraph in the bill:

"For completing the west wing of the Patent Office building, filling up the southwest corner of the square, setting the curb, and raising Ninth street in front of the building to its proper grade, $50,000."

Mr. EUSTIS. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana to withdraw his amendment a moment for the purpose of allowing me to ask the Chair if the amendment which I proposed yesterday in reference to custom-houses and marine hospitals is in order here?

Mr. DAVIDSON. No, sir; I insist on my motion. I make the motion for the reason that I do not think the Treasury is in a condition, at this time, to warrant the expenditure of this appropriation, so long as it is in such a condition that we cannot appropriate the money which is needed to continue the work on the custom-houses which are already under contract in the different parts of the country.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means have not passed upon a single item upon the ground that we believed, or did not believe, it necessary; but because it was required, or was not required, to carry out provisions of existing law. Now, sir, there is a law providing for the erection and completion of this building; and the money is necessary to comply with the provisions of existing law. If you want to stop the construction of this building, strike out the appropriation; but if you want to have the building completed, you must provide the means to finish it.

Mr. DAVIDSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us that the Committee of Ways and Means had not the power to discriminate; that the law requires these buildings to be completed. I ask the gentleman how it is that they discriminate against the custom-houses? Does not the law require that they shall be completed? Have we not already expended thousands of dollars in their construction? They reported in favor of one and not for the other, and I hope this committee will reject their action.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The estimates for the custom-houses were not before us.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Then I have to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania this: that if the necessities of this Government are so great at this moment that the custom-houses under contract have to be suspended, I do not see why these appropriations for the District of Columbia should be continued at this same time. Let us put them all upon the same footing, and let us wait until the Government can draw breath, if she is out of breath, before we go on with either of them. If there is no absolute necessity for completing the custom-house at New Orleans, there is no absolute necessity for completing the Patent Office extension. And I think the one ought to be stricken out as the other has been stricken out; and I make that motion.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to strike out the words—

"For repairing the fence round that portion of the Mall upon which the Smithsonian Institution is situated, $1,000."

I do not think we are called upon to pay this sum, especially as there is no money in the Treasury belonging to the Smithsonian fund.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to know whether the gentleman desires me to hear anything he says?

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir; but there is so much noise I cannot hear myself talk.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have not heard a word the gentleman has said.

Mr. SEWARD. I think this appropriation is wrong.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This appropriation is for the proportion of repairs which the Smithsonian Institution contributes to the repair of the fences.

Mr. SEWARD. The Government of the United States loaned out this fund to some of the States and never got it back, and it had to assume the loss and appropriate money out of the Treasury to carry out the bequest of Mr. Smithsonian.

Mr. ENGLISH. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I move that the committee rise. [Cries of "No!" and "Withdraw it!"] I will not withdraw it. I stand by my motion.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was taken on Mr. SEWARD's amendment, and it was not agreed to, there being on a division, ayes 56, noes 53.

Mr. PEYTON. I offer the following amendment:

For continuation of filling up the ravine, and grading Judiciary square, $7,000.

All I have to say in reference to that amendment is, that I have been requested by the Commissioner of Public Buildings to offer it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The estimates on which these amendments are based were before the Committee of Ways and Means, but were omitted because the committee thought we could get along without them, and desired to cut down the appropriations as much as possible.

Mr. SEWARD. Is that amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is in order, being in continuation of a work heretofore commenced.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to amend the bill by striking out the following clause:

"For cleaning out the sewer traps on Pennsylvania avenue, $3,000."

Mr. BLISS. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether he boarded at the National Hotel last winter? [Laughter.]

Mr. KELSEY. I did; but I do not think it is the business of Congress to provide for work of this kind.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I oppose the amendment, and ask for a vote upon it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PALMER. I offer the following amendment:

For completion of custom-house at Ellsworth, Maine, $2,000.

For completion of custom house at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $50,000.

For completion of custom-house at Bristol, Rhode Island, including fencing and grading, $5,000.

For completion of custom-house at New Haven, Connecticut, $60,000.

For completion of custom-house at Oswego, New York, $10,000.

For completion of custom-house at Plattsburg, New York, $10,000.

For completion of custom-house at Newark, New Jersey, $10,000.

For completion of custom-house at Norfolk, Virginia, $20,000.

For completion of custom-house at Pensacola, Florida, $5,000.

For completion of custom-house at St. Louis, Missouri, $20,000.

For completion of custom house at Mobile, Alabama, including fencing and paving, $30,000.

For completion of custom-house at Galena, Illinois, $10,000.

For completion of custom-house at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, $10,000.

Mr. ENGLISH. The only way to get rid of this bill within any reasonable time, is to strike out the enacting clause. That will bring the bill before the House, where proper amendments can be offered. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. GROW. I raise the same point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] the other day, that the motion is not in order in Committee of the Whole when debate has been closed by the order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules that question of order, and decides that the motion is in order.

Mr. MILLSON. I believe it has never been attempted before to strike out the enacting clause of an appropriation bill; and in order to test the sense of the committee as to the authority of the committee to strike out the enacting clause of an appropriation bill, which must first be discussed in Committee of the Whole, so as to cut off all amendments, I appeal from the decision of the Chair entertaining the motion.

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to say that all the amendments which ought to be adopted can be moved in the House before the previous question is called.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Under the rules, no amendment making an appropriation can be offered in the House, except by unanimous consent. The rule says that every proposition to appropriate money must first be discussed in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOCK. The remarks of the gentleman may be a very good argument against striking out the enacting clause.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. You had better call the previous question at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the striking out of the enacting clause would dispose of all the amendments, and bring the House to a vote on the original bill.

Mr. ENGLISH. If there is any disposition to go on, and dispose of the bill within a reasonable time, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. MASON. I renew it, in order that it may be voted down; because the gentleman has been hanging it over us for the last two hours. [Laughter.] I withdraw the motion.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I raise a question of order on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PALMER.] My point of order is, that the amendment is the same in substance as the one offered yesterday by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. EUSTIS,] and rejected by the committee.

Mr. PALMER. No, sir; it is not the same.

Mr. GREENWOOD. It embraces a number of the same appropriations.

Mr. PALMER. Still it is not the same.

Mr. GREENWOOD. It may not contain all the appropriations for custom-houses and marine hospitals that were embraced in the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, but many of them are the identical appropriations; and, therefore, I hold that it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I want to ask the Chair a question. Suppose I introduced an appropriation for a marine hospital at Napoleon, Arkansas, and it was voted down; should I have a right to introduce the same proposition again?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no such question before the committee; and the Chair begs leave to decline to decide questions which have not arisen.

Mr. PALMER resumed the floor.

Mr. GROESBECK. I ask the gentleman from New York to accept the following as an addition to his amendment:

For completion of the marine hospital at Cincinnati, Ohio, $50,000.

Mr. PALMER. Is that contained in the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. GROESBECK. It is.

Mr. PALMER. Very well; then I accept it.

Mr. GROESBECK. I know that it is very necessary.

Mr. PALMER. I hope the amendment which I have offered will prevail. It addresses itself to the common sense of the House, and should meet its unanimous approval. It covers about a dozen cases where buildings have been commenced by order of this Government, and almost completed; and the Secretary of the Treasury, and officers having the works in charge, recommend that these small sums shall be appropriated for their completion. I know very well that the building at Plattsburg can be completed for $10,000. It is estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury, as necessary to complete the building. The building is nearly completed, but unless this appropriation is made, it will have to stand with the doors and windows boarded up for another year.

Again, Captain Bowman states in his report that its construction having been to a great extent of iron, it will suffer very great damage by being left in its present condition. The appropriation asked for is a very small one, and I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. BURNETT. I move to amend the amendment by appropriating $5,000 for the purpose of completing the marine hospital at the town of Paducah, in the State of Kentucky. My reason for offering this amendment I will state to the committee. During the last Congress, there was appropriated $5,000 for the purpose of repairing and refitting the marine hospital at Paducah, and grading the grounds around it. The Committee on Commerce recommended a bill appropriating this amount of money, which was introduced by myself; but the Committee of Ways and Means cut down the appropriation to $5,000. They have gone on and made some repairs and some improvements under the appropriation which was then made; but the appropriation was not enough; $10,000 would not have been too much; and that was the amount recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, I will state that while I am not in favor of our system of marine hospitals, yet if you will look at the returns of this hospital, which is situated at the mouth of the Tennessee river, twelve miles below the mouth of the Cumberland and forty miles from the mouth of the Ohio, there are more patients there than are at Louisville, or any other point in the Mississippi valley, except New Orleans. This building has been erected by the Government, and it seems to me that Congress ought to make an appropriation sufficient to complete it and to preserve it from dilapidation and decay. The Government must necessarily have to keep it in repair, and hence I offer the amendment which I have, and which I hope the committee will adopt.

Mr. EUSTIS. I ask the gentleman to accept the amendment which was offered yesterday, providing for other marine hospitals and custom-houses.

Mr. BURNETT. I am willing the gentleman should have a vote upon his amendment, and will accept it.

Mr. BRANCH. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and that offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. During the last Congress several small appropriations were made for the construction of public buildings, mostly in States where only a small amount of the public money has been expended. Amongst others, there was a small appropriation made for a building for the United States courts in the city of Raleigh, in the State of North Carolina. Yet, sir, not one dollar has ever been expended of that appropriation. The reason for it was the condition of the Treasury; and I am satisfied with the course pursued by the Secretary of the Treasury. The reason has been satisfactory to me, and, I presume, has been to every gentleman from a State in which similar appropriations have been suspended. As I understand it, in some cases appropriations made two years ago, remain in the Treasury untouched; and yet gentlemen are now insisting that we shall appropriate additional sums for precisely similar purposes. I ask gentlemen of what avail it is to make these appropriations? Why pile one appropriation upon another, if the condition of the Treasury is such that even the appropriations which were made in the last Congress cannot be expended? Let us, at least, wait for the Government to accomplish that for which provision was made two years ago, and which has not been accomplished in consequence of the condition of the Treasury. If these amendments were to be adopted, the sums appropriated could not be expended. The laws which have already passed making appropriations must be executed before any of these provisions can be carried out. I am opposed both to the amendment to the amendment and to the original amendment.

Mr. PHELPS. I understood the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] to suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] to modify his amendment, and that the amendment was thus modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the modification was made, and the question is now upon the amendment as modified.

Mr. BURNETT. I had yielded the floor when the gentleman from Louisiana asked me to accept of a modification. I said I had no objection to accepting it, so as to give the committee an opportunity to vote upon it, but that I thought it would answer the gentleman's purpose better to offer his amendment separately.

Mr. PHELPS. I merely rose to know how the matter stood, that we might know what we were voting on.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Kentucky does not accept the modification, the amendment cannot be received at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. BURNETT. I am willing that a vote should be taken upon the amendment I have offered.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What has become of that omnibus bill?

Mr. EUSTIS. Here it is.

Mr. BURNETT. I prefer a vote upon my amendment alone.

Mr. EUSTIS. I understood that the gentleman from Kentucky had already accepted the modification.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. He says he has not accepted it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is debate in order? The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I object to it. The question was taken on Mr. BURNETT's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. EUSTIS. I now move, as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, the following:

Strike out all after the word "for," and insert the following:

For continuing the work on the extension of the Treasury building, $300,000.

For continuing the work on custom-houses building at the following places, viz: at New Orleans, Louisiana, $350,000; and at Charleston, South Carolina, $300,000—$650,000.

For the completion of custom-houses at the following places, viz: at Ellsworth, Maine, $2,000; at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $50,000; at Bristol, Rhode Island, (including fencing and grading,) $5,000; at New Haven, Connecticut, $60,000; at Oswego, New York, $10,000; at Plattsburg, New York, $10,000; at Newark, New Jersey, $10,000; at Norfolk, Virginia, $20,000; at Pensacola, Florida, $5,000; at St. Louis, Missouri, $20,000; at Mobile, Alabama, (including fencing and paving,) $30,000; at Galena, Illinois, $10,000; at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, $10,000; and for annual repairs at custom-houses, $15,000—$257,000.

For the completion of marine hospitals at the following places, viz: at Portland, Maine, $3,000; at St. Marks, Florida, $2,500; at New Orleans, Louisiana, (including filling up, grading, and fencing, and the introduction of gas and water pipes and fixtures,) $85,000; at Cincinnati, Ohio, $50,000; at Galena, Illinois, $5,000; and for annual repairs of marine hospitals, $15,000—$160,500.

For grading, paving, and fencing the grounds, and for furnishing custom-houses, at the following places, viz: at Ellsworth, Maine, $3,000; at Bath, Maine, furniture alone, $1,100; at Burlington, Vermont, $4,600; at New Haven, Connecticut, $8,500; at Oswego, New York, $7,300; at Plattsburg, New York, $9,000; at Newark, New Jersey, $5,200; at Alexandria, Virginia, $3,700; at Norfolk, Virginia, $12,000; at Mobile, Alabama, furniture alone, $2,600; at Pensacola, Florida, $2,500; at St. Louis, Missouri, $14,600; at Louisville, Kentucky, $3,900; at Cleveland, Ohio, $7,100; at Galena, Illinois, $3,700; and at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, $7,700—$97,100.

For grading, paving, and fencing, and for furnishing marine hospitals, at the following places, viz: at Burlington, Vermont, $3,400; at Chelsea, Massachusetts, $19,700; at St. Marks, Florida, $1,200; at Detroit, Michigan, $7,500; at Galena, Illinois, $3,800; and at Burlington, Iowa, $1,100—$39,700.

For completion of improvements of navigation of the Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri rivers, by removing snags and sawyers from the same, $250,000.

Mr. BRANCH. I rise to a point of order. The amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana is not germane to the subject. As I understand it, the latter part of the amendment proposes an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Mississippi and other rivers. That subject belongs entirely to another bill, and therefore I object to the amendment as entirely out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment to the amendment is not in order. The Chair would state that there are several things in the amendment which the Chair believes to be out of order under the 81st rule, and therefore rules it out of order.

Mr. EUSTIS. I will remove the objection to the amendment by omitting the latter clause of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. EUSTIS. I should like to know the reason for the decision.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be impossible for the Chair to state all the reasons.

Mr. EUSTIS. I modify my amendment in the manner which I have indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided the amendment out of order. Does the gentleman appeal?

Mr. EUSTIS. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I offer the following amendment:

For the purchase of Adams's lot, $3,000, in addition to the custom house in the city of Alexandria; if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, said lot is desirable.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I submit that that amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. WOODSON. I offer the following amendment:

For completing the removal of the snags in the Missouri river, $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. MILLSON. I now raise the question of order on that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order.

Mr. MILLSON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw the appeal. We shall have no difficulty in voting down the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MILLSON. That may be, but I can never allow a decision of a Chair, entertaining a motion to strike out the enacting clause of an appropriation bill, to pass without an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs leave to have the 119th rule read.

Mr. ATKINS. I made the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill for the purpose of expediting the public business, but as I find it will retard it, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. KEITT. I wish to inquire of the Chair what has become of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PALMER?]

The CHAIRMAN. The decision of the Chair covered the amendment of the gentleman from New York, as well as that of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. PALMER. I did not understand that the Chair had ruled my amendment out of order. I understood that the ruling of the Chair applied only to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. EUSTIS.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will recollect that the decision of the Chair ruling the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana out of order, covered nearly the whole ground of the amendment of the gentleman from New York. The Chair decided that both amendments were out of order.

Mr. ADRAIN. I move to strike out the following clause of the bill:

"For purchasing plants for the conservatory at the President's House, $1,000."

I think that that is an unnecessary appropriation; and that the $1,000 may well be saved to the Government at this time.

Mr. KEITT. I was instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to move to increase the appropriation to $3,000; but if the committee do not wish to do that, I have no wish to be importunate. I trust, however, that the committee will, at least, not strike out the $1,000. As has been already stated to-day, in consequence of the Treasury extension, the green-house has been torn down, and a new one constructed. There are very few flowers in it, as I have been informed by those who know, and no rare ones. This appropriation is for the purchase of flowers. I am perfectly unselfish in my advocacy of it; for I take it for granted that I am the only member of the House who does not expect to succeed the present incumbent of the White House. [Laughter.] I ask it for the benefit of others, and not for my own.

But, sir, this appropriation is to be final. An appropriation of $3,000 is recommended for the purpose by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Public Buildings. I understand from them that $3,000 would purchase flowers enough, and that no subsequent appropriation will be needed for their preservation.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Are there to be any "morning-glories?"

Mr. KEITT. No; we want neither sun-flowers, nor morning-glories, nor sweet Williams, nor jumping Johnnies, which gentlemen have spoken of. [Laughter.] I am in earnest in this matter. I should have liked to have moved to increase the appropriation to $3,000; but if the House, in a fit of economy, is unwilling to do that, I do not wish to be troublesome.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman give us the names of some of the new flowers they want to purchase?

Mr. KEITT. The Committee of Ways and Means have made an appropriation here of $1,000, and I take it for granted that the gentleman from Virginia knew what he was making the appropriation for. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADRAIN. I am as fond of flowers as any man, but I think this expenditure of $1,000 unnecessary, and therefore I object to it.

Mr. ADRAIN's amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move to strike out the following clause of the bill:

"For the completion of the Washington aqueduct $800,000; and, in addition thereto, so much of the appropriation of $250,000 'for paying existing liabilities for the Washington aqueduct, and preserving the work already done from injury,' contained in the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1857,' approved 18th August, 1856, as may not be required for the said purpose."

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman from Louisiana does not want to speak in favor of that amendment I desire to occupy his time. I am in favor of that amendment. During the last Congress a large appropriation was made for carrying on this work. I do not recollect the amount. A gentleman informs me that it was $1,000,000, for the purpose of bringing the water into this city.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the gentleman from Kentucky has no right to speak in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to speak in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana if he desires.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The rule provides that the gentleman offering an amendment may speak five minutes in its favor.

Mr. BURNETT. I will be very brief. I have no disposition to obstruct the public business. But, sir, I am opposed to this appropriation at this time, when we are told by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that we can have no appropriation of money out of the public Treasury for the completion of public works which have been commenced, are in a state of progress, and are actually going to ruin and decay because we cannot have the money to carry them on. Yet under these circumstances the Committee of Ways and Means report appropriations of millions to carry on the public works in this city and District. I submit that under these circumstances we have no right, at such an enormous expense, to supply the people of this city with the luxury of water.

Mr. KEITT. Water a luxury? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURNETT. To furnish the people of Washington with an over-supply of water. I ask whether we are justified in expending $800,000 for bringing water into this city and carrying on this work?

Mr. BOCK. I rise to a question of order. The debate has been closed upon this bill by resolution of the House, and the rule provides that five minutes may be occupied in explaining an amendment, but the rule restricts that privilege to the member offering the amendment. I submit, therefore, that the gentleman is not in order in speaking in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky are not in order, and that he has not the right to speak in favor of the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, sir, I am opposed to the amendment, and call for a vote.

Mr. BURNETT. If the Chair will permit me, I will change my position, and speak in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to ask the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee whether this appropriation will complete the work?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The statement made to the Committee of Ways and Means is, that this appropriation will cover the entire contracts for completing the work.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Then I will vote in favor of it.

Mr. BRANCH. I move to amend the amendment by reducing the appropriation to $100,000. I am not in favor of striking out the entire appropriation, because it might give rise to a serious public loss by stopping entirely the work on the aqueduct; but I think $100,000 will be amply sufficient to preserve the work from loss, and I hope the appropriation will be reduced to that amount.

Mr. SEWARD. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina. I am thoroughly sick of this talk about the condition of the Treasury; and when gentlemen talk about suspending the work upon these public buildings, I want to know how it is that the power abides in the Executive to suspend the work? Is he not subservient to the will of Congress, or may he carry out his own disposition by delaying the work upon these buildings.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is no money in the Treasury, why does not the President send in here and ask us for the means of carrying on the Government? That is what we want. Government is a borrower, anyhow. The revenue system just amounts to this: that when you have collected so much money from the customs, you have only borrowed that much from the people. There is no man in our whole country but must know that in the present condition of our commerce no money can come into our Treasury until our revenue system is revised. A reduction of five dollars in the expenditure of every family in the United States, in the purchase of foreign fabrics, would reduce the revenue of the United States from fifteen to twenty million dollars per annum. Then let us meet this question like men, and let the Administration come up here and tell us of its difficulties, and ask an appropriation, not only for carrying on this work, but all the works provided for by acts of Congress. We had a surplus in the Treasury not long since, and the policy was to get that money out of the Treasury, and I think they let the money go wisely.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Georgia is not discussing the subject before the committee.

Mr. SEWARD. I am discussing the means of raising the $800,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the amendment under consideration.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall do so. We are asked for an appropriation of $800,000, and gentlemen move to cut it down to $100,000, because we have not the money; I want to have the money raised. I want to see a message come here from the President of the United States, asking for twenty-five or thirty million dollars at least. Then, sir, we shall have enough to carry on these water-works.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I rise to a point of order. It is not the business of the gentleman from Georgia when he shall send in messages. The President is the judge of that himself.

Mr. SEWARD. I am to judge of what I think the President ought to do; and he is to judge of what he will do. I have a right to discuss the policy of this Government, and especially when we have no money in the Treasury. I want to see the money raised, and, though I have seen the President but once this session, if he will call upon me for my opinion, I will volunteer to give it. We have got to borrow the money.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to here read a communication, upon the matter under consideration, from the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SEWARD. I would be glad to hear it.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to the reading. I understand that the time of the gentleman from Georgia is not yet out.

The question recurring upon the amendment to strike out "eight," and insert "one"—

Mr. GARTRELL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINGTON and JONX COCHRANE were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 69.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GOODE. I move to amend by increasing the appropriation one dollar. I do it for the purpose of making an explanation to the committee.

This is a work upon which an immense sum of money has been expended. A sum of $1,350,000 has already been appropriated, and for the most part expended; and the suspension of the work at present would involve the waste of this money. It would be a serious thing, sir, to suspend the work under existing circumstances, when the contractors have invested large sums of money in stocks of various kinds. This bill appropriates $800,000 in addition to what has been previously appropriated, and that will enable the Government to complete this work within the estimate made by the superintendent. Now, sir, if we do not make this appropriation, of what use would be the large sum already expended? If we do make it, it will enable the Department to complete the work within the estimate. Sir, I say it is the cheapest supply of water known in the history of aqueducts. There is no city in the world supplied with so large an amount of water at so low a rate. I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to the withdrawal of the amendment.

Mr. SICKLES. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to know how it is that the gentleman from New York took the floor from my colleague, who rose and objected to the withdrawal of the amendment, and who is entitled to make a five minutes' speech against it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SICKLES. I have only a few words to say in regard to the subject. I desire to make a statement for the purpose of removing a misapprehension which, I observe, exists in some quarters in regard to this work. The impression prevails that this aqueduct is not likely to be completed within the estimates that have been heretofore furnished to Congress indicating its probable cost. I have it from the best sources of information, and I think I can state to the House with entire confidence, that the work will be finished within the estimates heretofore furnished to Congress. I think I am able to state that the work is now put out under contract, or at least that it has been bid for.

Mr. BURNETT. What was the amount originally estimated as the cost of this work?

Mr. SICKLES. I think $2,300,000; and it is officially stated that the work will be completed within that price.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from New York is not opposing the amendment.

Mr. SICKLES. I am opposing it. The proposition is to reduce the appropriation one dollar.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. No; the amendment is to increase it one dollar.

Mr. SICKLES. Well, I am opposed to increasing it one dollar. I think that $800,000 is just enough, and is adequate to all the wants of the work, not too much, not too little. I think it would be trifling with the interests of the Government, and the people, and would be trifling with the money already appropriated and expended to withhold what is now an appropriation adequate to complete this great and beneficial work; and I trust that in view of the ability and integrity, the skill and economy, with which it has been conducted thus far, and the guarantees which are furnished from all these circumstances that it will be completed promptly, and in a manner to reflect infinite credit on the Government, and infinite good to the people of the District, you will no longer hesitate to appropriate the only sum needed for its completion. This is all the money that will ever be required, as there is no reason whatever to doubt that the contracts very recently awarded for the entire completion of the work can be performed for the sum now asked, and that that sum, with the former appropriations, will be only equal to the original estimate.

The question was taken on Mr. Goode's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the original proposition by reducing the amount $7,999. I desire, Mr. Chairman, the attention of the committee but on one point. I do not intend to discuss the original propriety of this measure; but I desire to call the attention of the committee to its verdict yesterday on a similar proposition. When we had up a proposition to vote something to complete your custom-houses, nearly every one of which is completed within a few thousand dollars, you voted it down two to one; and now, by the vote just taken here, it seems that you intend to vote in this $800,000, to complete your water-works in this city, and to vote in other provisions of this bill. The next item is $1,000,000 for the Capitol extension, and the next is $100,000 for the completion of the Post Office building. Now, what I say is this: if the committee is determined to vote these appropriations, I would like to know upon what principle they can refuse to vote money to complete our custom-houses all over the country?

Mr. SICKLES. I will answer the gentleman, if he will permit me. Water is necessary, and these custom-houses are not necessary.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Illinois is not addressing himself to his amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will confine myself to the amendment. The committee decided yesterday that they would not appropriate one dollar to the completion of the custom-houses all over the country. Will we say that we are willing to vote millions on millions for the city of Washington, and not vote one dollar for our own constituents, for post offices or custom-houses, or for the convenience of our people at home? That is the question which I wish to present to the committee. My own opinion was, that we should have voted the appropriations to complete our custom-houses. The Government should act as a reasonable and prudent business man would act in all these matters. Sir, I say if we refuse to vote for custom-houses and marine hospitals, it is our duty to administer the same justice to the Capitol extension and to these water-works.

Mr. GOODE. If the House yesterday violated all the rules of propriety in refusing to do something which the gentleman thinks ought to have been done, is that a reason why it should fall into the same error to-day?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does not the gentleman think that all ought to be put on the same footing?

Mr. GOODE. If you did wrong yesterday, is that an argument why you should do wrong to-day? If you were a sinner one day of your life, is that any reason why you should die a sinner?

Sir, the argument has been often brought before the House, that there have been false representations made to Congress, as to the amount required for certain works; but now I state to the committee, in this case, that I believe it is within the power of the Government to close contracts which would complete the work within the estimates made by the superintendent.

Mr. SICKLES. They are closed now.

Mr. GOODE. Now, why should not this be done? Why should we condemn those gentlemen, who have entered into contract with the Government, to the losses which they are to sustain in selling off their stock, and commencing at some future day to reconstruct the work? Two years ago we appropriated $150,000 to cover up the works, and to suspend their operation for a time. We came forward, then, at the next session, and appropriated $1,000,000 to prosecute the work, and, in making that appropriation, we had to recover from the losses which we had sustained by the sale of the stock. Will the House thus stultify itself? Will it indulge in this strain of hostility to the people of the District of Columbia, and refuse to do justice, lest the people of the District of Columbia should derive any advantage from it. This aqueduct is not constructed for the benefit of the people of the District of Columbia, but for the benefit of the Government of the United States, and of the people of the United States, for the protection of the public works, and for the health of the citizens, of ourselves, and of the officers of the Government, who reside here. I hope the committee will sustain the appropriation.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. BURNETT. I move to amend, by reducing the appropriation to one dollar. Mr. Chairman, it is not hostility to the District of Columbia that controls me. I am not here for the purpose of discussing the original propriety of constructing these water-works, but I sympathize with the Committee of Ways and Means in their great anxiety to economize. What is the condition of the country? We have, since the commencement of the present Congress, borrowed $20,000,000. It is said we will have to borrow another sum. Whether that is so or not, I do not pretend to know; but that the condition of the Treasury is embarrassed, all know and all admit. The question that now presents itself to the committee is simply this: whether we will appropriate $1,050,000 of money which we have not in the Treasury for the purpose of doing what? of bringing water into this city, which, to say the least of it, we can dispense with for a while. I ask why we should not suspend this work as well as others? Is there any controlling reason why we should spend $1,050,000 of the public money for the purpose of supplying water to this city, while we are suspending public improvements throughout the country? I think not.

Now we are told that these estimates were for $2,300,000; what assurance have we that that will complete the work? Gentlemen express the opinion that it will. They say that the agent for the Government says it will; but I call the attention of gentlemen to one solitary improvement in connection with this Capitol, on which estimates were furnished. I mean the dome of the Capitol.

Mr. GOODE. I desire to say that the Superintendent of Public Buildings never made an estimate for that dome. The estimate was made by the architect.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Kentucky is not confining his remarks to the subject of the amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. I am giving the reasons why this appropriation should be reduced, and I think I understand as well as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, whether I am confining myself to the subject or not. Now, take this dome of the Capitol—I know it was not estimated for by the Superintendent of Public Works, but it is one instance to show an enormous expenditure of public money, over and above the estimates submitted to the House. Now we are told here, that contractors may suffer. The gentleman from Virginia, on my left [Mr. LETCHER] says there is no contract made. He is on the Committee of Ways and Means, and certainly ought to know. He speaks by authority.

Mr. LETCHER. There has been a proposition for bids, and these bids have been made; and from what I understand, the facts are simply these: that these bids are within the estimate of one million dollars; but that the Secretary of War, in the absence of the appropriation, has not completed the contracts.

Mr. BURNETT. Then, sir, if the contractors lose anything it is their own fault. I am not here for the purpose of legislating for contractors with this Government. I am not here for the purpose of providing for the losses of individuals who may undertake public works; but I am here for the purpose of protecting the interests of the entire country. When we are told that the Treasury has no money in it, and that we must economize, I am for applying the knife where we can best do it without injury to the public good. That is my rule.

Now, on the subject of this Capitol, we are told that we have to vote a large sum of money for it. Sir, if this economy is necessary, let us commence economizing at the right place; and I know of no better place to commence than on these two appropriations in this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LETCHER. As there seems to be some misapprehension in regard to the matter alluded to by the gentleman from Kentucky, I beg leave to state a little more explicitly what the matter is, precisely as I understand it. This proposition was made for bids for this work. These bids have been received, they have been examined and have been approved, and, in the event of an appropriation of money for the purpose of completing this work, contracts based upon these bids will be entered into by the Secretary of War.

Mr. GOODE. And these bids are within the estimates.

Mr. LETCHER. So I have stated. But I am opposed to this thing myself. I voted against it in committee, and I shall vote against it here for this simple and plain reason: that I do not think it either just or right that these individuals who have property in this District should go scot free from taxation, while the Federal Government bears the whole burden.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask the gentleman whether the citizens of the District will not be charged with the water they use?

Mr. LETCHER. I do not understand it to be so at all. The Government is to lay the main pipes along the streets, and then the citizens, as I understand it, are to be allowed to tap these main pipes for their water. But it would give me a far worse opinion of the whole scheme if the Federal Government should go to peddling water here around the city. I take it that when the water comes here the Government will use what it wants, and whatever excess there may be it will allow the citizens of the District to use.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I move to amend by increasing the appropriation $1,000. I differ entirely from my worthy friend from Kentucky in regard to this matter. We are all interested in the city of Washington, as the seat of Government. The Government owns property to the amount of a hundred million dollars in this District. It is well known to gentlemen who are familiar with the state of things here, that there is not a supply of water in this city, and that it is indispensably necessary for the convenience of members of Congress, of Government officials, and of citizens who may be permanently or transiently here, that there should be a supply of water. There is no charge of any misapplication of funds on this work. The Government has already invested very largely in the work, and has spent nearly a million and a half of dollars upon it, and now to leave it in its present condition, would be the worst sort of economy. It is not fair to talk, in connection with this, about custom-houses in New Orleans, or in other sections of the country. We have a right to discriminate. Because we have not sufficient funds to complete all the public works, does it follow that a great work of this kind, at the seat of Government, should fall into ruin? That is not the course of a prudent Government, or the course of a prudent man; and I have heard of no sufficient reason why this appropriation should not be made for this great work. I understand that this appropriation will complete it. It may be, that residents of the city of Washington may derive benefit from this work; but is that a reason why the Government should be deterred from the execution of what is necessary for the interests of its people?

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the amendment to the amendment will not prevail; for the reason that if it does, it will still leave a large amount of money to be appropriated. I think that the amendment striking out the appropriation altogether should be adopted, for I do not believe that there is any law, or any constitutional power, authorizing us to expend money out of the public Treasury for any such purpose. When we take money out of the Treasury for such a work, we compel the whole people to replace that money; and, as the Government owns property in New York also, we might as well provide by law that Mr. Astor, or some other person in New York, shall build water-works for that city, as to provide that the people of this country shall contribute to the building of water-works for this city. It is all wrong—the whole of it.

I object to it on another ground. We have solemnly voted down appropriations that were required to fulfill existing contracts—valid contracts. We suffer the faith of the Government to be violated, because, as we say, we have not got money to fulfill those contracts. And yet, in the face of that, we are going on to appropriate $800,000 out of the Treasury for a work for which there is no contract, merely because we want to complete this work this year, instead of next year, or at some subsequent time. I say, first, that it is unconstitutional; next, that there is no law for it; and if we appropriate this money for this purpose, and repudiate our solemn contracts, we shall bring down upon ourselves justly the scorn of the civilized world. Why shall we repudiate our contracts, for the sake of violating all sound constitutional principles?

I hope the amendment to the amendment will be voted down, and then I hope that the original appropriation will be stricken out. I feel free to make these remarks, because this item was inserted in the bill by the Committee of Ways and Means in my absence, and I was not committed to it. I have never voted one dollar for this work, and I never will. If the work could be completed for one dollar, I would not vote it.

[Loud cries of "Question!"]

Mr. STEWART's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COBB. I ask the attention of the committee to what I shall say, for I shall not occupy my five minutes. I move to strike out the entire clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Alabama that that amendment is already pending.

Mr. COBB. I thought it had been voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to add an amendment at the end of the clause; to which, I presume, there will be no objection.

Mr. COBB. I wanted to offer an amendment. I had not concluded my sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor. The gentleman will please state his amendment.

Mr. COBB. That is what I want to do if I can get the attention of the Chair. The pending amendment, as I understand it; is to strike out the entire clause.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the pending proposition.

Mr. COBB. Then I move to strike out all but the words "which may not be required for said purpose."

The Chair and the committee will see my object at once. It is now nearly five o'clock. It is obvious that, unless we get rid of this clause, we may discuss the question for the next twenty-four hours. The experience of former sessions has shown that we cannot dispose of this question in less than two days. Now, my object is to have the whole clause stricken out; and I call the attention of the friends as well as the enemies of the appropriation to it. If we strike out the clause here, when we get into the House we can have a vote taken upon striking it out, by yeas and nays; and if there is a majority against striking it out, why, then its friends can sustain it. I am against the appropriation; and when we come to vote on it in the House by yeas and nays, I shall vote in favor of striking it out. Now, if the committee wants to get rid of the question, let the friends and enemies of the appropriation vote to strike it out; and then, when we come into the House, we can have a vote on it by yeas and nays.

Mr. STANTON. Notwithstanding the interesting programme of the gentleman from Alabama, I propose to amend his amendment so as to perfect the words which he proposes to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio cannot offer any further amendment at this time.

Mr. COBB. I want a vote on my amendment.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to amend what the gentleman proposes to strike out.

Mr. COBB. He cannot amend it; and I want a vote on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio, if it be to amend the bill, takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STANTON. I propose to add to the clause proposed to be stricken out, the following:

Provided, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended until contracts shall be entered into with responsible parties for the completion of the work; which, in the aggregate, shall not exceed the amount hereby appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DAVIDSON] moves to strike out the whole paragraph. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] moves to amend the matter proposed to be stricken out, by striking out all of it but the last line. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio, in the opinion of the Chair, is not in order at this time.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask for the reading of the paragraph at the top of the 105th page of the Manual.

Mr. STANTON. I think the Chair is in error in regard to the question of order. The gentleman from Alabama has proposed an amendment to the amendment, to strike out certain words. It is in order to move to amend the matter proposed to be stricken out before the question is taken on striking out. It does not come within the rule in relation to amendments in the third degree.

Now I propose to qualify the words proposed to be stricken out, by adding a proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama proposes to strike out a certain clause; the Chair thinks it is in order to amend the part proposed to be stricken out, and therefore decides the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio to be in order.

Mr. STANTON. I have opposed this appropriation from the commencement. There is no member of this House who has opposed it with more consistency in the former Congress, and I expect to continue to oppose it to the end. But, sir, I have seen too much of these appropriations to have any hope of ultimately defeating this. I remember that at the close of the last session of Congress, after it had been voted down here half a dozen times, it came in from the committee of conference, and we were obliged to take it or defeat the bill. I move to add the following at the end of the clause:

Provided, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended until contracts shall be entered into with responsible parties for the completion of the work, which, in the aggregate, shall not exceed the amount hereby appropriated.

Now, as I have said, this appropriation will pass. Gentlemen may set that down as a fixed fact. You may vote it down here as often as you please, and it will come back in this bill; and if you kill the bill it will be put on to another bill; and you cannot keep it out unless you take the responsibility of stopping the wheels of Government. I intend to vote against this appropriation, and to do all I can to defeat it. But, as I have said, there is a thorough conviction upon my mind that it will pass; and I deem it, therefore, important that a condition should be attached to it, that no part of the appropriation shall be expended until contracts shall have been entered into to complete the whole work. I presume there will be no difficulty about the amendment, for I understand that contracts can be entered into for the completion of the entire work within this appropriation.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted. The question then recurred on Mr. COBB's amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was not agreed to. Mr. STANTON. Do I understand that my amendment has gone down with the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so decides.

Mr. STANTON. I do not understand that to be the effect.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I rise to a question of order. The motion was to strike out the whole clause with the exception of these words: "as may not be required for said purpose." Now, the friends of the clause may move to amend the part proposed to be stricken out, and it was amended on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama. The motion to strike out was then lost. I submit, therefore, that the original proposition stands with the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, attached. The Manual says, on page 105:

"In like manner, if it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, the friends of the paragraph are first to make it as perfect as they can by amendments, before the question is put for striking it out. If on the question it is retained, it cannot be amended afterwards, because a vote against striking out is equivalent to a vote agreeing to it in that form."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama was decided in order expressly because it did not strike out a paragraph, but only moved to amend it. Therefore the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio was received as an amendment. The amendment was lost, and was so decided by the Chair. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MASON. I move to strike out the words "for the completion of the Washington aqueduct," and to insert "for pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812."

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. My point is, that there is no law for the payment of these pensions, and that the amendment is not germane to this bill.

Mr. MASON. Then make a law. The old soldiers never were in order with the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. LETCHER. The old soldiers are in order with them whenever there is a law providing for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. MASON. Then I move to strike out the words, "for the completion of the Washington aqueduct."

Mr. STANTON. Now, I rise to a question of order. It is, that it is not in order to move to strike out anything included in the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, for, by a vote of the committee, they concluded to retain it.

The CHAIRMAN. The 53d rule says:

"53. Any member may call for the division of a question, which shall be divided, if it comprehend propositions in substance so distinct that, one being taken away, a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House. A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible; but a motion to strike out being lost, shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert."

The Chair is of opinion that it is in order to move now to amend.

Mr. MASON. Well, I will move to amend by striking out all the appropriation except two dollars. Like the gentleman from Michigan, I do not know that this Government has the power to appropriate money for this purpose. This Government was instituted for a different purpose than that of ornamenting, beautifying, and adorning this capital.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I rise to a question of order. I understand that this same amendment has been offered before, and considered by the committee.

Mr. MASON. You misunderstand.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. The amendments were made to strike out all but one dollar, and all but two dollars, and they were rejected by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not remember that such an amendment has been voted on.

Mr. MASON. Nor does anybody else. No such an amendment has been made. I was proceeding to say that I did not suppose that this Government had the right to draw money from these States for the purpose of ornamenting and beautifying one single city. You have converted it, by these and various other schemes, into about the same condition that the Jews converted Jerusalem, who taxed their distant provinces to make pools of water, to furnish them with male singers, to lay them down floors of gold, until the people revolted. The duties of this Government are few and simple. I shall not refer to them, but this certainly is not one of them. You have, as you have been told by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, an empty Treasury. In the face of that fact you have acres of ground here covered with granite and marble, and immense palaces. You have fifteen miles of pipe laid from some point on the Potomac into this city, for the purpose of supplying this metropolis with water. All that you have, with an empty Treasury. You spend millions of dollars and borrow the money, and pay interest upon it, for the purpose of ornamenting, adorning, and making wealthy this great city. And while you are doing all this with an empty Treasury, the Committee of Ways and Means purchase an $800 book-case, and spend $900 for a looking-glass. And, while they are doing this upon an empty Treasury, it is entirely out of order with them, and they refuse to give to the friends of their country—the soldiers of the war of 1812—a single dollar. I ask them, when they are looking into those immense looking-glasses and are surveying their costly and rich furniture, to look around and see if they cannot find some meritorious soldiers of that war who need some assistance at the hands of the Government.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it in order to move to strike out the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Is it in order to move at the committee rise, and report the bill to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. Not while any gentleman desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. LETCHER. I want to reply to the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky. My friend from Kentucky, in the amendment which he has offered, seems to have no other end in view than to take an examination of the acts and doings of the Committee of Ways and Means in regard to their furniture. It strikes me that he was the chairman of the Committee of Accounts; and that the approval or allowing of the accounts for furniture was in his hands. [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. The committee never passed the account.

Mr. LETCHER. It goes there, whether they pass it or not. The gentleman says we have an eight or nine hundred dollar looking-glass. That is about six hundred dollars above the highest price paid for any looking-glass in the Capitol.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. LETCHER. Am I? Where is the $600 one? Now, sir, I understand that $300 is the highest price that has been given; and I think it very extravagant.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is not in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I am replying distinctly to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana was recognized, and made a motion.

Mr. LETCHER. Does the Chair decide that I am out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the gentleman has not been recognized, because the gentleman from Indiana had the floor.

Mr. HUGHES. If I am entitled to the floor, I will yield it to the gentleman from Virginia, and withdraw my motion.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, then, Mr. Chairman, I take up the question again. My friend from Kentucky says that the various rooms about the Capitol are furnished most extravagantly, while money has been very scarce, and by way of setting us a good example, he is in favor of distributing the public money under the name of paying pensions to old soldiers, and then to borrow the amount. Now, it strikes me that if, in furnishing the Capitol, we have done it rather extravagantly, we have not gone quite so wide of the mark as he would go in the scheme which he presents for consideration. He does not pretend that this is a debt due to these soldiers, or that the Federal Government is bound to pay this money.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. What relation has this question of old soldiers' pensions to water-works?

Mr. LETCHER. I respectfully refer my friend from Michigan to my friend from Kentucky for an explanation.

Mr. MASON. It is one of the prime debts of the country.

Mr. LETCHER. Where is the evidence of it?

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I raise the question of order, that the gentleman's remarks do not apply to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman is hardly in order.

Mr. LETCHER. If it is not in order to reply to a speech that has been made, when I am on the other side, I suppose I may sit down.

The question was taken on Mr. MASON's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to strike out the whole section.

Mr. LETCHER. That motion is pending now.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Well, I hope we will have a vote on it.

The question being on Mr. DAVIDSON's amendment—

Mr. COX called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON and BARKSDALE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes eighty, does not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ARNOLD. I move the following amendment:

Insert between lines two hundred and twenty-four and two hundred and twenty-five the following:

For the completion and furnishing of the custom-house at New Haven, Connecticut, $58,000.

Mr. KELSEY. I raise a question of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move to amend

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MAY 21, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 142.

the bill by striking out the two hundred and twenty-fifth line, as follows:

"For United States Capitol extension, $1,000,000."

I make that motion for the purpose of disposing of this question. Otherwise it would be debated here another day, and we should end the debate where we began it. If gentlemen are in favor of the appropriation, they can have a chance to vote upon it in the House; if they are opposed to the appropriation, they have the same right in the House. I think the Committee of Ways and Means are as competent to decide on its necessity as we can possibly be who have given less attention to it. If we strike it out, we can pass on to other items of the bill; and we will have an opportunity in the House to record our votes for or against this item. In the anxiety to dispose of the public business, I hope the committee will proceed to vote on my amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman—

[Loud cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I understand my right here to be to offer my amendment, and the right of gentlemen on the other side of the House to reject it if they see fit. I propose to amend by adding this amendment:

Provided, That this appropriation shall not be expended, in whole or in part, upon the embellishment or decoration of the Capitol extension, either by painting or sculpture in the panels or niches of the Senate or House, or in the pediments of the porticoes, or in the finish of the halls, committee rooms, or passages, unless the designs for such embellishment and decoration shall have been first submitted to and accepted by a committee. To be selected by the President, composed of three distinguished artists, citizens of the United States, which committee shall be employed by the President for the purpose of examining and determining upon such designs as shall be adopted for the embellishment of the Capitol extension: And provided further, Said committee of artists shall act in connection with and subordinate to the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress, and shall not be authorized to conclude any contract for the execution of such design without the direction of said committee.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the committee, if this amendment does not explain itself, that it is my purpose, in offering the amendment, to place the embellishment of this Capitol in the hands of our Joint Committee on the Library, but to interpose so as to have the designs that are to fill these panels and niches submitted to artistic taste before they are adopted. If you appropriate for this Capitol extension a million dollars, and permit it to go unguarded in this appropriation bill, this million dollars may be expended, in whole or in part, by those who have heretofore conducted the embellishment and decoration of this Capitol. The panels around this Hall may all be filled with this money. These niches may all be filled with sculpture of the selection of gentlemen who have no experience in such matters; and I think, myself, it ought to be guarded.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the gentleman will listen to me for a moment, I would suggest that instead of his three distinguished artists he refer this matter to the Joint Committee on the Library, and they can consult with distinguished artists if they choose.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would say to the gentleman that I have brought the committee of artists that I have designated under the control of the Committee on the Library so far as to prevent the artists from executing designs until they shall be approved by the Joint Committee on the Library. But I have brought the Joint Committee on the Library under the control of artistic taste to the extent that the designs that are to be submitted to them shall have passed the examination of men of some professional skill.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky what amount of pay his amendment provides shall be given to these artists?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. None at all, sir. I am proud for American artists to say that they want no pay. All they ask is that their country, in erecting an edifice like this, and in establishing a great national monument like this, may do as other countries have always done—encourage art so far as to give their artists some opportunity to transmit their names to future times, in connection with this national edifice, and not to have the panels of this Hall filled with daubs like that. [Pointing to a specimen of fresco in one of the panels of the Hall.]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I approve of his amendment, and hope it will be adopted; but I wish to remark that the money which will be required for the decoration of this Hall is not included in this appropriation.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor. The gentleman is so commendous in his remarks, that a single sentence deserves a reply. [Laughter.] Let me say to the gentleman,

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, Than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

Sir, if this appropriation is not guarded as I propose, these panels will be filled—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I do not propose to reply at any length to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky; but when he proposes to call into requisition the high degree of artistic skill which he eulogizes so much, I may refer to some of the exhibitions of artistic skill here, that have provoked the criticism and animadversion of members ever since we have occupied this Hall. It is claimed by these artists that this Hall exhibits the highest degree of that artistic skill which is again to be invoked to decorate and adorn this Capitol. Now, I am not disposed to confide much in that kind of artistic skill by which this Hall and this Capitol extension have been decorated. I much prefer to rely upon the Joint Committee on the Library, or a joint committee to be raised for the purpose, than upon these three distinguished artists.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. None of my men had anything to do with this Hall.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If we place the matter under the control of such a committee, who will, of course, consult such artists as they consider to be distinguished artists, I think we shall arrive at better conclusions than by confiding the matter to the unlimited control of three distinguished artists, who are kind enough to volunteer their services for no compensation but the distinguished honor of having their marks upon this national edifice. I think the fact that they are willing to give their services without pay is quite conclusive evidence that their services would be worth just what they ask for them. [Laughter.]

I hope the amendment will be modified, so as to place the matter under the direction of a joint committee of Congress; but if it be a fact, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that this appropriation does not apply to the decorations of the Capitol, then the amendment is altogether unnecessary.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would like to know where the control of the matter is now?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I suppose that the control of it rests with the architect of the Capitol.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I understand that it rests with the Committee on the Library.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. And that committee have never consulted on the subject, as I understand.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. And never will.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. There is no law directing the supervision of the matter by the Committee on the Library.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The architecture of the Capitol rests ultimately with the President of the United States, by law. The actual supervision of the architecture has been transferred to the Secretary of War, and by him to Captain Meigs. And when they put a thing like that painting over there on plaster, they call it a part of the architecture, inasmuch as part of it is fresco work.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Then, if the control of the matter is fixed by law, the gentleman's amendment, according to his own statement, is not in order, as it changes the existing law.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Not at all. There is no provision of law about the embellishment and decoration of the Capitol, to which my amendment is confined.

The amendment to the amendment, proposed by Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, was agreed to.

The question was taken; and the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move to amend, by inserting after line two hundred and twenty-five, the following:

For fencing, grading the grounds, painting and otherwise finishing the marine hospital at Vicksburg, in the State of Mississippi, $5,000.

Mr. LETCHER. That amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I propose to offer the amendment which was just voted into the clause which has been stricken out, as an independent amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order. The clause has been stricken out of the bill, leaving nothing to which the gentleman's amendment is germane.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill:

For repairing the saloon in the old portion of the Patent Office building for the reception of models of patents, and for fitting up and furnishing the same with suitable cases, $40,000.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. This amendment is not germane to this bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the gentleman from Georgia will hear this letter upon the subject, I think he will see that it is in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. Report what it hitches to.

Mr. SEWARD. It does not hitch to anything.

Mr. HOUSTON. If it does not hitch, then I object to it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to any portion of this bill and cannot be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it need not necessarily be germane to any portion of the bill to make it in order. The Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. SEWARD. It is not to carry out any existing law, and I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The question was taken on the appeal, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now send up the following letters, which will explain the whole matter.

The following letters were read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
February 19, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication from Hon. J. Thompson, Secretary of the Interior, with inclosures, by which an additional appropriation is requested of $40,000, "for preparing the saloon of the old portion of the Patent Office building for the reception of models for patents, and for fitting up, repairing, and furnishing the same with suitable cases."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
HOWELL COBE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JAMES L. ORR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, &c.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, February 18, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of a letter addressed me on the 16th instant by the Commissioner of Patents, asking that such steps may be taken as may be requisite to obtain an appropriation for fitting up the portion of the Patent Office building heretofore occupied by the collections of the exploring expedition, for the reception of models, &c.

Approving of the object for which the expenditure is proposed to be made, I have the honor to request that the following estimate thereof be submitted by you to Congress, to wit:

For preparing the saloon of the old portion of the Patent Office building, for the reception of models for patents, and for fitting up, repairing, and furnishing the same with suitable cases, $40,000.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. THOMPSON, Secretary.
Hon. HOWELL COBB, Secretary of the Treasury.

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE,
February 16, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to submit, for your consideration, the inclosed communication from Mr. Edward Clark, architect and superintendent of the Patent Office building. Should his suggestions in regard to the new cases, &c., which will be required, meet your approbation, I hope it will be agreeable to you to place the matter in such a position before Congress as will secure the requisite appropriation.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. HOLT,
Commissioner of Patents.
Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

PATENT OFFICE BUILDING,
January 25, 1858.

SIR: At your request I have examined the cases now in the saloon of the old portion of the Patent Office building, and find them defective and unfit for the reception of models.

The present cases are so high that another tier cannot be placed above them, as there is no head-room to pass under the architraves.

By making new cases of less height than those now in the room, and putting a gallery and an additional tier above, you will have nearly twice the room for models that you now have.

I would, therefore, most respectfully suggest that new cases be made similar to those in the wings, and that the walls and ceiling of the saloon be repaired and painted.

To carry out this object an appropriation of $40,000 will be required.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
EDWARD CLARK,
Superintendent Patent Office Building.
J. HOLT, Esq., Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. BURNETT. What law is there authorizing this appropriation?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The law requiring the Patent Office to be built. The law requiring it to be fitted up and furnished. I will state that the saloon in the center building has been occupied with curiosities, but they have recently been removed into the Smithsonian Institution, and this appropriation is now necessary to fit up the saloon for the reception of models. There are twenty laws upon the subject of the Patent Office, any of which would authorize this appropriation.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman says this is authorized under the appropriations for the extension of the Patent Office building, and under the law which authorized the building of the Patent Office. Now, sir, that portion of the building for which this $40,000 is asked, has been finished for years. This is a separate and independent appropriation of money for the purpose of putting cases in the hall of the Patent Office that has been made vacant by the removal of the museum to the Smithsonian Institution. I take issue with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and tell him there is no law authorizing the appropriation. I ask the gentleman to show me upon the statute-book any statute which authorizes an appropriation of $40,000 by Congress for the purpose of putting cases into the central hall of the Patent Office.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. In reply to the gentleman I will say, that there is not a single law upon the statute-book authorizing the furnishing of any building, either an executive building, the President's House, or this Capitol. The furnishing proceeds upon the principle that it is an incident to the erection of the buildings themselves.

Mr. BURNETT. This is not for furnishing the Patent Office.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask the gentleman what evidence he has that it is necessary that we should expend $40,000 for the purpose of putting cases into that hall? Where are the models to put into them? The building is now full of cases, and those cases are not now fully occupied. Now, I ask the committee if they will go on and appropriate $40,000 to put additional cases into a room which has been made vacant by removing the museum to the Smithsonian Institution? I think it should not pass.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I want to offer an additional section to the bill.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move that the committee rise and report the bill, with the amendments, to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not in order.

The question was being put on the amendment of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, when

Mr. BLAIR said: I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I move that the committee rise. I do not want to be kept here all night upon this bill.

Mr. HUGHES. The motions are not in order, as the committee were dividing on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS. I have an amendment which I desire to submit. It does not require an appropriation of money; but it is to correct some mistakes in an appropriation of money by the last Congress.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. — And he it further enacted, That the balance of the appropriation of $2,300, "for flagging foot way, in the congressional burying ground, from the entrance of the same to the Government vault," by act approved 3d March, 1857, may be applied in extending the flagging the whole length of the avenue, as originally intended, and that the appropriation of $1,500 "for the construction of the wooden bridge, with a double track, across the canal, in the line of the main avenue," may be applied to the erection of a foot-bridge in lieu thereof, as recommended by the Commissioner of Public Buildings.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I now offer the amendment which I before offered, in relation to the decoration of the Capitol, and which was struck out under a misunderstanding.

The amendment was read.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. Inasmuch as everything connected with the extension of the Capitol has been stricken out, this amendment is not germane to anything in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the question of order is well taken.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The question being, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" it was put; and decided in the affirmative.

So the opinion of the Chair was sustained, and the amendment was ruled out.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill (No. 200) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1859, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House, with various amendments, with a recommendation that they do pass.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move the previous question upon the adoption of the amendments.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me, before he calls the previous question, to offer an amendment which was agreed to by the committee unanimously, but was voted out afterwards by mistake.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have no objection to allow that amendment to be offered, if I do not lose the floor thereby.

The SPEAKER. If it be the pleasure of the House, the proposition will be received.

There was no objection, and the amendment was entertained.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. BARKSDALE, the House (at six o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 20, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. SAMUEL ROGERS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. HAMMOND presented the credentials of Hon. ARTHUR P. HAYNE, appointed a Senator by the Governor of the State of South Carolina, to fill, until the next meeting of the Legislature, the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. Josiah J. Evans; which were read; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. HAYNE, he took his seat in the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. IVERSON presented a memorial of the State of Georgia, praying that the money expended by that State in the payment of troops for the protection of the frontiers of that State, from hostile incursions by the Indians, between the years 1793 and 1818, may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. POLK presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of St. Louis, Missouri, praying that the remainder of the lands granted to Iowa, for the improvement of the Des Moines river, may be applied to the Keokuk, Fort Des Moines, and Minnesota Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOUSTON presented a memorial of the executive board of the American Indian Aid Association, in the city of New York, praying that such laws may be passed as will protect and improve the Indian tribes in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented a memorial of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, praying to be released from the condition of the fourth article of the Cherokee treaty, made at New Echota, December 29, 1835; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the petition of P. J. Hickey, praying for the payment of a sum of money due him under an agreement between him and the United States, and indemnity for losses occasioned by a breach of that agreement on the part of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAMMOND presented the petition of Clark Mills, praying for an amendment of the act of Congress of January 25, 1853, authorizing the erection of an equestrian statue of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THOMPSON, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 230) for the relief of the legal representatives of Daniel Hay, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 339) granting a pension to Joseph Vance, reported it without amendment, and submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Eliphalet Lyman, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 318) recognizing the assignment of land warrant No. 35,956, issued to John Davis, as valid, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 375) to create two additional land districts in the Territory of Washington, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota praying that an appropriation may be made for the improvement of the St. Croix river; a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota praying that an appropriation may be made for the removal of the Beef Slough bar, in the Mississippi river; a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, praying that an appropriation may be made for the improvement of the Mississippi from the mouth of the Minnesota river to Sauk Rapids; a resolution of the Legislature of California in favor of the construction of a breakwater at San Louis Obispo, in that State; a report of the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution calling for surveys of the Potomac river in the vicinity of Washington; and a report of the Secretary of War, communicating estimates for the improvement of certain harbors on Lake Erie, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred a memorial of John H. Litchfield and others, light-house keepers, for an increase of salary; two petitions of business men of the northwestern lakes, asking an appropriation to test the applicability of Professor Ballot's theory of storms to the lakes; a memorial of Daniel F. Tiemann, and others, in relation to a plan for the sanitary improvement of the city of New York; resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey in favor of the restoration of the ports of Jersey City and Camden to that State, and, if necessary, of making them ports of entry; also of establishing ports of entry at Tom's river and Atlantic City, and a modification of the laws relating to the coasting trade; and resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce at Charleston, South Carolina, in favor of the vigorous prosecution of the coast survey, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. The same committee, to whom was referred a resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to restrain the importation or emigration into the United States of foreign paupers and criminals, have instructed me to report, that while they approve the object of the resolution, they are not able to devise any specific means for achieving it, and therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 251) to authorize the claimants in right of John Huertas to enter certain lands in Florida, reported it without amendment.

Mr. GREEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the expediency of conferring additional powers on the United States district courts in California, in certain cases, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 141) to establish a port of entry at Tom's river, New Jersey, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the petition of Marie Genaud, sole heir of John Hudry, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 385) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of John Hudry. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, reported a bill (S. No. 386) to amend "An act granting lands to the Territory of Iowa to aid in the improvement of the Des Moines river, in said Territory;" which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the petition of Rev. A. G. Carothers and others, citizens of Washington, as to the inclosure of the square opposite the Assembly Church, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of the heirs of John Forsyth, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 388) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late John Forsyth. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of James B. Thomas, and a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, in his behalf, reported that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 23) to authorize a change of location of the South Pass wagon road, for the purpose of giving greater security and protection to emigrant travel, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia; which was agreed to.

Mr. BIGLER, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of A. L. Pennock, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

LAND DISTRICT IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. STUART. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 561) to create a land district in the Territory of New Mexico, have directed me to report it back and recommend its passage; and inasmuch as it is of a very important public character, and contains but a section or two, I hope the Senate will pass the bill at this time. There is no land district in this Territory now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It provides that the public lands in the Territory of New Mexico, to which the Indian title shall have been extinguished, shall constitute a land district to be called the "District of New Mexico," the office for which shall be established at such place, within the district, as the President of the United States may from time to time direct. A register and receiver are to be appointed, to reside at the site of the office, whose powers, duties, obligations, and responsibilities, are to be the same as are now prescribed by law for other land officers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 383) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLINGMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 384) to regulate the rates of postage to and from foreign countries; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PUGH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 387) for the better regulation of sales and entries of the public lands, and to limit the fees of registers and receivers at the several land offices; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STUART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 389) providing for the allotment of lands to certain New York Indians, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. COLLAMER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 44) to grant to the judges and solicitor of the Court of Claims the use of the congressional library, and for other purposes; which was read and passed to a second reading.

ARMS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SLIDELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform the Senate whether in his opinion it be expedient to convert any portion of the arms of the United States now on hand into breech-loading arms; and of the advantage to be derived from such change; the probable cost thereof for rifles and muskets; and, if any, what appropriation be necessary for that purpose.

LIEUTENANT WARREN'S EXPLORATIONS.

Mr. JONES submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the engraving and publishing a map of the explorations of Lieutenant Warren, in Nebraska Territory.

ALBUQUERQUE WAGON ROAD.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of making and opening a route for a wagon road, on or near the thirty-fifth parallel of latitude, from Fort Smith, on the Arkansas river, to Albuquerque, in New Mexico.

NEW ORLEANS CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. SLIDELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform the Senate of the present condition of the new custom-house at New Orleans, what sum will be necessary for its completion, and what appropriation is required for the payment of liabilities under existing contracts.

SAMUEL BROMBERG.

Mr. MASON. Yesterday I submitted, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, an adverse report on the petition of Samuel Bromberg. I have since ascertained that the case was not referred to the committee; and I ask, therefore, the reconsideration of the order by which the committee was discharged from the reconsideration of the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask that those papers be now referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in order that they may be reported upon.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN C. CARTER.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John C. Carter, reported a joint resolution (S. No. 43) for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. GWIN. I ask the Senate to consider that resolution at this time; and I will give my reasons very briefly. It is a mere explanatory resolution of one that passed the Senate upwards of three years ago. The original resolution was reported by me as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. It passed both Houses; but a construction was placed on it by the accounting officers of the Treasury which deprived him of $900 which the Committee on Naval Affairs and Congress intended he should have. This is merely to do away with that. I hope it will be acted on now.

Mr. KING. I should like to hear what the resolution is.

The joint resolution was read a second time. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in the settlement of the accounts of Lieutenant John C. Carter, of the United States Navy, to allow him the sum provided in the joint resolution approved February 13, 1855, for such expenses as were incurred by him whilst acting as purser on board the ship Massachusetts, while undergoing repairs at San Francisco, California, deducting therefrom the sum allowed him on account of that service since the date of the passage of that joint resolution; but the allowance is not to exceed $955 36.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. KING. I ask if there is any report, or anything which can give us any information as to the nature of the joint resolution? I should judge, from the language, that this man had an allowance, but now wants more.

Mr. GWIN. If the Senator will listen to me for a moment, I will show how the case comes here. The original resolution was reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs upwards of three years ago. I was chairman of the committee at the time; and we specified in that joint resolution the exact sum to a cent that he was to be allowed; but the accounting officers of the Treasury so construed it as to exclude $900 of the amount claimed by him. This is merely explanatory of what the committee intended at that time. I was requested to state the facts of the case, which I know to be so. The accounting officers have refused to allow the amount of $900, by a construction they put upon the wording of the original resolution. I went up myself to inquire into it. I am not on the Committee on Naval Affairs now, but I am requested to make the statement.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is it reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. GWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. If there is any report in the case, I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no report; but there is a statement from the Treasury Department.

Mr. KING. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE, March 3, 1858.

SIR: On the 13th of February, 1855, a joint resolution was passed by Congress, directing that Lieutenant J. C. Carter, of the Navy, should be allowed, in the settlement of his accounts, such expenses as were incurred by him, while acting as purser on board the United States ship Massachusetts, undergoing repairs at San Francisco, provided the amount should not exceed $1,569 05. Accordingly, on the settlement of his accounts, he was allowed by the accounting officers such expenses as were proved to have been incurred by him while the Massachusetts was undergoing repairs at San Francisco, which, however, amounted only to $913 69. Mr. Carter contended that he should have been allowed the whole sum which the resolution provided should not be exceeded, although some of the expenses were contracted while the Massachusetts was not undergoing repairs, and he appealed from the decisions of the accounting officers to the head of the Department. This appeal has never been decided, and while it is pending, I can, of course, take no further action in the matter without your express permission.

The honorable Mr. GWIN was chairman of the committee that reported the joint resolution in the Senate, has recently assured me, that although the intention of the committee may not have been accurately expressed in the resolution, it was certainly designed that Mr. Carter should be allowed the whole amount of the vouchers that were presented to them, which amount was $1,869 05. While I have not the least misgiving as to the correctness of the construction placed by the accounting officers upon the resolution agreeably to what were considered established principles of legal interpretation, and although I know that it is not legitimate in ascertaining the meaning of a law to be influenced by the statement of one of its framers as to what was intended, yet in this case, to save Mr. Carter the time and trouble, which would be required to obtain a supplemental or declaratory law, which would probably be granted if applied for, I have concluded to reconsider the case and allow him the amounts limited by the resolution, if you should see fit to permit him to withdraw his appeal and present the subject anew to this office.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. O. DAYTON.

Hon. HOWELL COBB, Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GWIN. I will state that the original resolution, as it came from the House of Representatives, did not limit the amount to the vouchers before the committee; but we amended it so that the allowance should not exceed that sum; and it covered the very vouchers that were there. We did not so word it that it should be entirely for repairs. There were some other expenses that he incurred that covered the whole amount. It has been so construed as to cover only expenses incurred while the repairs were going on. In the hurry of altering it in the Committee on Naval Affairs, a word was left out which was intended to be inserted.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DELIVERY OF LETTERS.

Mr. KING. I ask that the resolution which I offered yesterday, and laid over with the concurrence of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, be now taken up, and passed. I presume there will be no objection whatever to it.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. KING, yesterday:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire whether the post office laws authorize a postmaster to refuse to deliver letters to a person authorized to receive them by the person to whom the letters are addressed, and whether any legislation is required on this subject, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BIGLER. I would suggest to the Senator from New York that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have had that subject under consideration.

Mr. KING. The chairman of the committee, I believe, has no objection to the resolution, and I hope it will be passed.

Mr. BIGLER. Very well.

The resolution was adopted.

ANTHONY CASLO.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that Senate bill No. 255 be now taken up. It will not occupy three minutes of the time of the Senate. It is a bill for the relief of Anthony Caslo, a soldier of the war of 1812.

Mr. SLIDELL. I hope the Senate will carry out the understanding of yesterday, and proceed with the Private Calendar in regular order. A rule was adopted for that purpose. I presume I shall have no objection to this bill; but it occupies more time to be taking up bills in this way, out of their order. It can probably be soon reached in its regular order on the Calendar.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope this bill will be taken up, with the understanding that we shall then go on regularly.

The motion of Mr. CHANDLER was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 255) for the relief of Anthony Caslo, a soldier in the war of 1812, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the allowance to Anthony Caslo, otherwise known as Anthony Castle, an invalid pensioner, an amount equal to $2 66 per month, from May 25, 1816, to May 25, 1851, the date at which his name was entered on the roll of invalid pensioners.

Mr. PUGH. Is that a bill to grant a pension from 1816 down? I should like to hear the reason for it. Is there a report?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Secretary to read the report.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. JONES on the 13th of April, from which it appeared that Anthony Caslo, or Castle, is a native of France, and for several years was a soldier in the French army; he was taken prisoner in Spain during the Peninsular war, and carried into England, where he was induced to enlist in a regiment bound for Canada, with the hope of finally getting into the United States. In February, 1814, he left the British service, and joined the American militia, but was soon retaken, and tried for desertion, and condemned to be shot, which sentence was finally commuted to whipping. As soon as he was able, he again deserted, and enlisted in the Army of the United States, and was attached to the twenty-sixth regiment of infantry, and was soon promoted to a sergeantcy. In the sortie at Fort Erie, on the 17th September, 1814, he was badly wounded by a musket ball in the left side, and was discharged on the 17th day of June, 1815, as being unfit to perform the duties of a soldier by reason of such wound.

The petitioner applied for a pension in 1816, but a pension was denied him; and in several successive applications he was still denied, on the ground, as was alleged, that his name did not appear upon the rolls. This was subsequently found to be an error of the Third Auditor of the Treasury.

Mr. PUGH. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am obliged to say that I am entirely happy to find that my objection to the consideration of this bill has not prevailed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SHERLOCK AND SHIRLEY.

Mr. BRIGHT. A bill for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley was laid on the table on my motion the other day. If it would come up in its order, I should not call it up now, but it will not be reached on the Calendar, as it is on the table. I suppose there will be no objection to taking it up. I understand that the Senator from Florida, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, has an amendment to offer that covers the point in dispute. If it is debated, I will give way; but I am quite sure there will be no debate.

Mr. POLK. The difficulty is, that there are a great many bills on the Calendar that are entitled to be heard, and have as much claim on the consideration of the Senate as that one.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will say to the Senator from Missouri, that this bill is on the table, and would not be reached in order. If it leads to debate, I will not insist on it.

Mr. YULEE. I will state to the Senate, that I have prepared an amendment, which will probably be satisfactory.

The motion of Mr. BRIGHT was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 278) for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley; the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. BENJAMIN.

Mr. YULEE. The amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, I presume, will be withdrawn. I have prepared an amendment which I have exhibited to that Senator and to the Senator from Missouri, who before objected to the bill, which is satisfactory to them.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am willing to withdraw my amendment, another one having been prepared covering the object.

Mr. YULEE. My amendment covers the whole point contended for, and is in harmony with the views of the committee and the practice they have adopted in similar cases. It is to add at the end of the bill:

Provided, That the reëxamination hereinabove authorized shall be confined to cases of fines which have not been heretofore reëxamined and finally decided by the former Postmaster General upon the application of the contractors for remission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope that bill will lie over. It must consume the day if it is taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is up. Does the Senator from Mississippi move to postpone it?

Mr. DAVIS. I move to postpone it until tomorrow.

Mr. PUGH. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not press that motion. I understand that this is simply a case which was not decided at the expiration of the term of the late Postmaster General. Why not have it decided now? It is all ripe for a decision; the officers can promptly examine and promptly decide it. Time and again it has been delayed on the ground of receiving proposals for new mail routes, or rather new service on mail routes; and these parties have been delayed and put off, first by the neglect of the Department, and now by the new Postmaster General referred to Congress, and when they come to Congress they are to be delayed again. It does not open up anything at all, but just continues the appellate court; for that is what practically it is.

Mr. DAVIS. I see nothing of merit in this case at all. It is quite apparent, from the statement made by the Senator from Ohio, and frequently by others on the same side, that if the case has not been decided, as they say, there is no difficulty in the present Postmaster General taking it up and deciding it.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator understood what was stated by the chairman of the committee, and what was stated here at the last Congress, when we passed one or two amendments to the Post Office appropriation bill, he would remember that the Postmaster General, without some suggestion from Congress, will not examine any case that is left untouched or undecided by his predecessors. Whether he can or cannot do it, he does not do it.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Ohio certainly mistakes the position of the present Postmaster General. He is a man of enlarged views and very obliging temper, and he never could have taken the position that he would not decide anything his predecessor had not decided, but only that he would not reverse the decision his predecessor had given.

Mr. YULEE. I am satisfied that the Senator from Mississippi, when he understands the facts of the case, will perceive that the principle for which he contends is not violated at all, but that the legislation proposed is in precise harmony with it; and I will say that the views of the committee are in entire harmony with those of the Senator from Mississippi, and we have so acted in reference to all cases which have come before the committee. This case, which is proposed to be submitted by this bill to the Postmaster General, was never actually decided at all by the Postmaster General; has never been seen by him; and yet, technically, it will be a reëxamination; and technically there is a practice which prevents the present Postmaster General, in his view of the matter, from examining and passing upon it.

The difficulty arises in this way: by a practice which was peculiar to the late Postmaster General, Mr. Campbell, and which was contrary to that pursued by all former Postmasters General, fines were permitted to be entered up by the clerk, and sent to the Auditor without ever undergoing the inspection of the Postmaster General, and without receiving his sign manual, or assent; and yet they were considered as decisions of the Department. Against these parties, fines were entered up in that manner, never going before the Postmaster General. When the contractors learned of these fines, they then came forward upon an application to the Postmaster General to reexamine the case—technically to reexamine, but for the first time, in fact, to examine the fines, and pass upon them. That application was pending. As shown by an affidavit of the parties, the Postmaster General continually and repeatedly promised them to take up the case as soon as he could find time; but he went out of office without having found time. When the new Postmaster General reached the cases in their regular order, he said he must be obliged to consider the fines which had been entered up and passed the Auditor as a decision of the Department. Technically it was; but actually, the Postmaster General has never passed upon these fines. In order to prevent this bill being used as a precedent in any other case in which the same exact facts did not exist, I have agreed to an amendment which covers the whole principle on which objection arose in the former debate. There actually has never been any examination or decision by a Postmaster General, and this will be the first. If the Senator could convince the present Postmaster General that he has the authority, without a law, to do it, it would be very well; but even then I think it would be preferable to pursue this course.

I respect the scrupulousness of the Postmaster General. I think it is wholesome. I think it is better that in all cases in which even an apparent decision has been made before him, the application for review should pass under the consideration of Congress before the new Postmaster General takes it up for reexamination. I think, myself, he has full authority to act in this case; I agree with the Senator on that point; but yet the Postmaster General does not think so, and injustice will be done to these parties if we do not intervene to remove his objection by a remedial act. We provide that if there has been an examination and decision by the former Postmaster General, the present Postmaster General shall not touch it. The only object is to enable them to bring the arbitrary decision of the clerk under the review of the Postmaster General. That is the whole matter. It is reasonable; it is right.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Florida, to whom I defer with very great respect, both for his information and his character, seems to me to bring forward the statements of the applicants in this case, and present them as evidence of the action of the Department.

Mr. YULEE. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. DAVIS. Who makes the affidavit referred to?

Mr. YULEE. The parties make that affidavit; but I have a letter from the officer of the Department having charge of the papers showing the facts. There is no evidence at all on the files indicating the fact that the Postmaster General has ever touched these cases.

Mr. DAVIS. Allow me to proceed a moment, and you will understand me better. Have you anything from the Department which shows that the Postmaster General promised to examine this case and did not do it?

Mr. YULEE. No, sir.

Mr. PUGH. That statement I made on the authority of the applicants.

Mr. YULEE. I have an affidavit stating that fact. It is not a matter of record. A promise by the Postmaster General, in the nature of things, is not a matter of record. These are well-known, reputable, wealthy citizens of Louisville and Cincinnati, whose sworn testimony ought to be received, and is received, by the committee, with consideration, especially when corroborated by information from the Department, and which the files exhibit.

Mr. DAVIS. I was going on to say that the late Postmaster General was a man of great labor, and great exactness in his office. It was not necessary for him, before entering up a fine, to make a thorough examination. That was a matter of law. The contractors knew perfectly well that when they failed to deliver the mail they were subject to a fine; and the mere fact of their having failed to deliver the mail was all that was necessary to determine the conclusion that they were to be fined.

Mr. YULEE. Will the Senator excuse me for interrupting him?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly. I will give way forever.

Mr. YULEE. You are stating facts differently from those which exist on the record.

Mr. DAVIS. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. YULEE. There never was a failure to deliver the mails. There was only delay in delivery on account of low water, fogs, &c.

Mr. DAVIS. I presume the gentleman is the only Senator in the body who did not understand that the failure I referred to was to make time. I give way entirely.

The question being taken on the motion to postpone, there was, on a division—ayes 15, noes 9, no quorum voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks a quorum is present.

Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bigler, Broderick, Cameron, Clark, Clingman, Collamer, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hammond, Harlan, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Polk, Sebastian, Shields, Simmons, Slidell, Stuart, and Wilson—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Benjamin, Bright, Dixon, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Henderson, Jones, Kennedy, Pugh, Seward, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wade, and Yulee—16.

So the bill was postponed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will call up the next business in order, and clear the docket of resolutions.

Mr. STUART. I wish to renew a motion made some time ago, by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, to proceed with the Private Calendar during the morning hour, with such cases as do not give rise to debate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SLIDELL. There are a number of cases at the head of the Calendar which have already been passed over as objected to. We may as well begin where we left off when we had the Private Calendar last under consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That suggestion will be adopted if there is no objection.

JANE SMITH.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 87) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of Jane Smith, of the county of Clermont, State of Ohio.

Mr. STUART. This is one of those cases which is objected to, and will be debated.

Mr. JONES. I understand the motion of the Senator from Louisiana to be to commence at those cases which had been laid aside before.

Mr. SLIDELL. They have commenced at that point on the Calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has commenced at the top of the Private Calendar.

Mr. JONES. That is right.

The bill was passed over.

LUCINDA ROBINSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 88) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of Lucinda Robinson, of the county of Orleans, State of Vermont.

Mr. STUART. That bill is of the same class as the other. These two cases involve questions in regard to back pension.

The bill was passed over.

CREEK DEPREDACTIONS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 96) to provide for the examination and payment of certain claims of citizens of Georgia and Alabama, on account of losses sustained by depredations of the Creek Indians.

Mr. STUART. That will be debated.

The bill was passed over.

NAHUM WARD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 93) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of Nahum Ward.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is an adverse report in that case.

Mr. IVERSON. Is there any objection to that adverse report?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Perhaps there may be no objection to it.

Mr. STUART. I move the indefinite postponement of the bill. That is the usual motion.

Mr. PUGH. That is a bill in relation to which I asked an opportunity to examine the decision of the court in favor of the party. It had better lie over.

Mr. STUART. I have no objection to its going over, if the Senator desires it.

The bill was passed over.

O. H. BERRYMAN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 108) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of O. H. Berryman and others.

Mr. PUGH. Let that go over, too. There is an adverse report in that case.

The bill was passed over.

MOSES NOBLE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 109) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of Moses Noble.

Mr. IVERSON. It is proper to say that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] notified me that he objected to that bill. He is not present. I do not desire to press its consideration now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN M'VEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 53) for the relief of John McVey, which proposed to place his name on the invalid pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars a month, to commence on the 1st of April, 1850, and to continue during his natural life.

The Committee on Pensions reported adversely, on the ground that there was no testimony to support McVey's allegations.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is an adverse report in that case; let us act on the report. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

LIEUTENANT NATHAN WEEKS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 113) for the relief of the heirs of Lieutenant Nathan Weeks, deceased.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let that go over.

The bill was passed over.

AMISTAD CASE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 114) to indemnify the master and owners of the Spanish schooner Amistad and her cargo.

Mr. WILSON. Let that go over.

J. HOSFORD SMITH.

The bill (S. No. 115) for the relief of J. Hosford Smith was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs that there shall be allowed and paid to J. Hosford Smith, late consul at Beirut, as an addition to the salary already paid him, for services from July 1, 1853, to July 1, 1854, $1,600.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JEREMIAH PENDERGAST.

The bill (S. No. 116) for the relief of Jeremiah Pendergast, of the District of Columbia, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Jeremiah Pendergast on the pension list, at the rate of six dollars per month, from the 4th of September, 1856, and to continue during his life, in lieu of the pension to which he is now entitled by law.

The petitioner was disabled while engaged in the military service of the United States, and in the line of his duty, on board the steamer Powhatan, on the 4th of August, 1855, and he has recently been placed on the pension roll at the rate of four dollars per month, which sum is wholly inadequate to his support, on account of his total disability.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID MYERLE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 120) for the relief of David Myerle.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That bill will give rise to a great deal of debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FITZPATRICK in the chair.) The bill will be passed over.

Mr. HUNTER. Is not that bill in its regular order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is; but all bills objected to are to be passed over under the order of the Senate, and the Senator from Louisiana objects to the consideration of this bill.

The bill was passed over.

JAMES BELL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 125) for the relief of the legal representatives of James Bell, deceased.

Mr. PUGH. I object to that bill.

The bill was passed over.

JOSÉ DE LA MAYA ARREDONDO.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 126) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of José de la Maya Arredondo.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] had an amendment to offer to that bill. I do not see him in his seat. It had better be passed over.

The bill was passed over.

GEORGE PHELPS.

The bill (S. No. 128) for the relief of George Phelps, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let us hear the report in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. IVERSON, February 8, from the Committee on Claims:

This claim passed the Senate at the last session of Congress, and upon a reexamination of the case the committee are of opinion that the claim is just, and they report a bill accordingly. The facts, as stated in the report of last session, are as follows:

The petitioner presents the following account:

"THE UNITED STATES,

"To George Phelps, Dr.

"May 1, 1846. To extra services, as messenger, rendered in the Quartermaster General's Office, War Department, at nights and Sundays, after the closing of the public offices, from 1st December, 1839, to 1st July, 1846, six years and five months, at $15 per month, $1,125."

Mr. Phelps was the regular messenger in said office during the period named, at a salary of $500 a year.

In answer to inquiries addressed to him the Quartermaster General states that the allegations contained in the memorial are true; that in consequence of the pressure of business in the office, arising out of the Indian hostilities in Florida, he was obliged to remain in the office almost every afternoon, and often until late at night, and often a portion, and sometimes the whole of Sundays; and that Mr. Phelps was obliged to remain and close the office, &c.

General Jesup adds: "The sum he asks is small compared with the amount of labor he has performed; he has fairly and honestly earned it."

Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, and in view of the strong indorsement of its equitable merits by the distinguished head of the quartermaster general's department, the committee report a bill for the payment of the sum claimed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed.

JENNETT H. M'CALL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 30) for the relief of Jennett H. McCall.

Mr. STUART. That bill is objected to.

Mr. BROWN. If it is, I give notice that we might as well go back to the first of the Calendar for I shall object to every bill after that. There is no reason to object to that bill. If gentlemen want to get their private bills passed, take them up and discuss them in regular order.

Mr. STUART. I am sorry the Senator should deem it necessary to make any such statement. I have no bill on the Calendar that I want passed. The Senator from Alabama not in his seat, [Mr. CLAY,] desired that the bill should be laid aside, for he intended to debate it.

Mr. BROWN. It has been laid aside twice for the Senator from Alabama, and I asked him to be here. I cannot consent to let bills be postponed time after time on account of Senators being absent. I can object as well as others.

Mr. STUART. I see that the Senator from Alabama is here. I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to it, and ask if he wishes to discuss that bill? It is a revolutionary claim.

Mr. CLAY. I did propose to say something about it. I hope it will lie over for the present.

The bill was laid over.

Mr. CLAY shortly afterwards said: I objected to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 130) for the relief of Jennett H. McCall. I did so for reasons which I supposed to obtain in this case, but which I am now satisfied do not obtain; and I wish briefly to state to the Senate the reasons why I withdraw the objection; and I hope the bill will be taken up and passed. I had always regarded the pensions—

Mr. KING. I had hoped that we should go on regularly through the Calendar. If, therefore, the gentleman withdraws his objection to that bill, I shall renew it. I shall object to any bills that have been passed by. I think it is better to go through with the Calendar, taking up the bills in their order.

W. Y. HANSELL AND OTHERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 135) for the relief of W. Y. Hansell, W. H. Underwood, and the representatives of Samuel Rockwell; which the Secretary proceeded to read.

Mr. STUART. It is obvious that that bill cannot be considered without debate.

The bill was passed over.

Mr. BROWN. I suggest that this is a very idle proceeding. We are wasting time. I have already notified the Senate that I mean to object to bills when they come up. We had better go back and debate them in regular order. Gentlemen object to bills without having much reason for it. We waste hours in reading bills that are objected to. Let us go back to the beginning of the Calendar, and discuss the bills in their order.

Mr. STUART. It certainly is not necessary to take any time to discuss the subject. The Senator has just come in. The Senate made an order that they would go through the Private Calendar until one o'clock, considering only such bills as did not give rise to debate. If the Senator had been here he could have made his objection. He can now move to reconsider that order, or anything of that sort. But for the Senator from Mississippi to say he will object to all the rest of the bills is rather singular. It is a privilege he has if he chooses to exercise it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill in order will be read.

CHARLES G. RIDGELY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 144) for the relief of Charles G. Ridgely, United States Navy, which the Secretary proceeded to read.

Mr. BROWN. I object to its consideration.

The bill was passed over.

Mr. BROWN subsequently said: I objected a little while ago to a bill for the relief of Charles G. Ridgely. I had no reason for it except I thought it was unjust to object to a bill for the relief of a poor crippled old woman in my country, which has been objected to half a dozen times, I am quite sure, without any sort of reason. But I suppose because other people treat the old woman wrong, I ought not to do wrong to others.

Mr. HALE. I am sorry that I am obliged to renew the objection to it.

JAMES SUDDARDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 148) for the relief of James Suddards.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is one of a class of cases that was objected to before, as being based on wrong principle.

The bill was passed over.

GEORGE H. HOWELL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 149) for the relief of George H. Howell.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is of the same character as the previous bill.

The bill was passed over.

LIEUTENANT JOSHUA D. TODD.

The bill (S. No. 153) for the relief of Lieutenant Joshua D. Todd, United States Navy, was next announced.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have looked at the report in that case, and I cannot agree to that bill passing. I think the principle is wrong.

The bill was passed over.

WILLIAM F. CARRINGTON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 154) for the relief of William F. Carrington, passed assistant surgeon in the Navy of the United States.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is one of the same class of bills.

The bill was passed over.

ROBERT CARTER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 155) for the relief of Robert Carter, passed assistant surgeon, in the Navy of the United States.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is one of the same class.

The bill was passed over.

JOSHUA SHAW.

The bill (S. No. 156) for the relief of Joshua Shaw, of Bordentown, New Jersey, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Joshua Shaw of $7,000, which amount, with that paid to him under the provisions of the act approved February 20, 1846, is to be in full compensation to him for the past and future use of his invention of percussion caps and locks for small arms, and of percussion locks and wafer primers to be applied to the firing of cannon.

This claim is based upon the use, by the Government of the United States, of the memorialist's invention of the copper percussion caps and locks for small arms, and percussion locks and wafer primers for cannon. The facts of the invention by Mr. Shaw, of its great utility and of its extensive use by the Government, have been fully admitted by the ordnance department. In 1847, Congress passed an act (9 Stat., 684,) authorizing the Secretary of War to examine the claim of Mr. Shaw, and directing its payment, to an amount not exceeding $25,000. Under this act $18,000 was allowed and paid, and the present application is for the payment of the remaining $7,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANTHONY S. ROBINSON.

The bill (S. No. 158) for the relief of Anthony S. Robinson, heir and legal representative of John Hamilton Robinson, deceased, was next announced.

Mr. BENJAMIN. This bill on the Calendar is stated to be accompanied by a report, No. 79. (Report No. 79, I find, has no reference to it at all. There is some mistake. If there be a report, I ask for its reading.

Mr. POLK. I think there is a report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report is No. 89.

Mr. BIGLER. I think that the bill had better lie over.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I waive the reading of the report, and object to the passage of the bill.

Mr. POLK. I think if the report be read the Senator will be satisfied.

The bill was passed over.

WILLIAM D. MOSELEY.

The bill (S. No. 172) for the relief of William D. Moseley was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to release him from the penalties and liabilities incurred by him as surety of Harrison R. Blanchard, on his contract with the United States, dated September 25, 1855, for the supply of live-oak timber.

H. R. Blanchard contracted with the United States, on the 25th of September, 1855, to deliver at the navy-yard, New York, on or before the 1st of October, 1856, live-oak, for naval purposes, amounting, in all, to $38,820. For the performance of this contract, the memorialist, together with Mr. A. Williams, was joint surety in the sum of $70,000; and upon the failure of the contractor to perform it, the memorialist took an absolute assignment of the contract from him, as his affidavit shows, and at once entered upon its performance in good faith. Upon referring to the scale of offers accompanying the report of the Secretary of the Navy of the 1st of December, 1856, it will be perceived that Mr. Blanchard's offer was $3,580 lower than the next highest bidder. By the terms of the contract, the timber was to be cut within thirty miles of the sea; and the memorialist states that Indian hostilities existed in this country, and he was thereby prevented from executing it. He, however, furnished a large portion of the timber, and the Navy Department contracted with a new party for supplying the remainder, at prices exceeding those allowed to Blanchard. There has been paid to Mr. Blanchard, on his contract, the sum of $13,979 35, and the reservation in the hands of the Government amounts to $2,466 94. The committee find that the memorialist contracted to deliver this timber at unusually low rates, and that he entered upon the performance of his contract in good faith, and probably would have completed it, but for Indian hostilities; that if the contract be closed, and the reservation of $2,466 94, retained by the United States, be paid to the memorialist, the average of the whole contract will then be at a low rate, and the entire frame, under the two contracts, will have been delivered for $41,546 29, which is on advantageous terms to the Government; that the United States having therefore lost nothing, but having actually obtained this timber upon advantageous terms, the committee deem the memorialist entitled to relief.

DR. KANE.

The joint resolution (S. No. 20) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to pay to the officers and seamen of the expedition in search of Dr. Kane the same rate of pay that was allowed to the officers and seamen of the expedition under Lieutenant De Haven, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN MISSOURI.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 157) to provide for the payment to the State of Missouri of two per centum of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands therein, heretofore reserved under a compact with that State.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire that that bill may lie over.

The bill was passed over.

BENJAMIN E. EDWARDS.

The bill (S. No. 186) to confirm the title of Benjamin E. Edwards to a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to confirm Benjamin E. Edwards in his title to six hundred and forty acres of land, situate in the Territory of New Mexico, being the tract of land located by virtue of a certificate No. 444, of the second class, issued by the board of land commissioners for the county of Bexar, and State of Texas, to one Andrew Flores, dated August 16, 1847, and the same tract of land for which a patent was authorized to be issued by the act of the State of Texas, entitled "An act to require the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue patents therein named," approved December 2, 1850, and which is more particularly described in the plat and field notes accompanying the survey, executed by R. S. Howard, deputy surveyor, and approved of by the district surveyor for the district of Bexar, on the 30th of November, 1849, which survey is numbered thirty-eight in section fifteen, in what was then known as the Bexar land district for the State of Texas, and which is now on record in the office of the commissioner of the general land office of the State of Texas.

Mr. STUART. Is that one of those head-right cases?

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is; but it is one of those which were included in a special act passed by Texas. There are four or five which Texas, by special act, directed a patent to issue for. The act was passed a month or two after the cession to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. W. M'PHERSON.

The bill (S. No. 188) for the relief of A. W. McPherson was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. IVERSON. I can state to the Senator from New York the facts without reading the report—it is rather a long one. This man, McPherson, was employed by the United States marshal in San Francisco, under the direction of the judge of the district court, to rent rooms for the accommodation of the district and circuit courts and furnish them.

The claim put in was a very large one. The Committee on Claims thought the amount claimed for the articles furnished was entirely too extravagant, and therefore would not allow the amount, and they have left it to the Secretary of the Interior to allow whatever he thinks is reasonable and proper. The Government, of course, ought to pay some price.

Mr. KING. I waive the call.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would rather that that bill should lie over, and that there should be some limitation to it. The idea of paying $18,000 for furnishing a court room is rather extravagant.

The bill was passed over.

STURGES, BENNETT AND CO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 121) from the Court of Claims for the relief of Sturges, Bennett & Co., merchants, of the city of New York.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is an adverse report in that case.

The bill was passed over.

LAND IN WISCONSIN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 196) authorizing the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States to enter a certain tract of land in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. POLK. I object to that bill. It is similar to a case which was discussed here a few days ago.

The bill was passed over.

JOSEPH HARDY AND ALTON LONG.

The consideration of the bill (S. No. 198) for the relief of Joseph Hardy and Alton Long was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain, as in the case of John P. B. and Henry Gratiot, what amount, if any, of rent was exacted by the United States agents of lead mines from Joseph Hardy, for lead mined and smelted upon the lands of the Ottawa, Pottawatomie, Chippewa, Winnebago, or other tribes of Indians, prior to their purchase by the United States, and pay such amount as may be legally proved to have been actually paid by Joseph Hardy to such agents of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HALF PAY TO WIDOWS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the special order comes up as a matter of course.

Mr. FOSTER. I appeal to the Senate, before the special order is taken up, to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 297) to extend an act entitled "An act to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans," approved February 3, 1853. It comprises probably more special cases than any other bill before the Senate—private claims. It embraces a large number of very meritorious and needy persons, and unless it be passed now, there is no probability of its getting through the other House during the session. The bill has received the approbation of the Committee on Pensions, with one exception. One member of the committee reserved his opinion. It has also been submitted to the Department, and has received the approbation of the Pension Office.

Mr. STUART. I would inquire of the Senator from Connecticut if I understand the bill correctly. Is it a bill in regard to the construction of an act as to Navy pensions?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not. It has nothing to do with anything of that sort.

Mr. JONES. It is only to continue the pensions of widows.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope this bill may be taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. PUGH. It will save us a great deal of trouble to pass that bill.

Mr. FOSTER. And I do not think it will lead to debate.

The bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that all those surviving widows and minor children who have been or may be granted and allowed five years' half pay under the provisions of any law or laws of the United States, shall be granted a continuance of such half pay under the following terms and limitations: to such widows during life, and to such child or children, where there is no widow, whilst under the age of sixteen years, to commence from the expiration of the half pay provided for by the first section of the act entitled "An act to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans," approved February 3, 1853; but it is provided, that in case of the marriage or death of any such widow, the half pay shall go to the child or children of the deceased officer or soldier whilst under the age of sixteen years; and, in like manner, the child or children of such deceased officer or soldier, when there is no widow, shall be paid no longer than while there are children or a child under that age. The half pay of such widows and orphans is to be half the monthly pay of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the infantry of the regular Army of the United States, and no more; and no greater sum is to be allowed to any such widow or minor children than the half pay of a lieutenant colonel. This act is not to be construed to apply to or embrace the case of any person or persons now receiving a pension for life; and wherever half pay shall have been granted by any special act of Congress, and is renewed or continued under the provisions of this act, it is to commence from the date of this act.

Mr. PUGH. I would suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that the pensions to widows ought to be restrained for life or widowhood. I do not think after the woman has married again she should have a pension. It is continued for life in this bill. In the first section, the eighth line, after the word "life," I move to insert the words "or widowhood."

Mr. MASON. It seems to me, from the reading of the bill, that it is intended to affect the whole pension system of that class.

Mr. FOSTER. It is so.

Mr. MASON. I would ask if it has been reported on the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. And it has been recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. PUGH. It is simply a general bill in lieu of a continued stream of private bills. I think we had better pass it, and we shall save more money by saving time on the Private Calendar, than the bill calls for. My amendment is, in the eighth line, after the word "life," to insert "or widowhood."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. I do not believe in laws restraining marriage. I do not like the policy of them. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say in regard to this point, that there are now very many private acts for widows, granting pensions during life, that were passed under precisely these circumstances. This was intended to carry out a policy which it was supposed had been adopted, because there are quite a number of that class. I examined that question and found there was quite a number of that description. I would further remark that in all cases where the widow has children, in the event of her marrying again, the pension is to cease and go to the minor children under sixteen years of age; and is then to cease when those children exceed the age of sixteen, so that there would be very few cases, I presume, where the honorable Senator's amendment would really have any effect.

Mr. PUGH. Do I understand the honorable Senator from Connecticut to say this is a mere extension of the former law; and subject to the provisions of that?

Mr. FOSTER. In this particular it exceeds the other, because the other was simply a law for five years. This does give to the widows a pension for life; provided, however, that if they marry again, the pension goes to their minor children. I was saying, also, there were various individual cases where Congress had granted to widows a pension for life, notwithstanding the general law is a pension for five years. The bill was drawn in reference to those cases.

Mr. PUGH. It may be as the Senator suggests, that there are such cases, but they have passed without observation. The general rule with us has been to grant a pension for a term of years, or life, or widowhood. It is a departure from the principle of the pension laws, to grant it in any other circumstances. We are not making a mere donation. It is for the support of the widow or for the support of the minor children. Consequently the pension ceases, in the case of a child, when he or she reaches a given age, and in the case of the widow it ceases whenever she has any other method of maintenance, so that when she is married again, and is supported by her husband, then the bounty of the Government ought to cease. That is the principle of our pension laws, and adopting any other is overthrowing the whole system. I hope the Senate will see to it that while we are passing this bill, to which, in general, I have no objection, we do not introduce a new element into a system that is already overgrown. As to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin, that it discourages matrimony, I do not think any woman, if she had a good offer, would hesitate on the ground of $320 a year pension.

Mr. CLAY. I will say but a few words explanatory of the purpose of this bill as I understand it, and in support of the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from Ohio, which I think is a very proper one. I will premise by saying that, as is generally understood by the Senate, I am against the whole pension system, regarding it, as I do, as opposed to the theory and spirit of this Government and demoralizing in its character. Under existing laws, pensions are not allowed to the widows of officers of the Army unless they are killed in time of war, or die of wounds or disease contracted in war. In respect to widows of officers of the Navy, pensions are granted them if they die in the service, even in time of peace, in the line of their duty. If I am incorrect in my representation of the character of this bill, the Senator from Connecticut will inform me. As I understand it, this bill is to place the widows of officers of the Army on the same footing with the widows of officers of the Navy. Am I right in that?

Mr. FOSTER. There is in the bill no reference to the officers or to the law regulating pensions for the Navy. It recognizes the existing laws and extends the pensions to the widows of officers and soldiers, where they are now by law granted for five years. It renews them and grants them during widowhood, and possibly during life. It has no reference at all to the laws granting pensions for the Navy.

Mr. CLAY. It does not extend, then, beyond those who have drawn their pensions for five years?

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all. It introduces no new principle as regards embracing cases not embraced by existing laws.

Mr. CLAY. Then it does not make any new cases, but only extends all existing cases?

Mr. FOSTER. It renews those now existing. Mr. CLAY. Well, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio is a very proper one, for the reasons which he has suggested. All our pension system originally was based upon the idea first of public service rendered by the invalid pensioner himself, or, in case of a widow or minor children, rendered by the deceased husband and father; and, further, upon the idea of either infirmity or disability to provide for themselves. The laws never contemplated providing for those who could provide for themselves, or who ought to be able to provide for themselves. I think that, so far from discouraging marriage, or being any restraint on marriage, (as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin,) it is rather a restraint upon injudicious marriage. No woman ought to marry a man unless she has some assurance that he can provide for her; and no man ought to marry a woman for the sake of the bounty which the Government gives her; and I think that whenever she does marry, it ought to cease, both for her sake as well as for the Government. I do not believe there is an instance on the statute-book, so far as I know, unless it be on some of these special cases—I know it is not in respect to any general law—where a pension continues after a woman marries. The framers of the law, therefore, seem to have presumed that when she marries a man she provides for herself. I trust that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. PUGH. As this bill, in this respect, is introducing a new system in the pension laws, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. The only reason which originally constituted the difference between the Army and Navy has long since ceased to exist; and I think there is now a stronger argument for allowing pensions to widows of officers and soldiers of the Army than to those of the Navy itself. I should be glad, therefore, if the bill went further than it does, and put the families of officers of the Army on the same footing with those of officers of the Navy. The amendment, however, which is pending, is to insert the words "or widowhood," the effect of which would be, in the event of the marriage of a widow of an officer, that his minor children would lose the support which had been previously granted to them by the Government. This, I understand, my friend from Alabama considers as proper, because, when a widow gets married, she has provided a support. For herself, perhaps she has; but it does not follow that the children will be benefited. In nine cases out of ten the children will be worse. So far, therefore, as it is intended to withdraw the support from the minor children because the widow has got married, I object to it.

Mr. PUGH. The proviso covers that. The proviso at the bottom of the page, if the Senator will look at it, provides that in case of marriage, the pension may go to the minor children.

Mr. DAVIS. Does not the effect of the amendment extend to them?

Mr. PUGH. No, sir. If my amendment be added to the bill, if a case of marriage occurs, then the pension will go to the children under sixteen years of age. The difficulty with the bill as it now stands is, that if there are no children under sixteen years, it will then continue to the woman, notwithstanding her second marriage. That is what I propose to cut off.

Mr. DAVIS. I agree to that.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am opposed to this restriction altogether. We have had a great many conventions of late to settle and determine the rights of women; but there is one right which has long been universally conceded, and that is the right of marrying. Laws in restraint of marriage are always considered odious; and from the time that I read of the great Shakespeare, who left to his wife her choice of his bed and some other little article during her widowhood, I have felt an invincible repugnance to all the attempts made by testators to tie up their widows from marrying, by saying they shall have so much during their widowhood, and when they please to marry again, and to form a part of the great social body, they shall cease to have it. Now sir, there is not much policy in this; all the policy is a little saving of a little money. If you wish to benefit the widow, give her the pension and let her marry with it. You say it shall go to her children when she marries. Through whose hands shall it reach those minor children? Is some guardian to be appointed? Who is so good a guardian, who so reliable and faithful a guardian, as the mother, even if the children are the objects of your bounty? You say it will not be under her control; the husband will control it. That is according to her pleasure; and do you expect by law to substitute a better security for minor children than is to be found in the affections of a mother? Do you expect by law a better security than that which is founded in a mother's heart? You will be mistaken if you do. They may be unfortunate in these marriages. The husband may be a reckless, careless, poor character; but the mother can at all times stop him from intermeddling with this pension; it is her separate property; and there is no court of chancery which would not restrain him from receiving it upon any representation of his unworthiness or his abuse of such a trust. What greater security can you have? It will redound in her hands to the greater advantage of the children than any disposition you can make. You reward her for the loss of one husband, by telling her she shall never have another. This, I think, upon a moment's consideration, will be seen to be contrary to sound policy and the dictates of justice, as well as the dictates of the heart of every Senator here. I hope this amendment will not prevail, but that the widow will be permitted to enjoy, married or unmarried, the little pension which you have bestowed upon her for the life of the husband she has lost.

The question being taken upon the amendment by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Henderson, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bigler, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Jones, Kennedy, King, Mallory, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JENNETT H. McCALL.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the Senate to take up a little bill for the relief of Jennett H. McCall, to which the Senator from Alabama objected, but his objection is withdrawn, and I presume we may now pass it without difficulty.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 130) was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Jennett H. McCall, only child of Captain James McCall, of General Pickens's brigade, in the South Carolina regiment, during the war of the Revolution, the seven years' half pay of a captain, as allowed by the resolution of Congress passed August 24, 1780, amounting to $2,100.

The petitioner is an aged woman, eighty-six years old, and from her infancy has labored under a deformity in her feet. She is the only child and heir of James McCall, known in the history of the revolutionary war, in South Carolina and Georgia, as Colonel James McCall. It appears from the history of Georgia, and from other reliable sources, that he served with distinction and singular bravery in both of those States during a large portion of the war, and was in nearly all the battles which were fought there during the invasion and possession by the British army. During the greater part of the time he was only a militia officer, under the command of General Pickens, but it is believed, although no very conclusive evidence of the fact can now be obtained, that when the new organization of the Army took place in the fall of 1780, he was appointed to a command in one of the three regiments ordered to be raised in South Carolina as her part of the continental army, as it is said, in the history of the times, he commanded the new levies of that State at the battle of the Cowpens, where Morgan obtained a signal victory over Tarleton. In his accounts, copies of which have been furnished from the comptroller's office, of South Carolina, he is styled sometimes captain, and sometimes colonel. The latter title was probably a militia title, as the service was performed under General Pickens, a militia general. His rank in the new continental regiment of the State of South Carolina was probably that of a captain. The committee do not, under the evidence of the facts of the case, feel authorized to give him any higher rank. It appears, satisfactorily, that in the discharge of his military duty he was attacked with the small-pox, of which he died in the year 1781. The committee are therefore of opinion that the petitioner is entitled to the seven years' half pay of her father, she being, at the time of his death, only eleven years of age.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCES ANN McCauley.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Senate to take up the bill for the relief of Mrs. Frances Ann McCauley, to which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] objected the other day, but he has waived his objection.

Mr. GREEN. I have examined the law. I see the bill is right, and I withdraw the objection.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 223) for the relief Frances Ann McCauley was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Frances Ann McCauley, widow of Daniel S. McCauley, deceased, late consul-general of the United States at Alexandria, in Egypt, $4,200, for compensation for judicial services performed by her husband while holding that office, from August 14, 1848, to October 26, 1852, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to carry into effect certain provisions in the treaties between the United States and China and the Ottoman Porte, giving certain judicial powers to ministers and consuls of the United States in those countries," approved August 11, 1848, at the rate of $1,000 per annum.

Mr. HALE. If there is a report in that case, let it be read.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. Foor, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, from which it appears that the late Daniel S. McCauley was, on the 14th day of August, 1848, appointed consul-general of the United States at Alexandria, in Egypt, a port belonging to and within the territorial limits of the Turkish Empire; that he continued to hold that office and perform its duties up to the time of his death, on the 26th of October, 1852; and that, as consul-general of the United States at that port, certain judicial duties were devolved upon him by act of Congress. In reply to a letter of inquiry, addressed to him by the committee, the Secretary of State, under date of February 2, 1858, says that Mr. McCauley was consul during the period claimed, and that he performed judicial services in that capacity; but whether services of that kind entitled the minister or consuls of the United States in the Turkish dominions to extra compensation, has always been deemed questionable by the Department. From an examination of the several provisions of the act, the committee think that the same class of duties and responsibilities are alike devolved upon the diplomatic and consular agents of both China and Turkey; and, in their opinion, it would seem to be but reasonable to suppose that Congress intended to allow the same measure of compensation to each.

Mr. HALE. I am not going to oppose the bill because I know it is rather ungracious; but if there is anything that is a naked question of law and ought to go to the Court of Claims, this is it. It is a construction of law whether consuls in Turkey are entitled to this money or not.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 200) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1859; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The special order is the bill (S. No. 25) to grant to any person who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon the condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to call attention to the second section before we proceed further. Yesterday the words, "for the term of five years," were inserted on motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER.] They should come in line twenty after the word "land," instead of where they were put on his motion; so as to read: "continued to reside upon and cultivate said land for the term of five years."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That alteration will be made.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senate. If there is a disposition to act upon this bill soon, I am willing to have the time indicated when the vote shall be taken, before I proceed to say anything myself; and, after doing that, if others desire to speak, I am willing that they shall consume my portion of time in speaking. I am anxious that other business should not be delayed, and that there shall be action on this bill. If it is the pleasure of the Senate to indicate any particular time to take the vote on it, we can shape our course accordingly. ["Go on!"]

Mr. KING. Go on, and take the vote as soon as we can: that is the better way.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The immediate proposition before the Senate is an amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] which provides that there shall be a land warrant issued to each head of a family, by the Secretary of the Interior, and distributed among those who do not emigrate to the public domain and take possession of and cultivate the land for the term of years specified in the bill. I have something to say in reference to that amendment, but I will not say it in this connection. I will take it up in its order. I propose, in the first place, to explain briefly the provisions of the bill.

The first section provides for granting one hundred and sixty acres of land to every head of a family who will emigrate to any of the public domain and settle upon it, and cultivate it for a term of five years. Upon those facts being made known to the register of the land office, he is to be entitled to obtain a patent. The second section provides that he shall make an affidavit, and show to the satisfaction of the officer that his entry is made in good faith, and that his intention is to cultivate the soil and become an actual settler. The sixth section of the bill provides that any person who is now an inhabitant of the United States, but not a citizen, if he makes application, and in the course of five years becomes a citizen of the United States, shall be placed on a footing of equality with the native-born citizens of the country in this respect. The third section provides that those entries shall be confined to land that has been in market, and subjected to private entry; and that the person entering the land shall be confined to each alternate section.

These are substantially the leading provisions of this bill. It does not proceed upon the idea, as some suppose, of making a donation or gift of the public land to the settler. It proceeds upon the principle of consideration, and, as I conceive, and I think many others do, the individual who emigrates to the West, and reclaims and reduces to cultivation one hundred and sixty acres of the public domain, subjecting himself to all the privations and hardships of such a life, pays the highest consideration for his land.

But, before I say more on this portion of the subject, I desire to premise a little by giving the history of this homestead proposition. Some persons from my own region of the country, or, in other words, from the South, have thrown out the intimation that this is a proposition which partakes, to some extent, of the nature of the Emigrant Aid Society, and is to operate injuriously to the southern States. For the purpose of making the starting point right, I want to go back and show when this proposition was first introduced into the Congress of the United States. I am not so sure but that the Presiding Officer [Mr. Foor in the chair] remembers well the history of this measure.

In 1846, on the 27th day of March, long before we had any emigrant aid societies, long before we had any compromises in 1850 in reference to the slavery question, long before we had any agitation on the subject of slavery in 1854, long before we had any agitation upon it in 1858, this proposition made its advent into the House of Representatives. It met with considerable opposition. It scarcely received serious consideration for a length of time; but the measure was pressed until the public mind took hold of it; and it was still pressed until the 12th day of May, 1852, when it passed that body by a two-third vote. Thus we see that its origin and its consummation, so far as the House of Representatives was concerned, had nothing to do with North or South, but it was proceeding upon that great principle which interests every man in this country, and which, in the end, secures and provides for him a home. By putting these dates together it will be perceived that it was just six years five months and fifteen days from the introduction of this bill until its passage by the House of Representatives.

I shall not detain the Senate by any lengthy remarks on the general principles of the bill; for I do not intend to be prolix, or to consume much of the Senate's time. What is the origin of the great idea of a homestead of land? We find, on turning to the first law-writer—and I think one of the best, for we are informed that he wrote by inspiration—that he advances the first idea on this subject. Moses made use of the following language:

"The land shall not be sold forever; for the land is mine —for ye are strangers and sojourners with me."—Leviticus, chapter xxv., verse 23.

We begin, then, with Moses. The next writer to whom I will call the attention of the Senate is Vattel—one of the ablest, if not the ablest, writer upon the laws of nations. He lays down this great principle, (book 1, chapter 7:)

"Of all the arts, tillage or agriculture is the most useful and necessary. It is the nursing father of the State. The cultivation of the earth causes it to produce an infinite increase; it forms the surest resource, and the most solid fund of rich commerce for the people who enjoy a happy climate."

"This affair, then, deserves the utmost attention from Government. The sovereign ought to neglect no means of rendering the land under his obedience as well cultivated as possible. He ought not to allow either communities or private persons to acquire large tracts of land to leave uncultivated. These rights of common, which deprive the proprietor of the free liberty of disposing of his lands—that will not allow him to farm them, and cause them to be cultivated in the most advantageous manner—these rights, I say, are contrary to the welfare of the State, and ought to be suppressed or reduced to a just bound. The property introduced among the citizens does not prevent the nation's having a right to take the most effectual measures to cause the whole country to produce the greatest and most advantageous revenue possible."

"The Government ought carefully to avoid everything capable of discouraging husbandmen, or of diverting them from the labors of agriculture. Those taxes, those excessive and ill proportioned impositions, the burden of which falls almost entirely upon the cultivators, and the vexations they suffer from the commissioners who levy them, taken from the unhappy peasant the means of cultivating the earth, and depopulate the country. Spain is the most fertile, and the worst cultivated country in Europe. The Church possesses too much land, and the undertakers of royal magazines, who are authorized to purchase at low prices all the corn they find in possession of a peasant, above what is necessary for the subsistence of his wife and family, so greatly discourage the husbandman, that he sows no more corn than is necessary for the support of his own household. Whence arises the greatest scarcity in a country capable of feeding its neighbors."

"Another abuse injurious to agriculture is, the contempt cast upon husbandmen. The inhabitants of cities, even the most servile artists, and the most lazy citizen, consider him who cultivates the soil with a disdainful eye; they humble and discourage him; they dare to despise a profession that feeds the human race—the natural employment of man. A stay-maker places far beneath him the beloved employment of the first consuls and dictators of Rome."

"China has wisely prevented this abuse. Agriculture is there held in honor; and to preserve this happy manner of thinking, every year, on a solemn day, the Emperor himself, followed by the whole court, sets his hands to the plow and sows a small piece of land. Hence China is the best cultivated country in the world. It nourishes an innumerable multitude of people that at first appears to the traveler too great for the space they possess."

"The cultivation of the soil is not only to be recommended by the Government on account of the extraordinary advantages that flow from it, but from its being an obligation imposed by nature on mankind. The whole earth is appointed for the nourishment of its inhabitants, but it would be incapable of doing it was it uncultivated. Every nation is then obliged by a law of nature to cultivate the ground that has fallen to its share, and it has no right to expect or require assistance from others, any further than it with necessaries. Those people, like the ancient Germans, disdain to cultivate the earth, and rather choose to live by rapine; are wanting to themselves, and deserve to be exterminated as savage and rapacious beasts. There are other who avoid agriculture, that would only live by hunting and flocks. This might doubtless be allowed in the first stages of the world, when the earth produced more than was sufficient to feed its few inhabitants; but at present, when the human race is so greatly multiplied, it would not subsist if all nations resolved to live in this manner. Those who still retain this idle life, usurp more extensive territories than they would have occasion for were they to use honest labor, and have, therefore, no reason to complain if other nations, more laborious and too closely confined, come to possess a part. Thus, though the conquest of the civilized empires of Peru and Mexico was a notorious usurpation, the establishment of many colonies in North America may, on their confining themselves within just bounds, be extremely lawful. The people of those vast countries rather overran than inhabited them."

I propose next to cite the authority of General Jackson, who was believed to be not only a friend to the South, but a friend to the Union. He inculcated this great doctrine in his message of 1832:

"It cannot be doubted that the speedy settlement of those lands constitute the true interests of the Republic. The wealth and strength of a country are its population, and the best part of the population are cultivators of the soil. Independent farmers are everywhere the basis of society, and the true friends of liberty."

"It seems to me to be our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue; and that they be sold to settlers in limited parcels, at prices barely sufficient to reimburse the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising from our Indian contracts."

"It is desirable, however, that the right of the soil, and the future disposition of it, be surrendered to the States, respectively in which it lies."

"The adventurous and hardy population of the West, besides contributing their equal share of taxation under the impost system, have, in the process of our Government, for the lands they occupy, paid into the Treasury a large proportion of forty million dollars, and of the revenue received therefrom, but a small portion has been expended among them. When, to the disadvantage of their situation in this respect, we add the consideration that it is their labor alone that gives real value to the lands, and that the proceeds arising from these sales are chiefly distributed among States that had not originally any claim to them, and which have enjoyed the undivided emoluments arising from the sales of their own lands, it cannot be expected that the new States will remain longer contented with the present policy, after the payment of the public debt. To avert the consequences which may be apprehended from this cause, to stop forever all partial and interested legislation on this subject, and to afford every American citizen of enterprise the opportunity of securing an independent freehold, it seems to me, therefore, best to abandon the idea of raising a future revenue out of the public lands."

Then we have standing before us, in advocacy of this great principle, the first writer of laws, Moses; next we have Vattel; and in the third place we have General Jackson. Now, let us see whether there has been any homestead policy in the United States. By turning to our statutes, we find that the first homestead bill ever introduced into the Congress of the United States, was in 1791. I know that it is said by some, and it is sometimes cantingly and slurringly reiterated in the newspapers, that this is a demagogical movement, and that some person has introduced and advocates this policy purely for the purpose of pleasing the people. I want to see who some of these demagogues are; and before I read the section of this statute, I will refer, in connection with Jackson and these other distinguished individuals, to the fact that Mr. Jefferson, the philosopher and statesman, recognized and appreciated this great doctrine. In 1791, the first bill passed by the Congress of the United States recognizing the homestead principle, is in the following words:

"That four hundred acres of land be given"— that is the language of the statute. We do not assume in this bill to give land. We assume that a consideration passes; but here was a law that was based on the idea that four hundred acres of land were to be given —"to each of those persons who, in the year 1783, were heads of families at Vincennes, or the Illinois country, or the Mississippi, and who, since that time, have removed from one of the said places to the other; but the Governor of the Territory northwest of the Ohio is hereby directed to cause the same to be laid out for them at their own expense," &c.

Another section of the same act provides:

"That the heads of families at Vincennes, or in the Illinois country, in the year 1783, who afterwards removed without the limits of said Territory, are nevertheless entitled to the donation of four hundred acres of land made by the resolve of Congress," &c.

That act recognized the principle embraced in the homestead bill. If this is the idea of a demagogue, if it is the idea of one catering or pandering to the public sentiment to catch votes, it was introduced into Congress in 1791, and received the approval of Washington, the father of his country. I presume that if he lived at this day, and were to approve the measure, as he did in 1791, he would be branded, and put in the category of those persons who are denominated demagogues. Under his administration there was another bill passed of a similar import, recognizing and carrying out the great homestead principle. So we find that this policy, so far as legislation is concerned, commenced with Washington, and received his approval as early as 1791. From General Washington's administration there are forty-four precedents running through every administration of this Government, down to the present time, in which this principle has been recognized and indorsed.

We discover from this historical review that this is no new idea; that it is no recent invention; that it is no new movement for the purpose of making votes; but it is a principle well nigh as old as the Government itself, which was indorsed and approved by Washington himself.

This would seem, Mr. President, to settle the question of power. I know it has been argued by some that Congress had not the power to make donations of land; but even the statute, to which I have referred, makes use of the word "give" without consideration. It was considered constitutional by the early fathers to give away land. We proceed in this bill upon the principle that there is a consideration. If I were disposed to look for precedents, even for the donations of the public lands, I could instance the bounty land act. I could take you through other acts donating land, showing that the principle has been recognized again and again, and that there is not now a question as to its constitutionality.

I believe there is a clear difference in the power of the Federal Government in reference to its appropriations of money and its appropriations of the public land. The Congress of the United States has power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare. I believe it has the power to lay and collect duties for these legitimate purposes; but when taxes have been laid, collected, and paid into the Treasury, I do not think it has that general scope or that latitude in the appropriations of money that it has over the public lands. Once converted into revenue, Congress can only appropriate the revenue to the specific objects of the Constitution. It may derive revenue from the public lands, and being revenue, it can only be appropriated to the purposes for which revenue is raised under the Constitution.

But when we turn to another provision of the Constitution, we find that Congress has power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Congress has, in the organization of all the Territories and in the admission of new States, recognized the principle most clearly of appropriating the public lands for the benefit of schools, colleges, and academies. It has granted the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in every township for school purposes; it has granted lands for their public buildings and various other improvements. I am very clear on this point, that in the disposition of the public lands they should be applied to national purposes. If we grant the public lands to actual settlers so as to induce them to settle upon and cultivate the public lands, can there be anything more national in its character? What is the great object of acquiring territory? Is it not for settlement and cultivation? We may acquire territory by the exercise of the treaty-making power. We may be engaged in a war, and as terms or conditions of peace, we may make large acquisitions of territory to the United States. But what is the great idea and principle on which you acquire territory? Is it not to settle and cultivate it?

I am aware that the argument is used, if you can dispose of the public lands for this purpose or that purpose, cannot you sell the public lands and apply the proceeds to the same purpose? I think there is a clear distinction between the two cases. It is equally clear to me that if the Federal Government can set apart the public lands for school purposes in the new States, it can appropriate lands to enable the parent to sustain his child whilst enjoying the benefits conferred upon him by the Government in the shape of education. The argument is as sound in the one case as it is in the other. If we can grant lands in the one case we can in the other. If without making a contract in advance, you can grant your public lands as gratuities, as donations to men who go out and fight the battles of their country, after the services have been rendered, is it not strange, passing strange, that you cannot grant land to those who till the soil and make provision to sustain your Army while it is fighting the battles of the country? It seems to me that the argument is clear. I do not intend to argue the constitutional question, for I think there can be really no doubt on that point. I do not believe any one at this day will seriously make any point on that ground against this bill. Is its purpose a national one? The great object is to induce persons to cultivate the land and thereby make the soil productive. By doing this, you induce hundreds of persons throughout the United States, who are now producing but little, to come in contact with the soil and add to the productive capacity of the country, and thereby promote the national wealth.

I come now to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina. I have not looked over the Globe this morning to read his remarks of yesterday; but if I understood him correctly, he advocated the proposition of issuing a warrant for a hundred and sixty acres of land to each head of a family in the United States. I am inclined to think the Senator is not serious in this proposition. It has been offered on some occasions heretofore, and rejected by very decided votes. Let us compare it with the proposition of the bill. The idea of the honorable Senator seems to be that this bill was designed to force or compel, to some extent, the citizens of other States to go to the new States. Why, sir, there is no compulsory process in the bill. It leaves each man at his own discretion, at his own free will, either to go or to stay, just as it suits his inclinations.

The Senator seems to think too—and the same idea was advanced by his predecessor—that at this time such a measure would have a tendency to diminish the revenue. He intimates that the nation is now bankrupt, that we are borrowing money, that the receipts from customs have been greatly diminished, and that therefore it would be dangerous to pass this bill, because it would have a tendency to diminish the revenue. Let us compare the Senator's proposition, and that of the bill in this respect. His amendment is to issue warrants to each head of a family. The population of the United States is now estimated at about twenty-eight millions. Let us assume, for the sake of illustration, that there are three million heads of families in the United States. His proposition, then, is to issue and throw upon the market three million of warrants, each warrant entitling the holder to one hundred and sixty acres of land. If that were done, and those warrants were thrown upon the market, what would they sell for? Little or nothing. If such land warrants were thrown broadcast over the country, who would enter another acre of land at $1 25? Would not the warrants pass into the hands of land speculators and monopolists at a merely nominal price? Would they bring more than a quarter of a dollar an acre? If you were to throw three million of land warrants into the market at one time, would they bring anything? Then the effect of that proposition would be to do but little good to those to whom the warrants were issued, and by throwing them into the market, it would cut off the revenue from public lands entirely, for no one would enter land for cash as long as warrants could be bought. That proposition, then, is to aid and feed speculation. I do not say that is the motive or intention, but it is the tendency and effect of the Senator's proposition, to throw a large portion of the public lands into the hands of speculators, and to cut them off from the Treasury as a source of revenue.

But what does this bill propose? Will it diminish the receipts into the Treasury from the public lands? The bill provides that the entries under it shall be confined to the alternate sections, and that the person who obtains the benefit of the bill must be an actual settler and cultivator. In proportion as you settle and cultivate any portion of the public lands, do you not enhance the value of the remaining sections, and bring them into the market much sooner, and obtain a better price for them than you would without this bill? What is the principle upon which you have proceeded in all the railroad grants you have made? They have been defended upon the ground that by granting alternate sections for railroads, you thereby brought the remaining lands into the market, and enabled the Government to realize its means at a much earlier period, making the remainder of the public lands more valuable than they were before. This bill proceeds upon the same idea. You have granted an immense amount of lands to railroads on this principle, and now why not do something for the people?

I say that instead of wasting the public lands, instead of reducing the receipts into the Treasury, this bill would increase them. In the first place, it will enhance the value of the reserved quarter sections. This may be illustrated by an example. In 1848 we had nine million quarter sections; in 1858 we have about seven millions. Let us suppose that our population is twenty-eight millions, and that under the operation of this bill one million heads of families who are now producing but very little, and who have no land to cultivate, and very scanty means of subsistence, shall each have a quarter section of land, what will the effect be? At present these persons pay little or nothing for the support of the Federal Government, under the operation of our tariff system, for the reason that they have not got much to buy with. How much does the land yield to the Government while it is lying in a state of nature, uncultivated? Nothing at all. At the rate we have been selling the public lands, about three million dollars' worth a year, estimating them at $1 25 an acre, it will take a fraction less than seven hundred years to dispose of the public domain.

I want to take a case that will demonstrate as clearly as the simplest sum in arithmetic that this is a revenue measure. Let us take a million families who can now hardly procure the necessities of life, and place them each on a quarter section of land—how long will it be before their condition will be improved so as to make them able to contribute something to the support of the Government? Now, here is soil producing nothing, here are hands producing but little. Transfer the man from the point where he is producing nothing, bring him in contact with a hundred and sixty acres of productive soil, and how long will it be before that man changes his condition? As soon as he gets upon the land, he commences to make his improvements, he clears out his field, and the work of production is commenced. In a short time he has a crop, he has stock and other things that result from bringing his physical labor in contact with the soil. He has the products of his labor and his soil, and he is enabled to exchange them for articles of consumption. He is enabled to buy more than he was before, and thus he contributes more to the support of his Government, while, at the same time, he becomes a better man, and a more reliable man for all governmental purposes, because he is interested in the country in which he lives.

To illustrate the matter further, let us take a family of seven persons in number who now have no home, no abiding place that they can call their own, and transfer them to a tract of one hundred and sixty acres of land which they are to possess and cultivate. Is there a Senator here who does not believe, that, by changing their position from the one place to the other, they would produce at least a dollar more than they did before? I will begin at a point scarcely visible—a single dollar. Is there a man here or anywhere else who does not know the fact to be, that you increase a man's ability to buy when he produces more by bringing his labor in contact with the soil. The result of that contact is production; he produces something that he can convert and exchange for the necessities of his family. Suppose the increase was only a dollar a head for a million of families, each family consisting of seven persons. By transferring a million of families from their present dependent condition to the enjoyment and cultivation of the public domain, supposing it would only increase their ability to buy foreign imports to the extent of a dollar each, you would create a demand for seven millions' worth of imports. Our rates of duties, under the tariff act of 1846, are about thirty per cent., and thus, at the almost invisible beginning of a single dollar a head, you, in this way, increase the pecuniary and financial means of the Government to the extent of $2,100,000.

This would be the result, supposing that there would only be an addition of one dollar per head to the ability of each family by being taken from a condition of poverty and placed upon one hundred and sixty acres of land. This is the result, supposing them to have seven dollars more, with which to buy articles of consumption, than they had when they had no home, no soil to cultivate, no stimulant, no inducement to labor. If you suppose the effect would be to increase their ability two dollars per head, you would increase their consumption to the amount of $14,000,000, which, at thirty per cent. duty, would yield $4,200,000. If you supposed it increased the ability of a family four dollars per head, the total amount would be $28,000,000, which would yield a revenue of $8,400,000. I think that this would be far below the truth, and if you gave a family one hundred and sixty acres of land to cultivate, the effect would be to increase the ability of that family so as to buy fifty-six dollars' worth more than they bought before—seven dollars a head. That would be a small increase to a family who had a home, compared with the condition of that family when it had none. The effect of that would be to run up the amount they buy to $56,000,000, which, at a duty of thirty per cent., would yield the sum of $16,800,000.

I show you, then, that, by taking one million families, consisting of seven persons each, and putting them each upon a quarter section of land, making the soil productive, if you thereby only added to their capacity to buy goods to the amount of fifty-six dollars per family, you would derive a revenue of nearly seventeen million dollars. When you have done this, how much of the public lands would you have disposed of? Only one million quarter sections, and you would have nearly six million quarter sections left. By disposing of one sixth of your public domain in this way, upon this little miniature estimate, you bring into the coffers of the Federal Government by this bill $16,800,000.

Does this look like diminishing the revenue? Does it not rather show that this bill is a revenue measure? I think it is most clearly a revenue measure. Not only is this the case in a money point of view, so far as the imports are concerned, but, by settling the alternate sections with actual cultivators, you make the remaining sections more valuable to the Government, and you bring them sooner into market. In continuation of this idea, I will read a portion of the argument which I made upon this subject when I first introduced the bill into the other House. I read from the report of my speech on that occasion:

"Mr. J. said, it will be remembered by the House that he had already shown, that by giving an individual a quarter section of the land, the Government would receive back, in the shape of a revenue, in every seven years, more than the Government price of the land; and, upon this principle, the Government would, in fact, be realizing two hundred and ten dollars every subsequent term of seven years. The whole number of acres of public land belonging to the United States at this time, or up to the 30th of September, 1848, is one billion four hundred and forty-two million two hundred and sixteen thousand one hundred and sixty-eight acres. This amount, estimated at $1.25 per acre, will make $1,802,770,000. To dispose of $3,000,000 worth per annum, which is more than an average sum, would require seven hundred years, a fraction less, to dispose of the entire domain. It will now be perceived at once the immense advantage the Government would derive by giving the land to the cultivator, instead of keeping it on hand this length of time. We find by this process the Government would derive from each quarter section in six hundred years, (throwing off the large excess of nearly one hundred years,) $17,000—seven going into six hundred eighty-five times. This, then, shows on the one hand what the Government would gain by giving the land away.

"Now let us see what it will lose by retaining the land on hand this length of time. Time operates upon value as distance does upon magnitude. A ball of very large size, when close to the eye, is seen in its full extent; but when removed to a certain distance, dwindles to the human vision, or disappears altogether. So with the largest planets, removed from the eye to the position they now occupy in the heavens, they diminish to a mere point. To the business, practical world, a hundred dollars at the present time is just worth a hundred dollars. A hundred dollars twelve months hence, is worth just six per cent. less, and so on every twelve months, until sixteen years and eight months, when it has lost an amount equal to the principal; so it will be perceived that, in every sixteen years and eight months, the Government loses an amount equal to the price asked for each quarter section, which is $330, by keeping it on hand. Sixteen years go into six hundred thirty-seven times, which would make $7,400 the Government will lose. Now, I conceive that it would be fair and rational to the business world to set the loss down on the one hand and the gain on the other, and then add them together, which would show the difference to be $24,400 in the present system and the one proposed. This will hold good in principle, and will apply to each quarter section, as well as to the aggregate.

"He repeated that by giving a quarter section of land to the honest cultivator, in six hundred years the Government would derive twenty-four thousand and four hundred dollars, ($24,400.) Upon this basis of calculation, the Government, in six hundred years, would draw from this source, by the operation of its revenue system, into the Treasury, two hundred and nineteen billions six hundred million dollars, ($219,600,000,000,) which would be an amount sufficient, estimating the expenses of the Government at fifty millions of dollars annually, to carry it on for four thousand three hundred and ninety-two years. He said that this exposure ought to satisfy every one that instead of violating the pledged faith of the Government, it was enlarging and making more valuable, and enabling the Government to derive a much larger amount of revenue to meet all its liabilities, and thereby preserving its faith inviolate."

I do not think there can be any question as to the revenue part of this proposition. We show that by granting a million quarter sections you derive more revenue upon the public lands than you do by your entire land system, as it now stands. In 1850, it was estimated that each head of a family consumed $100 worth of home manufactures. If we increase the ability of the cultivator and occupier of the soil fifty-six dollars in the family, of course it is reasonable to presume that he would consume a corresponding proportion of home manufactures. Can that proposition be controverted? I think not. Then we see on the one hand that we should derive more revenue from granting the land, on the principle laid down in the bill, and also that we should open a market for articles manufactured in our own country. Then taking both views of the subject we see that it is an advantage to the manufacturing interest, and that it is also an advantage to the Government, so far as imports are concerned. I should like to know, then, where can the objection be, upon the score of revenue?

I am in hopes that the Senator from North Carolina will withdraw his amendment, for I cannot think he is serious. His proposition would have a tendency to cut off all the revenue from the public lands—to flood the market with land warrants to be sold at nominal prices, bringing scarcely anything even to those to whom the warrants would be issued.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will say to the Senator that when he is through I shall offer a short explanation of the reasons why I offered the amendment. I do not desire to interrupt him now.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. But, Mr. President, the question of dollars and cents is of no consideration to me. The money view of this subject does not influence my mind by the weight of a feather. I think it is clear, though; and this view has been presented to prove to Senators that this bill will not diminish, but, on the contrary, will increase the revenue.

But this is not the important view of the subject. When you look at our country as it is, you see that it is important that the great mass of the people should be interested in the country. By this bill you provide a man with a home, you increase the revenue, you increase the consumption of home manufactures, and you make him a better man. You give him an interest in the country. His condition is better. There is no man so reliable as he who is interested in the welfare of his country; and who are more interested in the welfare of their country than those who have homes? When a man has a home, he has a deeper, a more abiding interest in the country, and he is more reliable in all things that pertain to the Government. He is more reliable when he goes to the ballot-box; he is more reliable in sustaining the stability of our free institutions.

It seems to me that this, without the other consideration, would be a sufficient inducement. When we see the population that is accumulating about some of our cities, I think it behooves every man who is a statesman, a patriot, and a philanthropist, to turn his attention to this subject. I have lately seen some statistics with reference to the city of New York, in which it is assumed that one sixth of the population are paupers; that two sixths of the population are barely able to sustain themselves; leaving one pauper to be sustained by every two persons in the city of New York. Does not that present a frightful state of things? Suppose the population of that city to be one million; you would have in the single city of New York, one hundred and sixty-six thousand paupers.

I do not look upon the growth of cities and the accumulation of population about cities, as being the most desirable object in this country. Here I will remark that I do not believe a large portion of this population, if you were to grant them homesteads, would ever go to them. I have no idea that they would; for a man who has spent most of his life about a city, and has sunk into a pauperized condition, is not the man to go West, reclaim one hundred and sixty acres of land, and reduce it to cultivation. He will not go there on that condition. Though we are satisfied of this, may not our policy be such as to prevent, as far as practicable, the accumulation of such an unproductive population about your cities? Let us try to prevent their future accumulation; let these live, have their day, and pass away—they will ultimately pass away—but let our policy be such as to induce men to become mechanics and agriculturists. Interest them in the country; pin them to the soil, and they become more reliable and sustain themselves, and you do away with the pauperism in the country. The population of the United States being twenty-eight millions, if the proportion of paupers in the city of New York existed in the country, you would have four million six hundred and sixty-six thousand paupers in the United States. Do we want our population to become of that character? Do we want cities to take control of this Government? Unless the proper steps be taken, unless the proper direction be given to the future affairs of this Government, the cities are to take charge of it and control it. The rural population, the mechanical and agricultural portions of this community, are the very salt of it. They constitute the "mudsills," to use a term recently introduced here. They constitute the foundation upon which the Government rests; and hence we see the state of things before us. Should we not give the settlement of our public lands and the population of our country that direction which will beget and create the best portion of the population? Is it not fearful to think of four million six hundred and sixty-six thousand paupers in the United States, at the rate they have them in the city of New York? Mr. Jefferson never said a truer thing than when he declared that large cities were eye-sores in the body-politic: in Democracies they are consuming cancers.

I know the idea of some is to build up great populous cities, and that thereby the interests of the country are to be promoted. Sir, a city not only sinks into pauperism, but into vice and immorality of every description that can be enumerated; and I would not vote for any policy that I believed would build up cities upon this principle. Build up your villages, build up your rural districts, and you will have men who rely upon their own industry, who rely upon their own efforts, who rely upon their own ingenuity, who rely upon their own economy and application to business for a support; and these are the people whom you have to depend upon. Why, Mr. President, how was it in ancient Rome? I know there has been a great deal said in denunciation of agrarianism and the Gracchi. It has been said that a doctrine something like this led to the decline of the Roman Empire; but the Gracchi never had their day until a cancerous influence had destroyed the very vitals of Rome; and it was the destruction of Rome that brought forth Tiberius Gracchus. It was to prevent land monopoly, not agrarianism, in the common acceptance of the term—which is dividing out lands that had been acquired by individuals. They sought to take back and put in the possession of the great mass of the people that portion of the public domain which had been assumed by the capitalists, who had no title to it in fact. The Gracchi tried to carry out this policy; to restore that which had been taken from the people. The population had sunk into the condition of large proprietors on the one hand, and dependents on the other; and when this dependent condition was brought about, as we find from Niebuhr's History, the middle class of the community was all gone; it had left the country; there was nothing but an aristocracy on the one hand, and dependents upon that aristocracy on the other; and when this got to be the case, the Roman Empire went down.

Having this illustrious example before us, we should be warned by it. Our true policy is to build up the middle class; to sustain the villages; to populate the rural districts, and let the power of this Government remain with the middle class; I want no miserable city rabble on the one hand. I want no pampered, bloated, corrupted aristocracy on the other; I want the middle portion of society built up and sustained, and let them have the control of the Government. I am as much opposed to agrarianism as any Senator on this floor, or any individual in the United States, and this bill does not partake in the slightest degree of agrarianism; but, on the contrary, it commences with a man at the precise point where agrarianism ends, and it carries him up in an ascending line, while that carries him down. It gives him an interest in his country, and interest in public affairs; and when you are involved in war, in insurrection, or rebellion, or danger of any kind, they are the men who are to sustain you. If you should have occasion to call volunteers into the service of the country, you will have a population of men having homes, having wives and children to care for, who will defend their hearthstones when invaded. What a sacred thing it is to a man to feel that he has a hearthstone to defend; a home, and a wife and children to care for, and to rest satisfied that they have an abiding place. Such a man is interested individually in repelling invasion; he is interested individually in having good Government.

I know there are many, and even some in the Democratic ranks, whose nerves are a little timid in regard to trusting the people with too much power. Sir, the people are the safest, the best, and the most reliable lodgment of power, if you have a population of this kind. Keep up the middle class, lop off an aristocracy on the one hand, and a rabble on the other; let the middle class maintain the ascendancy, let them have the power, and your Government is always secure. Then you need not fear the people. I know, as I have just remarked, that some are timid in regard to trusting the people; but there can be no danger from a people who are interested in their Government, who have homes to defend, and wives and children to care for. Even if we test this proposition by that idea of self-interest which is said to govern and control man, I ask you if a man, who has an interest in his country, is not more reliable than one who has none? Is not a man who is adding to the wealth of his country more reliable than one who is simply a consumer, and has no interest in it? If we suppose a man to be governed only by the principle of self-interest, is he not more reliable when he has a stake in the country, and is it not his interest to promote and advance his own condition? Is it not to the interest of the great mass to have everything done rightly in reference to Government. The great mass of the people hold no office; they expect nothing from the Government. The only way they feel, and know, and understand the operations of the Government is in the exactions it makes from them. When they are receiving from the Government protection in common, it is their interest to do right in all governmental affairs; and that being their interest they are to be relied upon, even if you suppose men to be actuated altogether by the principle of self-interest. It is the interest of the middle class to do right in all governmental affairs; and hence they are to be relied upon. Instead of requiring you to keep up your armies, your mounted men, and your footmen on the frontier, if you will let the people go and possess this public land on the conditions proposed in this bill, you will have an army on the frontier composed of men who will defend their own firesides, who will take care of their own homes, and will defend the other portions of the country, if need be, in time of war.

I would remark in this connection, that the public lands have paid for themselves. According to the report of Mr. Stuart, of Virginia, the Secretary of the Interior in 1850, it was shown that then the public lands had paid for themselves, and sixty millions over. We have received into the Treasury since that time about thirty-two million dollars from the public lands. They have, therefore, already paid the Government more than they cost, and there can be no objection to this bill on the ground that the public lands have been bought with the common treasure of the whole country. Besides, this bill provides that each individual making an entry shall pay all the expenses attending it.

We see then, Mr. President, the effect this policy is to have on population. Let me ask here, looking to our popular elections, looking to the proper lodgment of power, is it not time that we had adopted a policy which would give us men interested in the affairs of the country to control and sway our elections? It seems to me that this cannot long be debated; the point is too clear. The agricultural and mechanical portion of the community are to be relied upon for the preservation and continuance of this Government. The great mass of the people, the great middle class, are honest. They toil for their support, accepting no favor from Government. They live by labor. They do not live by consumption, but by production; and we should consume as small a portion of their production as it is possible for us to consume, leaving the producer to appropriate to his own use and benefit as much of the product of his own labor as it is possible in the nature of things to do. The great mass of the people need advocates—men who are honest and capable, who are willing to defend them. How much legislation is done for them? How much is done for classes? How little care seems to be exercised for the great mass of the people? When we are among our constituents, it is very easy to make appeals to the people and professions of patriotism, and then—I do not mean to be personal or invidious—it is very easy when we are removed from them a short distance, to forget the people and legislate for classes, neglecting the interest of the great mass. The mechanics and agriculturists are honest, industrious, and economical. Let it not be supposed that I am against learning or education, but I might speak of the man in the rural districts, in the language of Pope:

"Unlearned, he knew no schoolman's subtle art,
No language but the language of the heart;
By nature honest, by experience wise;
Healthy by temperance and exercise."

This is the kind of men whom we must rely upon. Let your public lands be settled; let them be filled up; let honest men become cultivators and tillers of the soil. I do not claim to be prophetic, but I have sometimes thought that if we would properly direct our legislation in reference to our public lands and our other public policy, the time would come when this would be the greatest Government on the face of the earth. Go to the great valley of the Mississippi; take the western slope of the mountain to the Pacific ocean; take the whole area of this country, and we find that we have over three million square miles. Throw off one fourth as unfit for cultivation, reducing the area of the United States to fifteen hundred million acres, and by appropriating three acres to a person, it will sustain a population of over five hundred million people; and I have no doubt, if this continent was strained to its utmost capacity, it could sustain the entire population of the world. Let us go on and carry out our destiny; interest men in the soil; let your vacant land be divided equally so that men can have homes; let them live by their own industry; and the time will come when this will be the greatest nation on the face of the earth. Let agriculture and mechanism maintain the ascendancy, other professions and pursuits being subordinate to them, for on these two all others rest.

Since the crucifixion of our Savior, emigration has been westward; and the poetic idea might have started long before it did—

"Westward the star of empire takes its way."

It has been taking its way westward. The United States are filling up. We are going on to the Pacific coast. Let me raise the inquiry here, when, in the history of mankind, in the progress of nations, was there any nation that ever reached the point we now occupy? When was there a nation in its progress, in its settlement, in its advance in all that constitutes and make a nation great, that occupied the position we now occupy? When was there any nation that could look to the East and behold the tide of emigration coming; and, at the same time, turn around and look to the mighty mighty West, and behold the tide of emigration approaching from that direction. The waves of emigration have usually been running in one direction, but we find the tide of emigration now changed, and we are occupying a central position on the globe. Emigration is coming to us from the East and from the West, and when our vacant territory shall be filled up, when it shall reach a population of one hundred and fifty or five hundred millions, who can say what will be our destiny?

When our railroad system shall progress on proper principles, extending from one extreme of the country to the other, like so many arteries; when your telegraphic wires shall be stretched along them as the tendons in the human arm, and they shall run in parallel lines, and be crossed at right angles, until the whole globe, as it were, and especially this great center, shall be covered like a net-work with these arteries and tendons; when the face of the globe shall flash intelligence like the face of man; when it shall become sensitive to touch—we, occupying this important point, receiving acquisitions from the East and from the West, may find our institutions more perfect, science may be advanced so that instead of receiving immigration, instead of receiving nations from abroad, this will be the great sensorium from which our notions of religion, our notions of government, our improvements in works of every description shall radiate from this as a common center, and revolutionize the whole world.

Who dares say that this is not our destiny, if we will only permit it to be fulfilled? Then let us go on with this great work of interesting men in becoming connected with the soil; interesting them in remaining in your mechanic shops; prevent their accumulation in the streets of your cities; and in doing this, you will dispense with the necessity for all your pauper system. By doing this you enable each community to take care of its own poor. By doing this you destroy and break down the great propensity that exists with men to hang and loiter and perish about the cities of the Union, as is done now in the older countries.

It is well enough, Mr. President, to see where our public lands have been going. There seems to be a great scruple now in reference to the appropriation of lands for the benefit of the people; but the Federal Government has been very liberal heretofore in granting lands to the States for railroad purposes. We can pass law after law, making grant after grant of the public lands to corporations, without alarming any one here. We have already granted to railroad monopolies, to corporations, twenty-four million two hundred and forty-seven thousand acres. Those grants hardly meet with opposition in Congress; but it seems to be very wrong, in the estimation of some, to grant lands to the people on the conditions proposed in the bill before us. We find, furthermore, that there have been granted to the States, as swamp lands—and some of these lands will turn out to be the most productive on the globe—forty million one hundred and thirty-three thousand five hundred and sixty-five acres.

In relation to the public lands, and the grants which have been made by the Government, I have obtained from the Commissioner of the General Land Office several tables, which I now submit.

Estimate of the quantities of land which will inure to the States under grants for railroads, up to June 30, 1857.

The table giving the estimated quantity of all our public lands, shows the feasibility of the plan in favor of which I have been speaking. I know that some gentlemen from the southern States object to this bill because they fear that it will carry emigrants from the free States into those States. Well, sir, on this point I have drawn some conclusions from figures, which I will present to the Senate. In the State of Alabama there are now undisposed of eighty-three million five hundred and thirty-three thousand quarter sections of land. I ask my southern friends, would it not be better if a man in the State of Alabama would select a quarter section there, and take the two hundred dollars it would have cost him, and expend it there, even though it might be inferior land, than to compel him to pay $1 25 an acre, and emigrate from the State of Alabama to a place where he could get better land? If you compel him to pay the higher price, it becomes his interest to leave his native State; but by permitting him to take the land and expend on its improvement what he would otherwise have to pay, and what it would cost him to move, the chances are that he will remain where he is. In the State of Mississippi there are thirty-four thousand four hundred and ninety-six quarter sections; in Louisiana, thirty-seven thousand; in Arkansas, ninety-seven thousand; in Florida, one hundred and twelve thousand. Altogether, the quarter sections of public lands belonging to the Government amount to six million nine hundred and twenty thousand. How feasible the plan is. I have shown, too, that it would take over six hundred years to dispose of the public lands at the rate we have been disposing of them, and that if you take one million quarter sections and have them settled and cultivated, you will obtain more revenue, and you will enhance the remaining public lands more than the value of those the Government gives.

I live in a southern State; and, if I know myself, I am as good a southern man as any one who lives within the borders of the South. It seems to be feared that by this bill we compel men to go on the lands. I want to compel no man to go. I want to leave each and every man to be controlled by his own inclination, by his own interest, and not to force him; but is it statesmanlike, is it philanthropic, is it Christian, to keep a man in a State, and refuse to let him go, because, if he does go, he will tend to populate some other portion of the country? If a man lives in the county in which I live, and he can, by crossing the line into another county, better his condition, I say let him go. If, by crossing the boundary of my State and going into another, he can better his condition, I say let him go. If a man can go from Tennessee into Illinois, or Louisiana, or Mississippi, or Arkansas, or any other State, and better his condition, let him go. I care not where he goes, so that he locates himself in this great area of freedom, becomes attached to our institutions, and interested in the prosperity and welfare of the country. I care not where he goes, so that he is under the protection of our stars and stripes. I say let him go where he can better the condition of himself, his wife, and children; let him go where he can receive the greatest remuneration for his toil and for his labor. What kind of a policy is it to say that a man shall be locked up where he was born, and shall be confined to the place of his birth? Take the State of North Carolina, represented by the honorable Senator before me, [Mr. CLINGMAN]—and I have no doubt it is his intention to represent that people to their satisfaction—would it have been proper to require the people of North Carolina, from her early settlement to the present time, to be confined within her boundaries? Would they not have looked upon it as a hard sentence? Would they not have looked upon it as oppressive and cruel? North Carolina has supplied the western States with a large proportion of her population, for the reason that by going West they could better their condition. Who would prevent them from doing it? Who would say to the poor man in North Carolina, that has no land of his own to cultivate, that lives upon some barren angle, or some piny plain, or in some other State upon some stony ridge, that he must plow and dig the place appointed to him by his landlord, and that he is not to emigrate where he can better his condition? What is his prospect? He has to live poor; he has to live hard; and, in the end, when he dies, poverty, want, is the only inheritance he can leave his children. There is no one who has a higher appreciation of North Carolina than I have; she is my native State. I found it to be my interest to emigrate, and I should have thought it cruel and hard if I had been told that I could not leave her boundary. Although North Carolina did not afford me the advantages of education, though I cannot speak in the language of the schoolmen, and call her my cherishing mother, yet, in the language of Cowper, "with all her faults, I love her still." She is still my mother; she is my native State; and I love her as such, and I love her people, too. But what an idea is it to present, as influencing the action of a statesman; that people may not emigrate from one State to another! Sir, I say let a man go anywhere within the boundaries of the United States where he can better his condition.

Mr. President, if I entertained the notions that some of my friends who oppose this bill do, I should be a more ardent advocate of the policy than I am now, if that were possible. My friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAR] entertains some strange notions in reference to Democracy and the people; and in his speech on the fisheries bill, he gave this proposition a kind of side blow, a lick by indirection. I do not object to that; but if I entertained his opinions I should be a more determined and zealous advocate of the policy of this bill than I am now, if that were possible. In his speech upon the Lecompton constitution that Senator, in speaking of the powers of the convention which framed the constitution, said:

"In my opinion, they would have acted in stricter accordance with the spirit and genius of our institutions if they had not submitted it in whole or in part to the popular vote. Our governments are Republics, not democracies. The people exercise their sovereignty not in person at the ballot-box, but through agents, delegates, or representatives. Our fathers founded republican Governments in preference to Democracies, not so much because it would be impracticable as because it would be unwise and inexpedient for the people themselves to assemble and adopt laws."

I have always thought the general idea had been that it was not practicable to do everything in a strict democratic sense, and that it was more convenient for the people to appear through their delegates. But the Senator said further:

"They were satisfied, from reading and reflection, of the truth of Mr. Madison's observation about pure democracies, that they have ever been spectacles of turbulence and contention; have ever been found incompatible with personal security, or the rights of property; and have in general been as short in their lives as they have been violent in their deaths." They knew from the examples furnished by Greece and Italy, that it is impossible, in a pure democracy, to remove the causes or control the effects of faction; that an absolute majority is often swayed by passion than by reason; that its voice is oftener that of a demon than of a God; that it is the most cruel, rapacious, intolerant, and intolerable of all tyrants. They knew that it is a wholly irresponsible power; acknowledging no superior, for it is itself supreme; owing no obedience, for it is its own master; respecting no authority, for it is a law unto itself; subject to no control or restraint, except the still small voice of conscience, which is too often drowned in the tumultuous waves of party or of faction. It might sacrifice public good or private rights to any ruling passion or interest of the hour, with impunity. It had robbed the rich to relieve the poor, and oppressed the poor to aggrandize the rich, with equal ardor or indifference. It had voted hemlock to-day and statues to-morrow, to its best citizens. They suffered no man to be a judge in his own case, lest he should be biased by passion, or by interest; and could find no better reason why a large body of men, although a majority, should be the supreme and final arbiters of its cause. On the contrary, they knew that a large body of men is more liable to be controlled by passion or by interest than a single individual, and is more apt to sacrifice the rights of the minority, because it can be done with more impunity. Hence they endeavored to impose restraints upon themselves. Hence they committed the making of all their laws, organic or municipal, to their delegates or representatives, whose crimes they could punish, whose errors they could correct, and whose powers they could reclaim.

"The great security of our rights of life, liberty, and property, is in the responsibility of those who make and of those who execute the law. Establish as a principle that to give sanction to law, it must be approved by a majority at the ballot-box, and you take away this security and surrender those rights to the most capricious, rapacious, and cruel of tyrants. I regret to see the growing spirit in Congress and throughout the country to democratize our Government; to submit every question, whether pertaining to organic or municipal laws, to the vote of the people. This is sheer radicalism; it is the Red Republicanism of revolutionary France, which appealed to the sections on all occasions, and not the American Republicanism of our fathers. Their Republicanism was stable and conservative; this is mutable and revolutionary. Theirs afforded a shield for the minority; this gives a sword to the majority. Theirs defended the rights of the weak; this surrenders them to the power of the strong. God forbid that the demagoguism of this day should prevail over the philanthropic and philosophic statesmanship of our fathers."

In the same speech, the Senator said:

"Property is the foundation of every social fabric. To preserve, protect, and perpetuate rights of property, society is formed, and government is framed."

Now, if I entertained these notions, I should unquestionably go for the homestead bill. I am free to say, here, that I do not hold the doctrine advanced by the honorable gentleman from Alabama, to the extent that he goes. I believe the people are capable of self-government. I think they have demonstrated so most clearly; and I do not think the Senator's history of democracy states the case as it should be. I presume in the Senator's own State the people acted directly upon their constitution at the ballot-box. That is the organic law. If they did not there, they have done so in most of the States of the Union; not, perhaps, in their original formation of their governments, but as the people have gone on and advanced in popular government. The honorable Senator seems to be opposed to democratizing; in other words, he is opposed to popularizing our institutions; he is afraid to trust the control of things to the people at the ballot-box. Why, sir, the organic law which confers all the power upon your State Legislatures, creates the different divisions, different departments of the State. The government are controlled at the ballot-box, and the doctrine set forth in the constitution of Alabama is, that the people have a right to abolish and change their form of government when they think proper. The principle is clearly recognized; and on this my honorable friend and myself differ essentially. I find a similar doctrine laid down in a pamphlet which I have here.

"In the convention that framed the Constitution of the United States, Gouverneur Morris said, that 'Property is the main object of society.' Mr. King said, 'Property is the primary object of society.' Mr. Butler contended strenuously that 'Property was the only just measure of representation.' This was the great object of government; the great cause of war; the great means of carrying it on." Mr. Madison said, that "In future times a great majority of the people will not only be without landed, but any other sort of property. These will either combine under the influence of their common situation—in which case the right of property and the public liberty will not be secure in their hands—or, what is more probable, they will become the tools of opulence and ambition." Gouverneur Morris again said, 'give the votes to the people who have no property, and they will sell them to the rich who will be able to buy them.' We should not confine our attention to the present moment. The time is not far distant when this country will abound with mechanics and manufacturers, who will receive their bread from their employers. Will such men be the secure and faithful guardians of liberty?" Madison remarks, that those who opposed the property basis of representation, did so on the ground that numbers of people was a fair index to the amount of property in any district."

These are not notions entertained by me; but they are important as the notions of some of our public men at the early formation of our Government. I entertain no such notions. If, however, the Senator from Alabama holds that property is the main object and basis of society, he, above all other men, ought to go for this bill, so as to place every man in the possession of a home and an interest in his country. The very doctrine that he lays down appeals to him trumpet-tongued, and asks him to place these men in a condition where they can be relied upon. His argument is unanswerable, if it be true, in favor of the homestead bill. It is taking men out of a dependent condition; it is preventing this Government from sinking into that condition that Rome did in her decline. I ask him now, if he entertains these opinions, as promulgated in his speech, to come up and join with us in the passage of this bill, and make every man, if possible, a property-holder, interested in his country; give him a basis to settle upon, and make him reliable at the ballot box.

His speech is a fine production. I heard it with interest at the time it was delivered. I hold the opposite to him. Instead of the voice of the people being the voice of a demon, I go back to the old idea, and I favor the policy of popularizing all our free institutions. We are Democrats, occupying a position here from the South; we start together, but we turn our backs upon each other very soon. His policy would take the Government further from the people. I go in a direction to popularize it, and bring it nearer to the people. There is no better illustration of this than that old maxim, which is adopted in all our ordinary transactions, that "if you want a thing done, send somebody to do it; if you want it well done, go and do it yourself." It applies with great force in governmental affairs as in individual affairs; and as we can advance and make the workings and operation of our Government familiar to and understood by the people, the better for us. I say, when and wherever it is practicable, let the people transact their own business; bring them more in contact with their Government, and then you will arrest expenditure, you will arrest corruption, you will have a purer and better Government.

I hold to the doctrine that man can be advanced; that man can be elevated; that man can be more exalted in his character and condition. We are told, on high authority, that he is made in the image of his God; that he is endowed with a certain amount of divinity. And I believe man can be elevated; man can become more and more endowed with divinity; and as he does he becomes more God-like in his character and capable of governing himself. Let us go on elevating our people, perfecting our institutions, until democracy shall reach such a point of perfection that we can exclaim with truth that the voice of the people is the voice of God.

As I said, I have entertained different notions from those inculcated by the honorable Senator. If I entertained his notions, then I should be for the homestead. I hold in my hand a document that was proclaimed in 1776:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Is property laid down there as the great element and the great basis of society? It is only one; and Mr. Jefferson laid it down in the Declaration of Independence, that it was a self-evident truth that government was instituted—for what? To protect men in life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That is what Mr. Jefferson said. And who indorsed it? The men who framed the Declaration of Independence, not going upon the property idea, that that was the only element of society. This was the doctrine established by those who proclaimed our independence. Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness were three great elements of government, and not property exclusively. When the declaration came forth from the old Congress hall, it came forth as a column of fire and light. It declared that the security of life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness, were the three great elements of government. Mr. Jefferson, in his first inaugural address, which is the greatest paper that has ever been written in this Government, and I commend it to the reading of those who say they are Democrats, by way of refreshing their memories, that they may understand what are correct Democratic principles, says:

"Sometimes it is said that man cannot be trusted with the government of himself. Can he, then, be trusted with the government of others? Or have we found angels in the form of kings to govern him? Let history answer this question."

Mr. Jefferson seems to think man can be trusted with the government of himself. In the Declaration of Independence he does not embrace property; in fact, it is not referred to. But I am willing to concede that it is one of the primary and elementary principles in government. Mr. Jefferson declares the great truth that man is to be trusted; that man is capable of governing himself, and that he has a right to govern himself. In the same inaugural address of Mr. Jefferson, we find the passage usually attributed to Washington's Farewell Address, which has got universal circulation—that we should pursue our own policy; that we should promote our own institutions, maintaining friendly relations with all, entangling alliances with none. Let us carry out the doctrines of the inaugural address of Mr. Jefferson; let us carry out the great principles laid down in the Declaration of Independence, which this homestead bill embraces.

But I wish to call attention to some other authority on this subject. As contradistinguished from the views of the Senator from Alabama, I present the views of a recent writer as in accordance with my own notions of Democracy:

"The Democratic party represents the great principle of progress. It is onward and outward in its movements. It has a heart for action, and motives for a world. It constitutes the principles of diffusion, and is to humanity what the centrifugal force is to the revolving orbs of a universe. What motion is to them, Democracy is to principle. It is the soul in action. It conforms to the providence of God. It has confidence in man, and an abiding reliance in his high destiny. It seeks the largest liberty, the greatest good, and the surest happiness. It aims to build up the great interests of the many, to the least detriment of the few. It remembers the past, without neglecting the present. It establishes the present, without fearing to provide for the future. It cares for the weak, while it permits no injustice to the strong. It conquers the oppressor, and prepares the subjects of tyranny for freedom. It melts the bigot's heart to meekness, and reconciles his mind to knowledge. It dispels the clouds of ignorance and superstition, and prepares the people for instruction and self-respect. It adds wisdom to legislation, and improved judgment to government. It favors enterprise that yields a reward to the many and an industry that is permanent. It is the pioneer of humanity—the conservator of nations. It fails only when it ceases to be true to itself. Vox populi vox Dei, has proved to be both a proverb and a prediction.

"It is a mistake to suppose that Democracy may not be advanced under different forms of government. Its own, it should be remembered, is the highest conventional form, that which precedes the lofty independence of the individual spoken of by the Apostle to the Hebrews, who will need government but from the law which the Lord has placed in his heart.

"In one respect, all nations are governed upon the same principle; that is, each adopts the form which it has the understanding and the power to sustain. There is in all a greater or lesser power, and it requires no profound speculation to decide which will control. A tyrannical dictator may do more to advance the true interests of Democracy than a moderate sovereign who is scrupulously guarded by an antiquated constitution; for the tyrant adds vigor to his opponents by his deeds of oppression.

"The frequent question as to what form of government is best, is often answered without any reference to condition or application of principles. There can be properly but one answer, and yet the application of that answer may lead to great diversity of views.

"When it is asserted that the democratic form of government is unquestionably the best, it must be considered that the answer not only designates the form preferred, but implies a confident belief in the advanced condition of the people who are to be the subjects of it. It premises the capacity for self control, and a corresponding degree of knowledge in regard to the rights, balances, and necessities, of society. It involves a discriminating appreciation of the varied duties of the man, the citizen, and the legislator. It presupposes a reasonable knowledge of the legitimate means and ends of government, enlarged views of humanity, and of the elements of national existence.

"The democratic form of government is the best, because its standard of moral requisition is the highest. It claims for man a universality of interest, liberty and justice. It is Christianity, with its mountain beacons and guides. It is the standard of Deity based on the eternal principles of truth, passing through and rising above the yielding clouds of ignorance, into the regions of infinite wisdom. As we live on, this pillar of the cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, will not be taken from before the people, but stand immovable, immeasurable, and in the brightness of its glory continue to shed increasing light on a world and a universe.

"The great objects of knowledge and moral culture of the people are among its most prominent provisions. Practical religion and religious freedom are the sunshine of its growth and glory. It is the sublime and mighty standard spoken of by the Psalmist, who exclaims, in the beautiful language of poetical conception:

"The Lord is high above all nations, and his glory above the heavens. Who is like unto the Lord our God, who dwelleth on high; who humbleth himself to behold the things that are in heaven and in the earth? He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dung, that he may set him with princes, even with the princes of the people."

"To say that man is not in a condition to realize or to appreciate such a standard, is to admit its necessity. To object to its lofty requisitions, is to establish its authority. The standard for a world should be in harmony with the attributes of Deity, above and beyond the present wants of humanity.

"To say that an ignorant and immoral people are capable of self government, is asserting that government may be administered without knowledge and without justice. Such a proposition is admitted by no one; and is, therefore, inadmissible in all discussions as to what form of government is best.

"Democracy is a permanent element of progress, and is present everywhere, whatever may be the temporary form of the ruling power. Its inexhaustible fires first burst forth in an empire, and its welcome lights cheer the dark domains of despotism. While tyrants hate the patriot and exile him from their contracted dominions, the spirit of Democracy invests him as a missionary of humanity, and inspires him with an eloquence which moves a world. Its lightning rays cannot be hidden; its presence cannot be banished. Dictators, kings, and emperors, are but its servants; and, as man becomes elevated to the dignity of self knowledge and control, their administration ceases. Their rule indicates an imperfect state of society, and may be regarded as the moral props of the builder, necessary only to sustain a people in their different periods of growth. One cannot speak of them lightly, nor indulge in language that should seem to deny their fitness as the instruments of good in the hands of Providence. Their true position may be best gathered from the prediction which is based upon a knowledge of the past and present condition of man—that all kingdoms and empires must cease, whenever a people have a knowledge of their rights, and acquire the power of a practical application of principles. This is the work of time. It is the work of constant, repeated trial. The child that attempts to step an hundred times and falls; the new fledged bird that tries its feeble wings again and again before it is able to sweep the circle of the sky with its kindred flock, indicate the simple law upon which all strength depends, whether it be the strength of an insect, or the strength of a nation.

"Because a people do not succeed in changing their form of government, even after repeated trials, we are not to infer that they are indulging in impracticable experiments, nor that they will be disappointed in ultimately realizing the great objects of their ambition. Indeed, all failures of this class are indicative of progressive endeavor. They imply an increasing knowledge of the true dignity of man, and a growing disposition to engage in new and more and more difficult endeavors. These endeavors are but the exercise of a nation, and without them, no people can ever command the elements of national existence and of self-control. But inquiries in regard to so extensive a subject, should be shaped within more practical limits."

"The triumphs of Democracy constitute the way-marks of the world. They demand no extraneous element of endurance for permanency, no fictitious splendor for embellishment, no borrowed greatness for glory. Originating in the inexhaustible sources of power, moved by the spirit of love and liberty, and guided by the wisdom which comes from the instincts and experience of the immortal soul, as developed in the people, Democracy exists in the imperishable principle of progress, and registers its achievements in the institutions of freedom, and in the blessings which characterize and beautify the realities of life. Its genius is to assert and advance the true dignity of mind, to elevate the motives and affections of man, and to extend, establish, protect, and equalize the common rights of humanity.

"Condorcet, although an aristocrat by genius and by birth, became a Democrat from philosophy."—Letartine.

"A few years since a Whig member of the United States Senate sincerely asked Senator Allen, of Ohio, the question, 'what is Democracy?' The following was the prompt reply: 'Democracy is a sentiment not to be appalled, corrupted, or compromised. It knows no baseness; it cowers to no danger; it oppresses no weakness; destructive only of despotism; it is the sole conservator of liberty, labor, and property. It is the sentiment of freedom, of equal rights, of equal obligations—the law of nature pervading the law of the land.'"

"What, sir," asked Patrick Henry, in the Virginia convention, of 1778, 'is the genius of Democracy? Let me read that clause of the bill of rights of Virginia which relates to this, (third clause): That government is or ought to be instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people, nation, or community; of all the various modes and forms of government, that is best which is capable of producing the greatest degree of happiness and safety, and is most effectually secured against the dangers of maladministration; and that whenever any Government shall be found inadequate, or contrary to those principles, or contrary to those purposes, a majority of the community hath an indubitable, inalienable, and indefeasible right to reform, alter, or abolish it, in such manner as shall be judged the most conducive to the public weal.'"—Elliot's Debates, vol. 3, page 77.

In the same convention, Judge Marshall, said:

"What are the favorite maxims of Democracy? A strict observance of justice and public faith, and a steady adherence to virtue—these, sir, are the principles of a good government."—Ibid vol. 3, page 223.

"Democracy," says the late Mr. Legaré, of South Carolina, in an article published in the New York Review, 'in the high and only true sense of that much abused word, is the destiny of nations, because it is the spirit of Christianity.'"—Vol. 5, page 297.

I have referred to the remarks of the Senator from Alabama to show that if his doctrines were true, he should go for the passage of the homestead bill, because, in order to sustain the Government on the principles laid down by him, every man should be a property-holder. I want it understood that I enter a disclaimer to the doctrine presented by him, and merely present his argument to show why he, above all others, ought to go for the homestead policy. I refer to Mr. Legaré, Judge Marshall, and the author of the history of Democracy, as laying down my notions of Democracy, as contradistinguished from those laid down by the distinguished Senator from Alabama. We are both members of the Democratic party. I claim to be a Democrat, East, West, North, or South, or anywhere else. I have nothing to disguise. I have referred to the Declaration of Independence, and to Mr. Jefferson's inaugural address, for the purpose of showing that Democracy means something very different from what was laid down by the distinguished Senator from Alabama. I furthermore refer to these important documents to show that property is not the leading element of government and of society. Mr. Jefferson lays down, as truths to be self-evident, that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are the leading essentials of government.

But it is not my purpose to dwell longer on that; and I wish to pass to the speech of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND.] I disagree in much that was said by that distinguished Senator; and I wish to show that he ought to go for the homestead policy, so as to interest every man in the country. If property is the leading and principal element on which society rests; if property is the main object for which government was created, the gentlemen who are the foremost, the most zealous, and most distinguished advocates of that doctrine should sustain the homestead policy. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, in his speech on the Lecompton constitution, by innuendo or indirection, had a hit at the homestead—a side blow. He said:

"Your people are awaking. They are coming here. They are thundering at our doors for homesteads; one hundred and sixty acres of land for nothing; and southern Senators are supporting them. Nay, they are assembling, as I have said, with arms in their hands, and demanding work at $1,000 a year for six hours a day. Have you heard that the ghosts of Mendoza and Torquemada are stalking in the streets of your great cities? That the Inquisition is at hand?"

If this be true, as assumed by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, is it not an argument why men should be placed in a condition where they will not clamor, where they will not raise mobs to threaten Government, and demand homesteads? Interest these men in the country; give them homes, or let them take homes; let them become producers; let them become better citizens; let them be more reliable at the ballot-box. I want to take them on their ground, their principle, that property is the main element of society and of government; and if their doctrine be true, the argument is still stronger in favor of the homestead than the position I assume. But the distinguished Senator from South Carolina goes on:

"In all social systems there must be a class to do the menial duties, to perform the drudgery of life. That is, a class requiring but a low order of intellect, and but little skill. Its requisites are vigor, docility, fidelity. Such a class you must have, or you would not have that other class which leads progress, civilization, and refinement. It constitutes the very mud sill of society and of political government; and you might as well attempt to build a house in the air, as to build either the one or the other, except on this mud-sill."

"The poor ye always have with you; for the man who lives by daily labor, and scarcely lives at that, and who has to put out his labor in the market, and take the best he can get for it—in short, your whole hireling class of manual laborers and operatives, as you call them, are essentially slaves. The difference between us is, that our slaves are hired for life and well compensated; there is no starvation, no begging, no want of employment among our people; and not too much employment either. Yours are hired by the day, not cared for, and scantily compensated, which may be proved in the most painful manner, at any hour, in any street in any of your large towns. Why, you meet more beggars in one day, in any single street of the city of New York, than you would meet in a lifetime in the whole South. We do not think that whites should be slaves either by law or necessity."

In this portion of the Senator's remarks I concur. I do not think whites should be slaves; and if slavery is to exist in this country, I prefer black slavery to white slavery. But what I want to get at, is, to show that my worthy friend from South Carolina should defend the homestead policy, and the impolicy of making the invidious remarks that have been made here in reference to a portion of the population of the United States. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I feel that I can afford to speak what are my sentiments. I am no aspirant for anything on the face of God Almighty's earth. I have reached the summit of my ambition. The acme of all my hopes has been attained, and I would not give the position I occupy here to-day for any other in the United States. Hence, I say, I can afford to speak what I believe to be true.

In one sense of the term we are all slaves. A man is a slave to his ambition; he is a slave to his avarice; he is a slave to his necessities; and, in enumerations of this kind, you can scarcely find any man, high or low in society, but who, in some sense, is a slave; but they are not slaves in the sense we mean at the South, and it will not do to assume that every man who toils for his living is a slave. If that be so, all are slaves; for all must toil more or less, mentally or physically. But in the other sense of the term, we are not slaves. Will it do to assume that the man who labors with his hands, every man who is an operative in a manufacturing establishment or a shop, is a slave? No, sir; that will not do. Will it do to assume that every man who does not own slaves, but has to live by his own labor, is a slave? That will not do. If this were true, it would be very unfortunate for a good many of us, and especially so for me. I am a laborer with my hands, and I never considered myself a slave, in the acceptance of the term slave in the South. I do own some; I made them by my industry, by the labor of my hands. In that sense of the term I should have been a slave while I was earning them with the labor of my hands.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the Senator define a slave?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. What we understand to be a slave in the South, is a man who is held during his natural life subject to, and under the control of, a master. The necessities of life, and the various positions in which a man may be placed, operated upon by avarice, gain, or ambition, may cause him to labor; but that does not make a slave. How many men are there in society who go out and work with their own hands, who reap in the field, and mow in a meadow, who hoe corn, who work in the shops? Are they slaves? If we were to go back and follow out this idea, that every operative and laborer is a slave, we should find that we have had a great many distinguished slaves since the world commenced.

Socrates, who first conceived the idea of the immortality of the soul, Pagan as he was, labored with his own hands;—yes, wielded the chisel and the mallet, giving polish and finish to the stone; he afterwards turned to be a fashioner and constructor of the mind. Paul, the great expounder, himself was a tent-maker, and worked with his hands: was he a slave? Archimedes, who declared that, if he had a place on which to rest the fulcrum, with the power of his lever he could move the world: was he a slave? Adam, our great father and head, the lord of the world, was a tailor by trade: I wonder if he was a slave?

When we talk about laborers and operatives, look at the columns that adorn this Chamber, and see their finish and style. We are lost in admiration at the architecture of your buildings, and their massive columns. We can speak with admiration. What would it have been but for hands to construct it? Was the artisan who worked upon it a slave? Let us go to the South and see how the matter stands there. Is every man that is not a slaveholder to be denominated a slave because he labors? Why indulge in such a notion? The argument cuts at both ends of the line, and these kind of doctrines do us infinite harm in the South. There are operatives there; there are laborers there; there are mechanics there. Are they slaves? Who is it in the South that gives us title and security to the institution of slavery? Who is it, let me ask every southerner around me? Suppose, for instance, we take the State of South Carolina; and there are many things about her and her people that I admire: we find that the 384,984 slaves in South Carolina are owned by how many whites? They are owned by 25,556. Take the State of Tennessee, with a population of 800,000; 239,000 slaves are owned by 33,864 persons. The slaves in the State of Alabama are owned by 29,295 whites. The whole number of slaveholders in all the slave States, when summed up, makes 347,000, owning three and a half million slaves. The white population in South Carolina is 274,000; the slaves greater than the whites. The aggregate population of the State is 668,507.

The operatives in South Carolina are 68,549. Now, take the 25,000 slave-owners out, and a large proportion of the people of South Carolina work with their hands. Will it do to assume that, in the State of South Carolina, the State of Tennessee, the State of Alabama, and the other slaveholding States, all those who do not own slaves are slaves themselves? Will this assumption do? What does it do at home in our own States? It has a tendency to raise prejudice, to engender opposition to the institution of slavery itself. Yet our own folks will do it.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. MASON. The Senator is making an exhibition of the very few slaveholders in the southern States, in proportion to the white population, according to the census. That is an exhibition which has been made before by Senators who sit on the other side of the Chamber. They have brought before the American people what they allege to be the fact, shown by the census, that of the white population in the southern States, there are very few who are slaveholders. The Senator from Tennessee is now doing the same thing. I understand him to say there are but some—I do not remember exactly the numbers, but I think three hundred thousand or a fraction more of the whites in the slaveholding States, who own three million slaves; but he made no further exposition. I ask the Senator to state the additional fact that the holders of the slaves are the heads of families of the white population; and neither that Senator nor those whose example he has followed on the other side, has stated the fact that the white population in the southern States, as in the other States, embraces men, women, and children. He has exhibited only the number of slaveholders who are heads of families.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The Senator says I have not made an exhibit of the fact. The Senator interrupted me before I had concluded. I gave way as a matter of courtesy to him. Perhaps his speech would have had no place, if he had waited to hear me a few moments longer.

Mr. MASON. I shall wait. I thought the Senator had passed that point.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I was stating the fact, that according to the census tables three hundred and forty-seven thousand white persons owned the whole number of slaves in the southern States. I was about to state that the families holding these slaves might average six or eight or ten persons, all of whom are interested in the products of slave labor, and many of these slaves are held by minors and by females. I was not alluding to the matter for the purpose the Senator from Virginia seems to have intimated, and I should have been much obliged to him if he had waited until he heard my application of these figures. I was going to show that expressions like those to which I have alluded, operate against us in the South, and I was following the example of no one. I was taking these facts from the census tables, which were published by order of Congress, to show the bad policy and injustice of declaring that the laboring portion of our population were slaves and menials. Such declarations should not be applied to the people either North or South. I wished to say in that connection, that, in my opinion, if a few men at the North and at the South, who entertain extreme views on the subject of slavery, and desire to keep up agitation, were out of the way, the great mass of the people, North and South, would go on prosperously and harmoniously under our institutions.

Nor, sir, am I a conservative; but I am for administering this Government on correct principles. I believe the time will come when the northern States will be the advocates of the institution of slavery in the South. I believe the time will come which we heard announced on the other side of the House, when Massachusetts will be for free trade. How long is it since she was standing here advocating protection, high tariffs, and bounties? Yesterday her Senator told us she was for free trade, and the abolition of all custom-houses. I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but I predict here that the time will come when the northern States will be the advocates of the institution of slavery as it exists in the South. Why? The whole difficulty, in my judgment, in regard to slavery, has arisen from a jealousy of political power in the Congress of the United States. The people of the North have been told that the South obtain an undue proportion of power in the councils of the nation because of the three fifths representation of slaves; that on the three million slaves they get eighteen Representatives. Now, if the question were looked at properly, it would be found that, instead of slavery being an element of political power, it is an element of political weakness. If slavery were abolished in the South, and her slaves made free men, instead of the South having eighteen Representatives for her three million slaves, she would have thirty Representatives. But for this provision of the Constitution, all the negroes in the South would be counted, and we should have a larger representation in the councils of the nation.

This is what I was going to show; and the time will come when the South will have the North advocating the institution of slavery. Why do I say so? Let us go on with the policy I am proposing, settle and cultivate these lands, reduce them to cultivation, widen the demand for cotton, widen the demand for rice, widen the demand for sugar and tobacco, widen the demand for the products of slave labor; and just in proportion as you do that, you reconcile the North to the institution of slavery. Let us populate our public lands, and reduce them to cultivation; let us embrace Cuba; and when we shall have a sufficient amount of country adapted to the production of sugar, and to the production of cotton, we shall supply the demands at home. Taking four hundred thousand bales of cotton as the amount consumed in the United States, and run your population to one hundred and fifty millions, and you create a demand at home for every pound of cotton that can be grown in the United States. Run it up to five hundred millions, and there will be more demand for rice, cotton, and sugar at home than you can produce.

When the northern people come to see and know that sugar, cotton, and rice, cannot be produced by any other kind of labor than slave labor, they will become reconciled to the institution. The demand becoming great, they will see and feel the necessity of having those articles. Cotton must be had; sugar must be had; rice must be had. Then present that other great idea, that slave labor is the only labor adapted to the production of these articles, and the non-slaveholding States will become reconciled to the institution. Especially will this be so when the northern mind comes to understand that the man who has his capital invested in labor is the surest and most reliable friend and advocate. Let us understand this idea.

The Senator from Virginia mistook where I was driving. He mistook the direction of the conclusion I was coming to. Look at the three million slaves owned by three hundred and forty-seven thousand white persons, and those interested. Counting them at $500 a head, how much will they come to? Fifteen hundred million dollars invested in what? In labor. The time will come when slave labor will be more productive in sugar, cotton, and rice, than any other; when the demand increases at home and abroad. You will find that slaves will be confined to that description of labor which is more productive, and the production of those articles which are most needed by the country. Then, do we not see and understand that just in proportion as you foster the one you protect and foster the other?

Mr. MASON. The Senator will allow me a moment. He says I mistook the drift of his remarks. I certainly did, so far as the theory with which he connects them is now exhibited, and I will not say that I have not mistaken the direction altogether. The reason why I asked permission to interrupt the Senator was, that the exhibition which he made of the number of slaveholders in proportion to the white population was an exhibition that had been made more than once on the other side of the Chamber. We had always considered it an unfair exhibition. The Senator made the same, and did not show its unfairness. I have waited until this time, but I do not see that he has yet shown it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The gentleman, in his former remarks, gave the explanation of it, and I told him I had not reached that point, and if he had waited a few moments I would have made the same explanation he put in my mouth. But I was going to show, Mr. President, that the people of the non-slaveholding States would ultimately become the advocates of the institution of slavery. Why? Is the South no market for the productions of the non-slaveholding States? Where does their pork, where do their horses, where do the mules, where do the large proportion of all the articles of our consumption come from? From Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, a large proportion is furnished. Well, then, just in proportion as you create a demand in the South for those articles the northern producers become interested in the institutions of the South, and just in proportion as the South can get a high price for her cotton, she will pay a high price for every hog, every mule, and every horse she buys. Just so with the North in the manufacture of articles. They go on manufacturing, and the South is a market for them. Cotton is the great staple they consume. Hence, they become interested in the production of cotton. The South is interested in the articles consumed by the North, and, in return, the South is a market for their manufactured articles.

I have said that the three hundred and forty-seven thousand slaveholders in the South having an interest in slaves to the amount of $1,500,000,000, were the best friends, instead of being antagonists, to northern labor. Why do I say so? Their capital is invested in labor; and just in proportion as their capital is invested in labor, they become interested in hunting up new markets, in devising ways and means for the consumption of the products of slave labor; and therefore, obtaining a higher price for those productions, and just in proportion as they realize a higher price for labor, in the very same proportion they are protecting the labor of the white man in the non-slaveholding States. The necessity of the production of cotton and rice, when population reaches a certain point, and its consumption comes up to the product, will cause the northern mind to be reconciled to the institution of slavery.

Why is Great Britain so much opposed to the institution of slavery here? She sees and knows there are $1,500,000,000 invested in labor. That labor brings about an influence advocating high prices for labor. In what does the capital of Great Britain consist? It is in stocks and in money. It occupies a position that arrays it against high prices for labor. The capital of Great Britain is in the field against the world in opposition to high prices of labor. Her object is to reduce labor down to the lowest point she can get it. The interest of the southern man, his capital being in labor, is to bring it up to the highest price. If Great Britain can succeed in inducing the United States to change or to withdraw her capital out of labor, and put it in stocks or money, what would be the effect? The entire capital in the United States would at once be arrayed on the side of Great Britain, and on the side of the aristocracy of wealth against high prices for labor.

This number of persons and this immense amount of capital and talent connected with slave labor, make the South the surest and the most reliable advocate the northern man has for high prices for labor; and the time will come when there will be a perfect reciprocity in this country. The time will come, if we act as brethren and members of the same great Confederacy, when the northern man will see it to be his interest to stand by the institution of slave labor; when the southern man will see it to be his interest to stand by the Union, to stand by the agriculturists, and by the manufacturer. Then, let us all go on harmoniously and gloriously together, and fill up and carry out our destiny.

Take a simple illustration. A man at the South has a thousand dollars invested in labor. Does not that man try to get the highest price he can for the products of that labor? Take another man who has a thousand dollars in money. He has labor to buy, and does he not try to get labor as cheap as he can for his thousand dollars? Most unquestionably he does. The law is unerring and well established, and if it were well understood throughout the whole country, all the strife and turmoil with reference to the institution of slavery would be swept away, and the country everywhere reconciled. The Senator from Virginia, I think, interrupted me too soon in supplying what he supposed to be a deficiency in my statement.

Sir, carry out the homestead policy, attach the people to the soil, induce them to love the Government, and you will have the North reconciled to the South, and the South to the North, and we shall not have invidious doctrines preached to stir up bad feelings in either section. I know that in my own State, and in the other southern States, the men who do not own slaves are among the first to take care of the institution. They will submit to no encroachment from abroad, no interference from other sections.

I have said, Mr. President, much more than I intended to say, and, I fear, in rather a desultory manner, but I hope I have made myself understood on the subject of slavery. I heard that some gentleman was going to offer an amendment to this bill, providing that the Government should furnish every man with a slave. So far as I am concerned, if it suited him, and his inclination led him that way, I wish to God every head of a family in the United States had one to take the drudgery and menial service off his family. I would have no objection to that; but this intimation was intended as a slur upon my proposition. I want that to be determined by the people of the respective States, and not by the Congress of the United States. I do not want this body to interfere by inuendo or by amendment, prescribing that the people shall have this or the other. I desire to leave that to be determined by the people of the respective States, and not by the Congress of the United States.

I hope, Mr. President, that this bill will be passed. I think it involves the very first principles of the Government: it is founded upon statesmanship, humanity, philanthropy, and even upon Christianity itself. I know the argument has been made, why permit one portion of the people to go and take some of this land and not another? The law is in general terms; it places it in the power of every man who will go to take a portion of the land. The Senator from Alabama suggests to me that a person, in order to get the benefit of this bill, must prove that he is not the owner of other land. An amendment was yesterday inserted in the bill striking out that provision. Then it places all on an equality to go and take. Why should this not be done? It was conceded yesterday that the land was owned by the people. There are over three million heads of families in the United States; and if every man who is the head of a family were to take a quarter section of public land, there would still be nearly four million quarter sections left. If some people go and take quarter sections, it does not interfere with the rights of others, for he who goes takes only a part of that which is his, and takes nothing that belongs to anybody else. The domain belongs to the whole people; the equity is in the great mass of the people; the Government holds the fee and passes the title, but the beneficial interest is in the people. There are, as I have said, two quarter sections of land for every head of a family in the United States, and we merely propose to permit a head of a family to take one half of that which belongs to him.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 143.

I believe the passage of this bill will strengthen the bonds of the Union. It will give us a better voting population, and just in proportion as men become interested in property, they will become reconciled to all the institutions of property in the country in whatever shape they may exist. Take the institution of slavery, for instance: would you rather trust it to the mercies of a people liable to be ruled by the mobs of which my honorable friend from South Carolina spoke, or would you prefer an honest set of landholders? Which would be the most reliable? Who would guaranty the greatest security to our institutions, when they come to the test of the ballot-box?

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will pass this bill. I think it will be the beginning of a new state of things—a new era.

So far as I am concerned—I say it not in any spirit of boast or egotism—if this bill were passed, and the system it inaugurates carried out, granting a reasonable quantity of land for a man's family, looking far into the distance to see what is to result from it—a stable, an industrious, a hardy, a Christian, a philanthropic community growing out of it, I should feel that the great object of my little mission was fulfilled. All that I desire is the honor and the credit of being one of the American Congress to consummate and to carry out this great scheme that is to elevate our race and to make our institutions more permanent. I want no reputation as some have insinuated. You may talk about Jacobinism, Red Republicanism, and so on. I pass by such insinuations as the idle wind which I regard not.

I know the motives that prompt me to action. I can go back to that period in my own history when I could not say I had a home. This being so, when I cast my eyes from one extreme of the United States to the other, and behold the great number that are homeless, I feel for them. I believe this bill would put them in possession of homes; and I want to see them realizing that sweet conception when each man can proclaim, "I have a home; an abiding place for my wife and for my children; I am not the tenant of another; I am my own ruler; and I will move according to my own will, and not at the dictation of another." Yes, Mr. President, if I should never be heard of again on the surface of God's habitable globe, the proud and conscious satisfaction of having contributed my little aid to the consummation of this great measure is all the reward I desire.

The people need friends. They have a great deal to bear. They make all; they do all; but how little they participate in the legislation of the country? All, or nearly all, of our legislation is for corporations, for monopolies, for classes, and individuals; but the great mass who produce all, who make all while we do nothing but consume, are little cared for; their rights and interests are neglected and overlooked. Let us, as patriots, let us as statesmen, let us as Christians, consummate this great measure which will exert an influence throughout the civilized world in fulfilling our destiny. I thank the Senate for their attention.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. HAMMOND, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 20, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is there a quorum present?

The SPEAKER. There are but eighty-eight members present.

Mr. CLEMENS. Then I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was called; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adrain, Abl, Arnold, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Boyce, Brayton, Burroughs, Campbell, Caruthers, Caskie, Chaffee, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clark B. Cochran, Corning, Covode, Burton Craig, Curry, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Iowa, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Garnett, Giddings, Gillis, Gilman, Goode, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hickman, Houston, Huyler, Jenkins, Jewett, Keitt, Kelly, Kilgore, Lawrence, Leach, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Miles, Montgomery, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Peyton, Purviance, Ready, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Sandidge, Savage, Scott, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Waldron, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Watkins, and Wortendyke.

One hundred and forty-one members having answered to their names,

Mr. MORGAN moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 90) repealing all laws or parts of laws granting allowances or bounties to vessels employed in the bank or other fisheries; in which he asked the concurrence of the House.

GEORGE G. SMITH.

Mr. GARTRELL asked and obtained unanimous consent to introduce a bill for the relief of Dr. George G. Smith, late postmaster at Atlanta, Georgia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

WILLETT'S POINT.

Mr. HASKIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed by the House on the 9th of February, to investigate the sale and purchase of the property at Willett's point, New York, purchased by the Government for fortification purposes, be authorized to proceed to New York, view the property, and examine witnesses.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

Mr. FLORENCE. There is a pressing necessity for the passage of this resolution, and I hope the House will adopt it. It is the purpose of the committee to examine four, five, or six witnesses who have not yet been examined. Members of the committee desire to view this property; and therefore it was considered wise in the committee, without any dissenting voice, to ask the House to grant this privilege to the committee. But three members will go, who will also have the duty to perform of examining four, five, or six witnesses.

Mr. HASKIN. The adoption of the amendment will save $300.

Mr. CLEMENS. As the Willett's point investigation professes to relate to the transaction of a Cabinet officer from Virginia, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BURNETT. I am opposed to sending roving commissioners over the country; and therefore I object.

COMMANDER M. F. MAURY.

Mr. WINSLOW, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution authorizing Commander M. F. Maury to accept a gold medal awarded to him by the Emperor of Austria; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

REVISION OF TARIFF, ETC.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make a loan of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the creditors of the United States the sums to which they are justly, legally, and equitably entitled; particularly the debts due to the officers and soldiers of the revolutionary army, and the widows and children of those who died in the service, and their representatives, for the payment of which the faith of the nation has been pledged; and also, the arrears of pension due to the invalids of the war of 1812, and other wars, from the date of their disability, under contracts made with them by the Government when they entered the service. And whether a revision of the tariff, with a view to sufficient revenue to meet all the necessary wants of the Government, is not imperiously demanded by the present state of the national finances; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise, as early as practicable, to the end that action in the premises may be had during the present session of Congress.

Objection was made.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution, amendatory of an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856, so far as it relates to acts as shall die during their term of service.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object; and call for the regular order of business.

TEXAS BOUNDARY SURVEY.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table a bill which passed the House, and passed the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the regular order of business.

Mr. REAGAN. It will not take more than a minute or two to dispose of it. It is a bill in reference to a commission for running the boundary line of Texas. If the commissioners do not get into the field early, they will not get through before winter. It is an important amendment, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. Objection was not withdrawn.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the amendments reported back from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on House bill No. 200, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1859; and suggested that the amendments would be reported, and that separate votes would be had on such as a separate vote would be demanded on; and that a vote should be taken on the remainder of the amendments as a whole.

First amendment:

After line eighty-one, insert as follows:
For the purchase of Holmes's life-boats, to be placed on each of the twenty-eight life-saving stations on the coast of New Jersey, $6,440.

And for the purchase of the best life-boat, to be approved by the Department, for use on the coast of Long Island, $10,000.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask for a separate vote.

The question was taken; and there were, on a division—ayes 99, noes 50.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Second amendment:

After the following clause:
"For collection of agricultural statistics, investigations for promoting agriculture and rural economy, and the procurement and distribution of cuttings and seeds, $60,000."

—insert the following proviso:
Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Patents to submit to the Secretary of the Treasury, at the commencement of each session of Congress, the invoices of seeds and cuttings purchased with the money hereby appropriated, and also a statement of the expenses in procuring agricultural statistics, and the incidental expenses in procuring seeds, cuttings, and information: And provided also, That no salary or compensation to any person for services in collecting or distributing seeds, cuttings, &c., shall be paid out of this appropriation.

Mr. SEWARD. I put it in the name of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL.] The matter is properly under the control of the Secretary of the Interior; and I ask the unanimous consent of the House to substitute the Secretary of the Interior for the Secretary of the Treasury. There being no objection; the modification was made.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman who introduced this proposition, whether he supposes that the whole $60,000 will be appropriated for the purchase of seeds and cuttings at their first cost?

Mr. RITCHIE. Debate is not in order; and I object to it.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Is it not competent to have a separate vote on the two provisions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that there is only one proviso; and, at any rate, it would not be in order to divide the amendment, as it is reported as a whole.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to—ayes 113, noes not counted.

Mr. LETCHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Fourth amendment:

Page 6, line one hundred and thirty-four, before the word "report," insert "mechanical," so that the paragraph will read:

For drawings to illustrate the mechanical report of the Commissioner of Patents for the year 1858, $6,000.

Mr. WOODSON. I ask for a separate vote on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sixth amendment:

Page 8, line one hundred and eighty two, strike out "thirty-three," and insert "forty-three;" so that the paragraph will read:

For lighting the President's House and Capitol, the public grounds around them and around the executive offices, and Pennsylvania avenue, and Bridge and High streets, in Georgetown, $43,000.

Mr. KILGORE. I ask a separate vote on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Ninth amendment:

Page 9, strike out lines one hundred and eighty-eight and eighty-nine, as follows:

"For repairs of Pennsylvania avenue, $3,000."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask for a separate vote on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Tenth amendment:

Page 9, strike out the lines two hundred and four, two hundred and five, two hundred and six, and two hundred and seven, as follows:

"For completing the west wing of the Patent Office building, siting up the southwest corner of the square, setting the curb, and raising Ninth street in front of the building, to its proper grade, $50,000."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask for a separate vote on that amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Eleventh amendment:

Strike out from line two hundred and fifteen to line two hundred and twenty-four, inclusive, as follows:

"For the completion of the Washington aqueduct, $800,000; and, in addition thereto, so much of the appropriation of $250,000 for paying existing liabilities for the Washington aqueduct, and preserving the work already done from injury," contained in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1857," approved 18th August, 1856, as may not be required for said purposes."

Mr. STANTON moved to amend, by adding as follows:

Provided, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended until contracts shall be entered into with responsible parties for the completion of the work, which in the aggregate shall not exceed the amount hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DEAN. I demand the yeas and nays upon the proposition to strike out.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and resulted—yeas 95, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Atkins, Avery, Blair, Branch, Buffinton, Burnett, Caruthers, Case, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clawson, Cobb, Colfax, Covode, Cox, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dowdell, Edmundson, Farnsworth, Fenton, Gilman, Gooch, Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Leiter, MacLay, Maynard, Miles, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phillips, Pottle, Quitman, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Roberts, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Searing, Seward, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Underwood, Ward, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—97.

So the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended, was not agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. UNDERWOOD said: I should be very glad to assign reasons why I shall change my vote, but it is not in order. I should be very glad to say that I am a friend of the water works, and should be very glad to see them completed. The reason why I voted in the affirmative was, because I thought injustice had been done to the other sections of the country. I shall, however, now change my vote, and vote against striking out the appropriation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to this debate, unless those on the other side are permitted to assign reasons for voting in the affirmative.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know it is not in order. I change my vote, and vote "no."

Mr. QUITMAN. For the same considerations which the gentleman has stated, I vote "no."

Mr. SINGLETON. I voted in the Thirty-Second Congress against commencing this work. But since it has been commenced, and has got to be completed, I change my vote, and vote "no."

Mr. PHELPS (who was not within the bar when his name was called) asked leave to vote.

Mr. DEAN. I object.

Mr. PHELPS. If I had been within the bar when my name was called, I should have voted to keep the appropriation in this bill.

Mr. KELSEY. I desire to state that I am paired off, until four o'clock, with Mr. DEWART. [Cries of "Announce the vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The vote is a very close one, and the Clerk is reviewing it before the result is announced.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it very certain that there have been changes enough to defeat the amendment? I take it for granted the Clerk will not get ready to announce the vote until there have been changes enough to reach that result.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not seen the report of the Clerk.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I am a friend of this work; but as so much injustice is done to public works in other sections of the country, I cannot consent to discriminate in favor of Washington city. I therefore change my vote, and vote "ay."

Mr. GILMAN. I concur entirely with the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the reasons he has assigned, and change my vote from "no" to "ay."

Mr. GILMER. For the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Maine, I change my vote, and vote "no." [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIT. I change my vote from "no" to "ay."

Mr. ENGLISH. To neutralize the vote of my colleague, I change my vote from "ay" to "no."

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to strike out the paragraph, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GOODE withdrew the motion to reconsider.

Twelfth amendment:

Strike out line two hundred and twenty five, as follows: "For United States Capitol extension, $1,000,000."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask for a separate vote upon that amendment, and call for the yeas and nays upon its adoption.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hear the paragraph as read. My recollection is that the committee amended the paragraph before striking out, and that the words as read are not those stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The only report from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, is that the paragraph which has been read be stricken out. The paragraph was amended in committee and then stricken out, and the only report which could be presented from the committee would be to strike out the original paragraph in the bill. The friends of the paragraph had the right to amend it, to make it as perfect as possible. But if, after all, they agreed to strike out the paragraph as amended, the only report to the House would be on striking out the original words in the bill.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I understand that the text which was stricken out in committee is not that which has been reported here. The text which was stricken out contained a proviso; and the question, as I understand it, now comes up in the House to strike out just what was stricken out in committee.

The SPEAKER. The only report which could be made to the House would be, to strike out the original clause in the bill.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. What becomes of the amendment which was agreed to in committee?

The SPEAKER. The original paragraph, in spite of the efforts of its friends to perfect it, was stricken out.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The paragraph, as amended, was stricken out.

The SPEAKER. But the recommendation to strike out the original paragraph was the only report which could come to the House.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bococek, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Campbell, Caruthers, Case, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clawson, Cobb, Colfax, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, English, Farnsworth, Garnett, Garrett, Gilmer, Gooch, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hill, Hopkins, Howard, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leiter, Leitcher, Lovejoy, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Pendleton, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Royce, Ruffin, Seales, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stevenson, William Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, Wilson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Barksdale, Bishop, Bowie, Burlingame, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Cleinens, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, Corning, Crawford, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dick, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, Eustis, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gillis, Gilman, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Hoard, Horton, Hughes, Huyler, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, MacLay, Matteson, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Morrill, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Parker, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Searing, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Ward, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, and Augustus R. Wright—84.

So the paragraph was stricken out.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. LOVEJOY stated that Mr. LEACH was detained at his room by sickness.

Mr. HILL. For reasons given to me by some gentlemen who seem to know that this Capitol building would not suffer by delay, and that a less sum would do as well at present, I vote "ay."

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved that the vote by which the paragraph was stricken out be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon all the amendments in gross which were reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and upon which a separate vote had not been asked; and they were agreed to.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker—

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire if the vote by which the water-works appropriation was agreed to has been reconsidered?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. ANDREWS. Then I make that motion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS] has risen to a motion to reconsider, and he cannot be superseded by another privileged question at the same time.

The SPEAKER. The House has passed from that stage of the bill where the motion would be in order.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The gentleman from New York rose and addressed the Chair before the bill was ordered to be read a third time, and endeavored to present his privileged motion. If his voice did not reach the Speaker it was not the gentleman's fault. He submitted a privileged motion, in the hearing of us here, in regard to the Washington aqueduct—a motion which he has a right to make.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York rose in his place, after the bill was ordered to a third reading and after it was read the third time, and was recognized. Of course the Chair would have recognized him if the Chair had been informed that he rose to a privileged question previous to that time.

Mr. ANDREWS. I rose and so stated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman so stated after the bill was read a third time, and not before.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The gentleman rose in his place to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that such was his purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The gentleman so stated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not so state until after the bill was read a third time.

Mr. ANDREWS. I rose but did not make the statement at that time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood it. The Chair thinks the application comes too late. If the gentleman had stated that he rose to a privileged question, it would perhaps have arrested the ear of the Chair.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to lay the bill upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ail, Arnold, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bliss, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burns, Caruthers, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Cockerill, Comins, Corning, Cox, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edie, Edmundson, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence IV. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Horton, Jackson, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, MacLay, Samuel S. Marshall, Matteson, Miller, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Quitman, Reagan, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Searling, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Underwood, Ward, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Atkins, Bennett,

Bingham, Blair, Branch, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Chaffee, Clemens, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Fenton, Garnett, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hoard, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricard, Royce, Ruffin, Scales, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, Wilson, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—80.

So the bill was passed.

Pending the call,

Mr. WOODSON stated that his colleague, Mr. ANDERSON, was not well, and had gone home.

Mr. CASE stated that he had paired off with Mr. HUGHES, who would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was not agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to what I suppose to be a question of privilege. The House will remember that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] made some remarks yesterday, of which I took some notice. In looking over the Congressional Globe, which purports to contain a report of the official proceedings of this House, I find a paragraph in that gentleman's speech which places me in the light of having omitted to notice that which is particularly offensive. I desire to read the paragraph which has been introduced into the gentleman's speech; and I do it for the benefit of the reporters, as well as for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois, and as an excuse to my constituents for myself. If it had been uttered, most assuredly I should have noticed his speech in a different style from what I did. It is as follows:

"The picture of Putnam would have been very well in the committee room of Revolutionary Chaius, but has no significance where it is, as it is a revolutionary reminiscence. In the place of this should have been the picture of a western plow, with its polished steel mold board, with the hardy yeoman, with one hand resting on the plow-handle, and with the other holding a span of bays, with arched neck and neatly-trimmed harness. Pictures are symbols of ideas, and this would have told to the future the present mode of culture of free labor. At the opposite end, in the place of Cincinnatus and his plow, (the plow of two thousand-years ago,) there should have been a negro slave, with untidy clothing, with slouching gait, shuffling along by the side of a mule team, with ragged harness and rope traces, drawing a barrel of water on the forks of a tree. This would represent the idea of slave labor. Thus we should have a symbol of the two systems of labor now struggling for the ascendancy."

Sir, it is only necessary for me to say to you, to this House, and to the country, that there is not one word of truth in this statement. I mean that there is not one word of truth in it, for the reason that no such remarks were made upon this floor.

MINNESOTA MEMBERS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I gave notice, yesterday, that I would to-day call up the contested-election case from Ohio. Before I do that, however, I wish to present a report from the Committee of Elections on the Minnesota case.

I present to the House a report from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred, under the instructions of the House, the credentials of the members claiming seats in this House from the State of Minnesota. I ask that the report and the accompanying resolution be read. If there be no objection, and unless gentlemen desire that the report shall be printed and laid over for future consideration, I desire to have the matter disposed of now. I do not, however, urge it if it is desired to have the report printed. The minority, I understand, do not agree, and probably there will be two minority reports embracing the views of the two divisions of the minority. I now present the report of the majority.

Mr. GILMER. I ask the indulgence of the House to present and have printed the views of a portion of the minority of the committee. I will state to the House that this is a novel case, and I do not think that the House can act intelligibly upon it, until these reports have been printed and read by members.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I have not been able to agree in all the reasoning contained in the report of the gentleman from North Carolina, although our conclusion is the same, and I desire to submit my views that they may take the same course as the other reports.

The following resolution, reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections, was then read:

Resolved, That W. W. Phelps and James M. Cavanaugh, claiming seats as members of this House from the State of Minnesota, be admitted and sworn as such: Provided, That such admission and qualification shall not be construed as precluding any contests of their right to seats which may be hereafter instituted by any persons having the right so to do.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. As the gentleman from North Carolina desires that the views of those on the committee whom he represents shall be printed, I will not press my motion to call up the subject now.

Mr. GILMER. All I desire is that the gentleman shall fix some day for the consideration of the case.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope this question will be disposed of now. The reports are not voluminous. The questions involved are simple, and I suppose that upon the reading of the reports the House could readily come to a conclusion. Minnesota now presents the singular spectacle of a State represented at one end of the Capitol and not represented at the other. Four fifths of the session are already passed. This State has been admitted into the Union for ten days, and has no Representative upon this floor. The reports are not long. The main question presented in the reports has been discussed elaborately in the past political history of the country, and has been the subject of the intellectual exercises of some of the first men of the nation. The points involved in the reports of the gentlemen on the other side, have been already settled by the past action of this body, and I am satisfied that the House could arrive at a correct conclusion in the case without a postponement of it. I think the House owes it as an act of justice to the State of Minnesota, either to admit these gentlemen or to reject them. I move that the subject be taken up, and the reports read; and on that I move the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw the previous question for a moment to enable me to say a word or two.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would withdraw it, but if the report is taken up, the gentleman will have plenty of time to express his views on the question. I therefore decline to withdraw it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to ask whether, if the previous question is sustained, it will not bring us to vote on the resolution before the reports have been printed or even read? And this is one of the most important questions that has ever been brought before Congress.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Maine—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. GILMER. I hope the previous question will not be sustained.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for tellers on seconding the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to ask the Chair whether, if the previous question be sustained, the reports in this case can be read without unanimous consent?

Mr. STEVENSON. My motion is that they be read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. If the previous question be seconded, the reports cannot be read if any member of the House objects.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BURNINGTON, and WRIGHT of Georgia, were appointed.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Can the reports be read if the previous question is seconded?

Mr. GROW. Of course not; a report is in the nature of an argument.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 93.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 97, nays 102; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ail, Arnold, Atkins, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James

Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Macley, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—97.

YAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Garnett, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Millson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Zollicoffer—102.

So the main question was not ordered to be now put.

Pending the call of the roll,
Mr. FLORENCE stated that his colleague, Mr. DIMMICK, had left the Hall in consequence of indisposition, and had paired off with Mr. EDIE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to what I suppose to be a question of privilege. This question, of course, goes over until to-morrow. I wish to have the reports printed.

Mr. SHORTER. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the main question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to know what will be the effect of the motion to reconsider? Will not the second of the previous question stand, and the subject go over until to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. If the motion fails?
Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. No, sir; if the vote is carried, and the vote refusing to order the main question is reconsidered, will not the subject still go over until to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table should prevail, such would be the result.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. But suppose the vote ordering the main question should be reconsidered: what would be the result?

The SPEAKER. The question will recur, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a question of order. As I have never before known a vote refusing to order the main question to be reconsidered, I ask whether it is a parliamentary motion, inasmuch as a demand for the previous question is like a motion to adjourn, which can be repeated indefinitely, and is not subject to be reconsidered at all?

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia. Under the rules of the House it is in order to reconsider any vote taken by the House, and as much a vote refusing to order the main question as a vote ordering the main question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. And it has been a very frequent practice of the House to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be put, when we have reconsidered the vote by which a bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MILLSON. There is no doubt as to the power to reconsider a vote ordering the main question; but I have never known a vote refusing to order the main question to be reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia will perceive that the reason of the rule applies as well where the House has refused to order the main question, as where the vote has been carried in the affirmative. The object is to give the House another opportunity of deciding upon the question, in consequence of the change of votes, or of a fuller House. The reason of the rule applies just as well when the House has refused to order the main question, as where the main question has been ordered.

Mr. MILLSON. May not the demand for the previous question be renewed at any time?

The SPEAKER. That would leave the House in the same position.

Mr. STANTON. As the matter now stands, the House having refused to order the main question, would it not be in order at any subsequent stage of the proceedings to demand the previous question?

The SPEAKER. If the House should refuse to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the main question to be put, the subject would go over until to-morrow.

Mr. STANTON. But when the subject again comes up, it will then be in order to demand the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. The decision of the Chair is clearly right. I ask for the vote.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 96, nays 104; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Foster, Garnett, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Granger, Grow, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Millson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Zollicoffer—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Boeck, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskie, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochran, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Macley, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Moore, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Stephens, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—104.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. MILES stated that his colleague, Mr. BONHAM, was still detained from the House by indisposition in his family.

Mr. NIBLACK stated that he had paired off with Mr. GOODWIN.

Mr. READY stated that he had paired off with Mr. McQUEEN, who was detained from the House in consequence of illness in his family.

Mr. HATCH stated that he had voted; but in consequence of an understanding with Mr. BENNETT, who was not now in the House, he should ask leave to withdraw his vote.

No objection was made.

The question then recurred on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 101; nays 96, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Boeck, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochran, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Macley, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Moore, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Rufin, Sandidge, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sikes, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bliss, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Garnett, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Granger, Grow, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Millson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Olin, Parker, Pettit, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Woodson, and Zollicoffer—96.

So the vote by which the House refused to order the main question was reconsidered.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. POTTLE stated that Mr. BURROUGHS had paired off upon all political questions with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. RUSSELL. I paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BURROUGHS] upon all political questions. There seems to be a difference of opinion as to whether this is a political question or not. I ask leave to withdraw my vote.

No objection was made.

Mr. WOODSON. I am prepared to vote for having the Minnesota members sworn in, but I desire to have the reports read. I therefore vote "no."

The question recurred on ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask that the reports of the majority and minority of the committee be read.

Mr. STANTON. Would it be in order for the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] to withdraw the call for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the matter has gone out of the control of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. STANTON. Would it be in order to reconsider the vote seconding the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. STANTON. Well, I hope this matter will be postponed until Saturday, and that these reports may be printed. [Cries of "No!" "No!" on the Democratic side of the House.] Very well; these men cannot be sworn in to-day by daylight.

Mr. STEVENSON. I had no intention to prevent the reports from being read. I ask that they may be read.

Mr. STANTON. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I hope there will be no objection to the reports being read.

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Is it not in order now to move to reconsider the vote seconding the previous question? If it is, I submit it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it is not in order. The practice of the House has been different with reference to that question. The motion has sometimes been entertained, and sometimes it has not. The main proposition is upon ordering the main question to be put; and pending that, the gentleman from Kentucky asks that the reports may be read.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The House has ordered the main question to be put.

Mr. STANTON. No, sir; that motion is pending.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I suppose that the gentleman from Georgia is in error, and that, on the contrary, the House has not ordered the main question; on the contrary, it refused to order it; and that vote has just been reconsidered. I suppose we are now exactly in the position we were the moment after the previous question was seconded. If so, I now submit a motion to reconsider that vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules the motion of the gentleman from Maryland out of order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CLEMENS. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I demand the yeas and nays on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules the motion out of order, because the rules provide expressly, where the previous question has been seconded, and the main question is not ordered, what disposition shall be made of the substantive matter, namely, that it shall go over until the next day. The practice has been different as to what particular condition the subject-matter comes up in the next day. In some instances it has been held that it comes up clear of the second, and in others that the second still operates. The Chair is of opinion that the safer and more correct practice is to rule that the question comes up the next day free from the second of the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not profess to be much of a parliamentarian, and therefore do not speak with confidence upon a question of this kind; but the rule, as I understand it, says that when the previous question—

Mr. CLEMENS. I rise to a question of order. This debate is out of order, and I object to it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will not object.

Mr. CLEMENS. I do object.

Mr. GROW. Does the Speaker hold that when a question has been passed upon by the House it cannot be reconsidered?

The SPEAKER. There are some questions which cannot be reconsidered, though a great majority of questions can. The Chair is of opinion that this is one of the questions which cannot be reconsidered, because the rules provide expressly what shall be the event if the main question is not ordered. The reason is this, that the seconding the demand for the previous question cannot, under our rules, be considered a vote. Under the parliamentary law of England, whence most of our rules were derived, it was only necessary that a single person should second the demand. Our rules have changed that, and provide that it shall require a majority, instead of one individual.

Mr. GROW. Then the Chair holds that the vote seconding the previous question cannot be reconsidered?

The SPEAKER. The practice which prevailed at the time the Speaker first became a member of the House, was that when the main question was ordered to be put, and that vote was reconsidered, it operated as a waiver of the second of the previous question, and that was the practice pursued until the beginning of the last Congress.

Mr. COLFAX. I ask that the 56th rule may be read, and I wish to call the Speaker's particular attention to the fact that it does not refer to any particular question. The language is broad and specific.

The Clerk commenced reading the rule, as follows:

"When a majority has been once made"—

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will read the rule closely, he will find that the word "majority" is a misprint, and that it should be "motion." It is corrected in the text.

The rule was then read, as follows:

"56. When a motion has been once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move a reconsideration thereof, on the same or succeeding day, and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions, except a motion to adjourn, and shall not be withdrawn after the said succeeding day, without the consent of the House; and thereafter any member may call it up for consideration."

Mr. COLFAX. The change of the word "majority" into "motion" only makes the point stronger, for the 45th rule reads as follows:

"When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely," &c.

This rule recognizes the seconding the previous question as a motion, and the 56th rule says that when a motion, &c. I therefore submit that the motion to reconsider is in order.

The SPEAKER. Could the gentleman have the yeas and nays taken upon seconding the previous question?

Mr. COLFAX. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Why not, if it is a motion?

Mr. COLFAX. I am putting questions to the Chair, and not answering questions. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I would inquire of the Chair whether the appeal at this stage is debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HUGHES. A motion has been made to lay the appeal on the table; and I insist that the motion shall be put.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 81, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Gilman, Reagan, Ruffin, Sandidge, Scales, Scott, Scaring, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Ward, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcofer—112.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kilgore, Knapp, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Rufin, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Ward, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, and John V. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—81.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

Pending the call,

Mr. MORGAN said: Will it be in order to have the reports sent to the Printer, because we propose to remain here until it is printed.

The result being announced as above recorded, The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks that the reports be read.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STANTON called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I now desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky—

Mr. BURNETT. I object to any discussion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I hope the gentleman will indulge me. I only wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if, by unanimous consent, we cannot postpone this matter until Saturday, and—

Mr. BURNETT. Debate is not in order, and I object to discussion.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 73, nays 104; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Burlingame, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Covode, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Grow, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Miles, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Potter, Pottle, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Talbot, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Augustus R. Wright—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Chaffee, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dick, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Granger, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Millson, Moore, Mott, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Roberts, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Ward, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—104.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the call, Mr. LETCHER said: As it has been announced upon the other side of the House that no vote can be taken to-day, I vote "ay."

Mr. GROW. That is so, unless the reports be printed.

Mr. TALBOT. Satisfied that we cannot do anything to-day, I vote in the affirmative.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I generally vote against adjournment, but I will vote in the affirmative now.

The vote was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire, in all good faith, to renew my proposition to the gentleman from Kentucky. It is quite apparent that we are not likely to get to a vote this evening; it is possible we may not get one to-morrow; and I ask that, by unanimous consent, we postpone it until Saturday, ["No!" "No!"] and that the vote be then taken; and, in the mean time, the report be printed, in order that gentlemen may know what the report is.

Mr. GROW. Was there any objection to postponing till Saturday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard objections on the right.

Mr. GROW. Then I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Saturday; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask to be excused from voting on that motion.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It is perfectly palpable that we will do nothing to-day; I therefore move that the House do now (half past three, p. m.) adjourn.

Mr. HOARD. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether it is competent to entertain the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN] to be excused from voting on a proposition to adjourn over. The gentleman will perceive that if that motion were made by every gentleman on the floor, the House would put itself in a position that it never could adjourn, inasmuch as a motion to adjourn over takes precedence of a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The same question was raised at our famous night session, and I then called the attention of the Chair to the difficulty of cumulating these motions on each other; but the Chair decided that they were in order.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the gentleman from Ohio is doubtless correct. The Chair is of opinion that if he decided so then he decided wrong. If the gentleman from New York desires to be excused from voting, he can just as well be excused on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. As the House has already decided that question once, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask to be excused from voting on that appeal; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORGAN. I also ask to be excused from voting on that question; and ask the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER. What became of the motion to adjourn over?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is holding it in abeyance. [Laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. How can it ever come back if the House decide to adjourn?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Does not the motion to adjourn over take precedence of the motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. Ordinarily it does.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bingham, Bliss, Burlingame, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Eustis, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goode, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Hatch, Hawkins, Horton, Howard, George W. Jones, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Maclay, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Millson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Potter, Pottle, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Talbot, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippe, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Augustus R. Wright—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton, Davis, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Craig of Mississippi, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, Elliott, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Miles, Miller, Isaac N. Morris, Pendleton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Purviance, Ready, Roberts, Ruffin, Savage, Seales, Scott, Shorter, Robert Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, White, Whiteley, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—77.

So the motion was agreed to.

Pending the vote,

Mr. BLAIR stated that he had paired off with Mr. PEYTON.

Mr. COMINS. If the House refuse to adjourn, what will be the pending question?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I object to debate.

Mr. COMINS. How am I to tell how to vote?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Find out.

Mr. COMINS. I vote "no."

Mr. COVODE stated that he had paired off with Mr. BRANCH till six o'clock.

Mr. COMINS. Having ascertained that if the House refuse to adjourn, the pending question will be to excuse the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN] from voting on the motion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN,] that he be excused from voting on the appeal made by the gentleman from Ohio from a decision of the Chair, which decision is contrary to several former decisions under similar circumstances, I vote "ay."

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. If the House adjourn now, what will be the business in order to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. This matter will come up first.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Are the private bills to be superseded by this?

The SPEAKER. This is a question of privilege.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I vote "ay."

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I propose, before the vote is announced, that by the unanimous consent of the House, the reports be ordered to be printed.

Mr. GROW. And go over till Saturday.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I would like to know whether that is with the understanding as to the time at which the votes are to be taken?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Not at all.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection comes too late.

And then (at ten minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 21, 1858.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to the alteration of arms of the United States now on hand into breech-loading arms; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, the report of Lieutenant T. A. Craven, of the Navy, of his exploration as to the practicability of inter-oceanic communication from the Gulf of Darien to the Pacific ocean, by the Atrato and Truando rivers; which, on motion of Mr. MALLORY, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him, to print the report, and that two thousand additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to the present condition of the new custom-house at New Orleans; which, on motion of Mr. SLIDELL, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MILITARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. IVERSON was, on his motion, excused from further service on the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, and Mr. HAYNE was appointed to supply the vacancy.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of Taylor county, Iowa, praying the enactment of a law for the relief of settlers who may suffer by the closing of the land offices in that State to enable the railroad company to make their surveys and selections; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented papers in relation to the claim of James Collier, late collector of the customs in Upper California, to certain money due him under a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of John H. Newell, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GREEN presented a petition of citizens of Warsaw, Illinois, remonstrating against a diversion of the lands appropriated for the improvement of the Des Moines river from that purpose; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of members of the board of marine surveyors of Philadelphia, praying the construction of a breakwater on Crow shoal in the Delaware bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RICE presented papers relative to the claim of Eugene Burnand, to compensation for translations made for the Legislative Assembly of Minnesota; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented papers in relation to the claim of John N. Dodgson, to indemnity for Indian depredations; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented papers in relation to the claim of Alexander Wood and George M. Wood, to indemnity for Indian depredations; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented papers in relation to the claim of Adam P. Shagley, to indemnity for Indian depredations; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented papers in relation to the claim of Alexander Wood, administrator of the estate of Josiah W. Stuart, to indemnity for Indian depredations; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BRODERICK, it was Ordered, That the petition of Charles Kohler, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of Samuel Bromberg, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred a presentment of the grand jury of the United States for the district of South Carolina, at Charleston, relative to a new court-house and the maintenance of prisoners at that place; a presentment of the grand jury of the United States district court at Greenville, South Carolina, recommending an appropriation for a new court-house, and the appointment of commissioners at suitable points within the jurisdiction of that court; a memorial of members of the bar of the northern district of Florida, praying that the salary of the United States judge of that district be made the same as that of the United States judge of the southern district; a presentment of the grand jury of the United States for the northern district of Florida relative to the necessity of a building for the accommodation of the United States courts in that district; and a resolution of the Legislature of Texas in favor of the erection of buildings for post offices and the use of the United States courts in that State, and also the establishment of another judicial district therein; reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Missouri, relative to a building for the United States courts and post office at Jefferson City, in that State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 17) to divide the State of Indiana into two judicial districts and to provide for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States therein, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 21) to divide the State of Iowa into two judicial districts, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 311) to supply vacancies in certain offices, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 222) for the relief of Elizabeth E. V. Fields, reported that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, the case being covered by the general bill passed yesterday.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 261) for the relief of Leonard Loomis, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment:

A bill (H. R. No. 426) for the relief of Monroe D. Downs;

A bill (H. R. No. 577) for the relief of Rebecca M. Bowden, of Prince George county, Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 578) for the relief of Isaac Drew and other settlers upon the public lands in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. BIGLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of Noah Miller, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill from the Court of Claims for the relief of Richard Fitzpatrick, communicated to the Senate the 14th of May, with the opinion of the court in favor of the claim, reported the bill (S. No. 193) for the relief of Richard Fitzpatrick; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 383) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of William Flemming, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 332) for the relief of Richard B. Alexander, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia; which was agreed to.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 260) for the relief of Isaac Carpenter, reported it without amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 256) for the relief of Oliver P. Hovey, reported it without amendment.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of Edson Fessenden, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 394) for the relief of Edson Fessenden, conservator of William Compton. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIXON. The bill just reported by the Senator from Florida is of a peculiar character, and I should be very glad indeed to obtain the unanimous consent of the Senate to put it upon its passage now. I think, if the Senate understood the circumstances, there would be no objection to it. It would have been reported by the late Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Evans,) if he had lived, and he made it an exception to his very great objection to any extension of patents. I hope there will be no objection to putting the bill on its passage.

Mr. KING. Is there a report in that case?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes, sir; a report which has been ordered to be printed.

Mr. KING. I think we had better wait until we can look into it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill cannot be considered to-day.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill entitled "An act to create a land district in the Territory of New Mexico;" and it was signed by the Vice President.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 391) authorizing the removal of the offices belonging to the United States, and occupied in the collection of the revenue in connection with the quarantine station in the port of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GREEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 379) to pay the Oregon and Washington war claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. BRIGHT, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 392) to continue the land office at Vincennes, Indiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

TEMPORARY CLERKS.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate of the United States be and he is hereby authorized to allow and pay to the temporary clerks employed in his office, the same rate of compensation as is paid to the clerks of the committees of the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That sixty thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Patents on agriculture, be printed for the use of the Senate.

BREECH-LOADING CANNON.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for an appropriation for testing Barrow's improved revolving breech-loading cannon.

SERVICE OF PROCESS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of a law authorizing the marshal of the western district of Arkansas to employ assistants and guards, in serving process in the Indian country.

POST ROUTES IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. RICE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing the following post routes in the State of Minnesota: from Owatonna, in Steele county, via Clear Lake and Joseo, to Mankato, in Blue Earth county; from Austin, in Mercer county, via Geneva, Berlin, Otisco, Wilton, and Joseo, to St. Peters, in Nicollet county; from Austin to Blue Earth City; from Minneapolis, via Watertown and Winslow, to Breckinridge, from Mount Vernon to White Water Falls; from Faribault, via Swavery and Joseo, to Mankato; from Clear Lake, in Sherburne county, via Fairhaven and Kingston, to Forest City; from Geneva, in Freeborn county, via Freeborn City, in Faribault county; from Shakopee to Buffalo and Monticello; from Swan River to Long Baine; from Elliott to Blue Earth City; from Blue Earth City to Fort Dodge, in Iowa; from New Ulm, via Tuttle's Farm, to Leavenworth; from Wabashaw, via Dodge City, to Medford; from Princeton, via Granite City, to Crow Wing; from Little Falls, via Granite City, Hanover, and Sterling, to Fortuna; from Little Falls, via Brothertown, to Sunrise City; from Warah, in Benton county, to St. Joseph, in Stearns county; from St. Cloud, via Brottenburg and Brunswick, to Fortuna; from Faribault, in Rice county, to Wilton, in Waseca county; from Gray Eagle, via Pine Creek, to Ridgway; from Rochester, via Salem, Ashland, and Somerset, to Wilton; from Fort Dodge, in Iowa, via Emmett City, thence to Odessa, in Minnesota, thence, via Ceresco, Crystal Lake City, to Mankato; from Long Prairie to Little Falls; from Columbus to Cambridge; and from Clear Spring, via Clear Water, to Forest City.

HOUSE COMMITTEE STENOGRAPHERS.

Mr. PEARCE. I have been directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the House joint resolution (No. 30) paying the compensation of stenographers employed by committees of the House of Representatives, to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. As these stenographers have accomplished their work, and are about to leave the city, it is very desirable that the House of Representatives should be enabled to pay them at once. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the compensation of stenographers allowed by committees of the House of Representatives, as audited under the direction of the House.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POSTMASTERS' QUARTERLY RETURNS.

Mr. YULEE. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives (No. 207) to prevent the inconvenient accumulation in the Post Office Department of postmasters' quarterly returns, have directed me to report the bill, with a recommendation that it be passed; and I am instructed to move that it be put on its passage now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It provides that the Postmaster General may, from time to time, in his discretion, dispose of any quarterly returns of mails sent or received, preserving the accounts current and all vouchers accompanying such accounts, and use such portions of the proceeds as may be necessary to defray the cost of separating and disposing of the same; with a proviso that the accounts shall be preserved entire at least two years.

Mr. KING. I will inquire of the chairman of that committee in what way he supposes these returns are to be disposed of?

Mr. YULEE. I suppose either by sale or destruction; probably by sale.

Mr. KING. I think they had better be destroyed rather than have them scattered about.

Mr. YULEE. They are of no possible value to any one. The accounts have all become obsolete; and it is stated by the Auditor that the accumulation now occupies eighteen rooms full, and they have no other place in which to put them without throwing the fuel for the Department out of doors. There was a former act on the subject.

Mr. COLLAMER. In 1854 there was a similar act, only not taking effect in the future, but disposing of those which had accumulated up to that time. I would inquire whether those rooms are filled with returns which have accumulated since that time?

Mr. YULEE. Yes, sir; since that time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. MASON. There was a resolution offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] a few days ago, requesting the Court of Claims to return the papers in the case of Alexander J. Atocha. I ask that it may be taken up.

Mr. IVERSON. This is the day set apart by resolution for the consideration of the Private Calendar. I have no objection to allowing reports and petitions to come in, but I must object to anything being taken up out of its order, and to the introduction of any resolution that will give rise to debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the morning business be through with, the Private Calendar must be taken up.

Mr. HALE. I must make one appeal to the Senate. I hold in my hand a bill for the relief of Major Kendrick, and I will occupy about three minutes in stating what it is. I ask the Senate to take it up. Major Kendrick was an officer of the Mexican war—

Mr. COLLAMER. I rise to a question of order. I understood the Chair to decide that nothing but the Private Calendar was in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair decided that it was his duty to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this day has been set apart for the Private Calendar. The Senate, however, can do anything by unanimous consent. If the Senator from Vermont objects to the Senator from New Hampshire going on, he is not in order.

Mr. IVERSON. If the Senator from Vermont does not object, I must feel it my duty to object.

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone the prior orders for the purpose of taking up that bill, if that motion is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. HALE. If the Senate will give me their attention for a minute I think they will agree to this motion. In 1848, when our Army was leaving Mexico, Major Kendrick had charge of a train, and while it was in his charge one of the wagons of specie was robbed of $1,296. The accounting officers say they are satisfied it was robbed without any negligence or any default on his part, of any sort whatever; but still they cannot help charging it to him. That is the report of the Comptroller, which has been transmitted to Congress, and it is now ten years ago since the transaction occurred. The Military Committee of the House of Representatives and of the Senate have unanimously reported that he ought to be relieved. This faithful officer stands charged with money of which he was robbed, without any carelessness, without any fault of his. The House have passed the bill, and the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate unanimously recommend its passage. If it be put at the end of the Calendar, it will never be reached. I move that the prior orders be postponed for the purpose of taking it up.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are several cases, one case at least that I have reported, and one or two others that I have charge of, which are quite as pressing as that, and which have been on the Calendar for some time. That bill was only reported yesterday. I object to taking it up out of order.

Mr. POLK. I wish to state that there are several other cases on the Calendar, which are, I have no doubt, as meritorious, and the circumstances of which are almost exactly the same as those of the case pressed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. IVERSON. I trust that the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire will not be sustained by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw it.

Mr. IVERSON. We had better go on with the Private Calendar, in regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yesterday, the Private Calendar was progressed with by calling those cases that did not lead to debate. If it is the pleasure of the Senate, the Chair will continue the call of those bills that do not lead to debate.

Mr. IVERSON. The rule is to take up the Calendar in its order. The course pursued yesterday was merely a temporary departure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the cases not objected to will be gone through with. It will take but a little time to dispose of them.

Mr. IVERSON. I will state why I object to that. This is the only day, probably, that the Senate will give to the consideration of the Private Calendar if we adjourn on the 7th of June; and it is proper that the cases should be taken up in their order. We can in the morning hour, hereafter, take up those cases which are not objected to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will take but a short time to go through with those cases that are not objected to, and we may do good to persons whose cases will not otherwise be reached.

Mr. IVERSON. It will take the whole day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all.

Mr. IVERSON. I yield to what seems to be the disposition of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calling of the Calendar will be commenced at the point we left off yesterday morning, and only those bills will be considered which are not objected to or do not give rise to debate.

CHARLES PORTERFIELD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 203) for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Porterfield, deceased.

It proposes to require the Secretary of the Interior to issue to William Kinney and Thomas J. Michie, executors of the last will and testament of Robert Porterfield, deceased, a number of warrants, equal to six thousand one hundred and thirty-three acres of land, according to the usual subdivisions of the public surveys, in quantity not less than forty acres; to be by them located on any of the public lands which have been or may be surveyed, and which have not been otherwise appropriated at the time of such location, within any of the States or Territories of the United States, where the minimum price shall not exceed the sum of $1 25 per acre, to be appropriated according to the directions contained in the last will and testament of Robert Porterfield, in the same manner and for the purposes directed in regard to the lands which were lost by the legal representatives in the action with Clark and others, as decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. STUART. My recollection is, that an amendment was proposed to that bill the other day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. An amendment was proposed and agreed to. The amendment was in line ten, after the words "public lands" to insert "subject to private entry at $1 25 an acre."

Mr. STUART. I think I ought to say to the Senate a word or two in regard to the bill, as I understand it. I have had a good deal of conversation with gentlemen who are interested in it, and I understand that, by the existing law, the persons interested in this case can enter now, without further legislation, any land which is subject to private entry, so that the passage of the bill in its present shape would not change their rights at all. They wanted authority to locate upon any of the Government land, so that they might go in advance of the settlements, and take their choice—

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order. The order of the Senate is, that we shall proceed with the consideration of bills that do not give rise to debate. If this is to be debated, I object to its consideration.

Mr. STUART. I beg pardon of the Senate. I was out at the time, and did not know of the order of the Senate. I am not disposed to debate the bill. I am only stating that, as the bill stands, I have no objection to it; but it does not amount to anything.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the bill is objected to, it must lie over.

Mr. STUART. I have no objection to the bill in its present shape.

SUSANNAH HAYNE PINCKNEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 205) for the relief of Susannah Hayne Pinckney, sole heir of Captain Richard Shubrick.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe that is the same bill that was fully discussed here before. I object to it.

The bill was passed over.

JOHN HASTINGS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 207) for the relief of John Hastings, collector of the port of Pittsburgh.

Mr. CAMERON. That bill will require discussion. I shall have something to say on it.

The bill was passed over.

JOSEPH C. G. KENNEDY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 209) for the relief of Joseph C. G. Kennedy.

Mr. STUART. I object to that bill; and if the next one is, as I remember it, of a kindred character, I object to that also.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Michigan that the next bill relates to his compensation as secretary of the census board.

Mr. STUART. Then I do not care about that.

The bill (S. No. 212) for the relief of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It will be a direction to the accounting officers, in the settlement of the accounts of J. C. G. Kennedy, late secretary of the census board, and superintending clerk of the census, to allow him at the rate of $3,000 per annum, in full compensation for all services rendered by him in either or both capacities.

Mr. KING. Is there a report in that case? If there is, I should like to hear it read.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator from New York that this bill makes no appropriation of money. It is merely for the settlement of his accounts.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. SIMMONS on the 24th of March:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, in relation to his compensation as superintending clerk of the census, report:

This claim was fully examined by the Senate Committee on Claims of the last Congress, and upon a review of the case this committee concur in the report then made, which is hereto annexed as a part of this report:

"In the Senate of the United States, January 29, 1857.

Mr. Geyer made the following report, (to accompany bill S. 510.)

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, report:

"The census board was constituted by act of 3d March, 1849, with the power to appoint a secretary, but without fixing his compensation. (9 Statute, 403.) Mr. Kennedy was appointed secretary. The twentieth section of the act of May 23, 1850, authorized the allowance to the secretary of the census board of a salary of $3,000 per annum 'during the period he has been in their employ.' (9 Statute, 432.) The nineteenth section of the same act provided for the appointment of a superintending clerk of the census at a salary of $2,500 per annum. This appointment was also conferred upon Mr. Kennedy, and accepted by him. But as the census board was not dissolved, and as he still continued to act as its secretary, he continued to claim the salary of $3,000, which the Comptroller of the Treasury refused to allow, on the ground that the office of secretary to the census board was superseded by that of superintending clerk of the census.

"In order to settle the question thus raised, the Secretary of the Interior addressed a communication to the census board, inquiring whether they regarded their labors as ended and their secretary discharged from his duties; to which the board responded that they did not consider the census board as dissolved, or Mr. Kennedy, its secretary, discharged from duty. This correspondence occurred in September, 1851, and would seem to show that Mr. Kennedy was still performing the duties of secretary of the census board, for at least sixteen months after his entering upon the duties of superintending clerk, and according to usage was entitled to the higher salary applicable to either of the two offices which he filled.

"But in consequence of the continued objection of the Comptroller, the Secretary of the Interior, in March, 1852, addressed a note to the chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, suggesting the introduction of a clause into the supplementary census bill, then pending, fixing the salary, for the performance of both duties, at $3,000.

"With a view, it is presumed, of accomplishing the object desired by the Secretary, a clause was introduced into the supplementary bill 'that the twentieth section of the said act [of 23d May, 1850] be amended by striking out the words 'has been' from the last line, and inserting the words 'may necessarily be' in lieu thereof.' It will be perceived that the effect of this amendment was to provide for the payment of the salary of $3,000 to the secretary of the census board during the time he may necessarily be in their employ, instead of during the time he has been in their employ, as provided in the original act.

"At the commencement of the next session of Congress, it was represented to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate that the above amendment of the act of 1850 might enable the memorialist to claim and receive the two salaries of secretary of the census board and of superintending clerk, amounting to $5,500 per annum. This led to the adoption of the joint resolution of 23d December, 1852, which had the effect not only to repeal the above amendment to the act of 1850, but to provide that the act should 'be so construed that no allowance as compensation be made to any person for constructive or any other service rendered as secretary to the census board, after the 1st day of June, 1850.'—10 Statutes, 280.

"In reference to this resolution, Mr. Downs stated in the Senate that Mr. Kennedy was 'claiming nothing more than the salary of $3,000, to which he is entitled, and to which he was entitled.' (Congressional Globe, vol. 24, part 3, p. 2226.) And Mr. Meade, of Virginia, in the House of Representatives, said: 'As well as I can recollect, there was an error committed, by which the superintending clerk of the census might, by the strict letter of that bill, draw his pay both as clerk of the census board and superintending clerk of the census. When the Senate became aware of this mistake, they sent down to us this joint resolution for its correction. It gives the superintending clerk the choice of being paid as clerk of the census board or superintending clerk of the census.

"The construction given to the joint resolution by the accounting officers of the Treasury is, that it limits the compensation of the memorialist, for all duties performed by him in either or both capacities, to $2,500 per annum from the 1st of June, 1850; and as he had already been paid at the rate of $3,000 per annum, up to the time of the passage of the joint resolution, (December, 1852) he has been officially called upon to refund to the Treasury the $500 per annum received over that sum. By the act of 22d of April, 1854, after the memorialist had left the office, the salary was definitely fixed at $3,000 a year.—10 Statutes, 276.

"In view of all the circumstances, the committee are of opinion that the sum ultimately fixed upon as a proper compensation for the duties of the office, namely, $3,000 a year, is a reasonable one, and that the memorialist is fairly and equitably entitled to that rate of compensation; and they report a bill accordingly."

The committee report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT DICKSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 23) for the relief of Robert Dickson, of the Kentucky volunteers, which had been reported adversely upon by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KING. Let it lie over.

The bill was passed over.

AROOSTOOK WAR EXPENSES.

Mr. POLK. I ask whether the bill next preceding the one just acted on is not considered a private bill? It is a bill authorizing the payment to the State of Maine of certain expenses incurred in the Aroostook war. It is a private bill; and it has been passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair passed it over, not considering it a private bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Bills of that kind have been decided to be private bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In this body?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir; there is no question about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The bill (S. No. 216) authorizing the payment to the State of Maine of certain expenses agreed to be refunded to her by the fifth article of the treaty between the United States of America and her Britannic Majesty, dated the 9th day of August, A. D. 1842, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to include among the expenditures of Maine in defending the territory heretofore in dispute with Great Britain, the amounts paid in borrowing money for those expenditures beyond the rate of six per centum per annum, whether in the form of discounts or otherwise, in all cases in which the principal of such expenditures, and interest upon them at the rate of six per centum, have heretofore been refunded to the State by the United States. In making this ascertainment the accounting officers are to compute the principal and interest of the difference between the cash received by Maine in negotiating stocks and notes, and the nominal amount of such stocks and notes and the interest accrued thereon; and in cases where Maine was obliged, in negotiating for moneys, to increase the rate of interest on previous loans, the amount of such interest is to be computed and allowed, but not so as to reckon interest upon interest.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTIN LAYMAN.

The bill (S. No. 235) for the relief of Martin Layman was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize Martin Layman to enter the southwest quarter of section thirty-six, township twenty-nine north, range twenty-four west, in the Minneapolis land district, Minnesota Territory, upon payment of the usual minimum of $1 25 per acre, and to allow the superintending of public schools in the Territory of Minnesota to select an equal amount of other lands in the Territory for the use of public schools in lieu of the lands granted by the bill.

Mr. STUART. It will be necessary to amend that bill by inserting the word "State" for "Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HARRIS AND BUTTERWORTH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S.

No. 237) for the relief of Arnold Harris and Samuel F. Butterworth.

Mr. IVERSON. I object to the consideration of that bill. It is releasing sureties. I think it is a very bad principle to do it under any circumstances, unless the case is very strong.

The bill was passed over.

CAPTAIN ALEXANDER ROSE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 243) for the relief of the heirs of Captain Alexander Rose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let that lie over.

The bill was passed over.

ASHBURTON TREATY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The following bill the Chair supposes to be a private bill; but he has not had time to examine it. It is the bill (S. No. 250) to provide for quieting certain land titles in the late disputed territory in the State of Maine, and for other purposes.

Mr. GREEN. Let that lie over.

The bill was passed over.

CHARLES M'CORMICK.

The bill (S. No. 252) for the relief of Charles McCormick, assistant surgeon in the United States Army, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the allowance to Charles McCormick, assistant surgeon in the United States Army, of a commission of two and a half per centum upon the moneys disbursed by him at New Orleans, under the first section of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1847, "providing for the comfort of discharged soldiers who may be landed in New Orleans, or other places within the United States, so disabled by disease or wounds, received in the service, as to be unable to proceed to their homes, and for forwarding destitute soldiers to their homes;" but the allowance is not to exceed $1,000 in any one year, and is to be in full compensation for all extra services rendered, expenses incurred, and losses sustained by him in executing the law.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TOWNSEND HARRIS.

The bill (S. No. 254) for the relief of Townsend Harris was read the second time.

It provides for the payment to Townsend Harris, for his services and expenses in negotiating a treaty of commerce between the kingdom of Siam and the United States, of the sum of $10,000, to be paid to him or to his authorized attorney.

Mr. PUGH. I object to that bill. It appropriates a large sum of money.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to offer an amendment to that bill?

Mr. PUGH. I have no objection to the amendment being received.

Mr. SEWARD. The amendment is, in line eight, to strike out the words "his authorized attorney," and insert "any attorney of said Harris, under any power of attorney executed by him, whether before or after the passage of this act."

Mr. PUGH. Let it lie over.

The bill was passed over.

Mr. PUGH subsequently said: I desire to withdraw the objection I made to the bill (S. No. 254) for the relief of Townsend Harris. After reading the report, I have no objection to the bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The amendment offered by Mr. SEWARD, to strike out the words "his attorney," and insert "any attorney of said Harris, under any power of attorney executed by him, whether before or after the passage of this act," was agreed to.

DE BONNE AND DE REPENTIGNY.

The bill (S. No. 259) authorizing the courts to adjudicate the claim of the legal representatives of the Sieur De Bonne and Chevalier De Repentigny, to certain land at the Sault Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the legal representatives of the Sieur De Bonne, and of the Chevalier De Repentigny, to present their petition to the United States district court for the district of Michigan, setting forth the nature of their claim to certain land at the Sault Ste. Marie, under an alleged grant in 1750, from the Governor and Lieutenant-General, and from the Intendant General of New France, now Canada, with evidence in support of their claim, stating the names of all persons claiming adversely, and praying that the validity of the title may be inquired into and decided under the laws of nations, the laws, usages, and customs of the country from which the same was derived, and the treaties and laws of the United States. The court is to examine the case; and, in adjudicating the question of the validity of the title as against the United States, to be governed by the laws of nations, and of the country from which the title was derived, and also by the principles, so far as they are applicable, which are recognized in the act of Congress approved May 26, 1824, "enabling the claimants to lands within the limits of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of the same;" and the district attorney is to proceed in defense of the interests of the United States in all things as required and directed by the act of May 26, 1824. Suit is, however, to be instituted by the claimants within two years from the passage of the act, and an appeal may be taken either by the claimants or the United States to the Supreme Court of the United States within one year from the date of the rendition of the decree of the district court. In the event of a final decision against the validity of the claim, or of the failure of the claimants to prosecute it within the period specified, the claim is to be held forever barred, both in law and equity; but in the case of a final decree in favor of the validity of the grant, it is not to be construed to affect, or in any way impair, any adverse sales, claims, or other rights which have been recognized by the United States within the limits of the claim, or which, under any law of the United States, may have heretofore been brought to the notice of the land commissioners or of the land officers in Michigan; but for the area of any such adverse claims the legal representatives of De Bonne and De Repentigny are to receive from the Commissioner of the General Land Office warrants authorizing them or their assigns to enter any other lands belonging to the United States, and subject to entry at private sale, at $1 25 per acre.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think that bill had better lie over. It seems to me to be a very dangerous principle to pass a special law to promote litigation. The general laws of the country afford opportunities to men to test their rights.

The bill was passed over.

BRIG CALEDONIA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 218) for the benefit of the captors of the British brig Caledonia, in the war of 1812.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is there a report in that case? I should like to hear it read.

Mr. SLIDELL. I prefer that that bill should be passed over.

The bill was passed over.

WILLIAM CRUICKSHANK AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. No. 260) for the relief of William Cruickshank, J. S. Polack, Calhoun Benham, and Frederick A. Sawyer, of San Francisco, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that William Cruickshank, J. S. Polack, Calhoun Benham, and Frederick A. Sawyer, assignees of Juan B. Alvarado, may prosecute the appeal taken by Alvarado from the decision of the United States commissioners adverse to his claim for the "Nicasio" tract of land, which appeal was dismissed by the district court of the United States because notice of the intention to prosecute it had not been given in time, and the appeal is to be reinstated and heard, and determined in the same manner in all respects as if it had not been dismissed, and as if the notice had been given in time, and with the same right of appeal by either party to the Supreme Court of the United States as is accorded by law in other land suits in California.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There seems to be a principle involved in this bill that I do not exactly understand. After the right of final appeal is gone and there is a vested interest in the land, it is singular that we should be asked to permit a rehearing.

Mr. POLK. There is no contestant for this land.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The bill was reported by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN.] He is not here.

Mr. PUGH. The Judiciary Committee were satisfied that these parties were misled, and failed to give notice. There is no adverse party but the Government.

Mr. POLK. I understand there is no person contesting the right to the lands.

Mr. PUGH. Their rights would not vest anyhow. It is only against the Government. We are satisfied it is a case where the party was misled, and did not, therefore, give notice of the appeal.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GREEN afterward said: I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 260) was passed. It passed without my attention being called to it. I think the bill very wrong. I move to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

GEORGE W. FLOOD.

The bill (S. No. 266) for the relief of George W. Flood, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its object is to allow to George W. Flood, for his services as clerk in the bureau of topographical engineers, from December 1, 1854, to September 16, 1856, the salary of a clerk of class one, after deducting the amount received by him for services in that office during the same period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

G. ALONZO BREAST.

The bill (S. No. 267) for the relief of G. Alonzo Breast was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its object is to place him on the list of invalid pensioners, at the rate of six dollars per month, commencing on the 1st of January, 1858, and to continue during his natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AARON HAIGHT PALMER.

The bill (S. No. 268) for the relief of Aaron H. Palmer was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its purpose is to allow to A. H. Palmer $3,000, in full compensation for his labor and research in collecting and preparing information for the use of the Government, relative to the Oriental nations, and particularly Japan.

Mr. KING. If there is a report in that case, I ask for its reading.

The Secretary read the report; from which it appears that Mr. Palmer has devoted many years to the collection of valuable information and statistics in relation to the geography, productive resources, trade, commerce, &c., of the independent Oriental nations. In January, 1848, he inclosed, in a letter from New York to President Polk, a memoir, stating the importance of opening commercial intercourse with those nations; and in the following February, by invitation of the Secretary of the Treasury, he visited Washington for the purpose of promoting the action of our Government in furtherance of the views and suggestions contained in the document sent to the President. In consequence of action of the Senate on the papers furnished by him, he was detained in Washington, laboring for the Government in the superintendence of the printing of the papers, until September of that year.

In 1849, he completed a series of papers containing geographical descriptions of many Oriental nations, among them the Empire of Japan, and he forwarded to Mr. Clayton, then Secretary of State, a brief resumé of those papers, which Mr. Clayton deemed of sufficient importance to cause them to be published. He afterwards submitted to Mr. Clayton a plan for opening Japan, which was ultimately adopted, and formed the basis of the policy of our Government in the late maritime expedition under command of Commodore Perry. He had several interviews with that officer before he sailed, and furnished him with all the information possible; and the last one was by special written request of the Secretary of the Navy.

In pursuance of certain resolutions, presented by Mr. HAMLIN, chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, and adopted by the Senate on the 21st of February, 1850, calling on the Secretary of State for information respecting the barbarous treatment of shipwrecked American seamen in Japan, also, in regard to the independent Oriental nations, and their capabilities for a profitable American commerce, Mr. Palmer was employed by Mr. Clayton to assist him in preparing his answer to those resolutions, and he was diligently employed for about three months in that business.

Between 1842 and 1853, Mr. Palmer addressed a series of letters, communications, and contributions, including copies of his printed documents, to high functionaries in Japan, having for their object the opening of that empire to American intercourse and commerce, which he has transmitted, from time to time, to Nagasaki, through the only safe and reliable channels of communicating with that secluded and mysterious empire, and it may reasonably be presumed they have had an important influence and agency at that court in preparing the way for the successful result of Commodore Perry's mission.

Mr. Palmer also printed, at different times, two thousand two hundred and fifty copies of his memoirs, at his own expense, for distribution to Senators, members of Congress, and executive officers of the Government; and, at the request of several Senators, he prepared a large outline map to illustrate his memoirs on Siberia, printed by order of the Senate in 1848, and in consequence of the delay at the time in the printing of the Senate documents, he claims compensation for nine months' services, in which he was necessarily detained during that year in the preparation of the map and correcting the proof sheets of the usual, as well as extra, numbers of copies of the memoir ordered by the Senate; and also for four months' services in preparing a report, illustrated by a special chart, for the Secretary of State, under a resolution of the Senate of the 16th January, 1850.

In view of the highly meritorious and valuable services thus rendered by Mr. Palmer, and their important results in preparing the way for opening new marts in the East to our commerce, the Committee on Claims came to the conclusion that he is justly entitled to compensation.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANSON DART.

The bill (S. No. 181) for the relief of Anson Dart, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Committee on Indian Affairs reported a substitute for the bill, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, upon the settlement of the accounts of Anson Dart, late superintendent of Indian affairs of Oregon Territory, heretofore filed as his final accounts, to allow him at the rate of $3,500 per annum, for salary for the time he served as such, deducting therefrom the amount of salary heretofore allowed him; and further, to allow such just and reasonable expenses incurred for boarding interpreters and pay of an assistant clerk as he may prove to have been necessary; and that the amount for this purpose be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. There is a verbal amendment necessary in the twelfth line, the effect of which will be to subject the accounts to the examination of the Indian office before going to the accounting officers. The amendment is in line twelve, after the word "prove," to insert, "to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES KNAP.

The bill (S. No. 272) for the relief of Charles

Knap, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make such modifications in the contract now in force with Charles Knap, for furnishing material for the custom-house building at New Orleans, as, in his opinion, the principles of justice may seem to demand; with a proviso that these modifications shall not extend beyond a release of the contractor from furnishing the material for the windows, doors, and stairways of the building, as specified in the contract.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no report.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will state that the bill comes from the Committee on Commerce, and there is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury accompanying it, which, I think, discloses the grounds of relief on which the committee acted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to object to the bill; but I know that in all these contracts for custom-houses, post offices, and public buildings of every description, the parties take them on certain conditions, and sometimes take them at too low a price to complete them, and come forward to Congress to eke out the amount for which they contracted. It is really nothing but a swindling business. I know nothing of the unfairness in this case, but I shall be curious hereafter to know how such bills get through the Senate. I know nothing against it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to the bill, without some reason being given, or without knowing something about it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I can, in a word, state the facts.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know anything about the case; but I will say to the Senator from Louisiana that I think it improper, without some report or some reason, to pass a bill releasing a contractor from his contract. It may be right.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will state in a few words, in the place of a report, what appeared to the Committee on Commerce, upon correspondence with the Department: Mr. Knap took a contract for furnishing certain iron work for the custom-house building at New Orleans. The work consisted partly of cast iron, and partly of wrought iron. Mr. Knap, it seems, understood the quantity of iron required for the custom-house differently from what the Government officers did. He made a very low bid for the cast iron, and a somewhat high bid for the wrought iron. On calculation, the contract was awarded to him, as the lowest bidder. When the iron was called for, it was found by the Government officers that a much larger proportion of wrought iron was required than they expected, and wrought iron had been bid for at a higher rate, and a sum of something like one hundred thousand dollars became due to Mr. Knap under his contract. The Secretary of the Treasury refused to pay him a dollar, unless he would modify his contract, and reduce his price; and, under this duress, he did modify his contract and reduce the price very far below the original contract, in order to get the money for what he had already done, so as to enable him to go on with his business. This modified contract, however, included the furnishing of the frames for doors and windows, and the price for them is shown to be, under the new contract, really less than one half what it costs him to get them; and as he had already, under duress, been forced to break the original contract, which was a very advantageous one to him, the committee thought it unjust to compel the fulfillment of the second contract in those parts of it which really involved loss, and the bill is merely to release him from that portion of the subsequent contract which compelled him to furnish the frames for the doors and windows. That is the whole case.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIG GENERAL ARMSTRONG.

The bill (S. No. 273) for the relief of the officers and crew of the private armed brig General Armstrong, was next announced.

Mr. HAMLIN. That will be debated.

The bill was passed over.

JEREMIAH PENDERGAST.

The bill (S. No. 275) for the relief of Jeremiah

Pendergast was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its purpose is to allow to Jeremiah Pendergast $139 91, being the difference between the pay allowed him as a watchman on the construction of the Patent Office extension and that allowed to other watchmen.

The petitioner was employed by the late Robert Mills, engineer and architect in charge of the construction of the extension of the Patent Office building, as a night watchman, to receive the same compensation, it is alleged, as that paid to other watchmen. He furnishes evidence that he received but $1 25 per day for his services, extending from the 3d day of July, 1849, to the 30th day of April, 1851, while other watchmen were receiving $1 50 per day, until the approval of the act of Congress fixing the compensation at $500 per annum, when they were paid at the latter rate. The petitioner asks Congress to give him the difference of pay between that received by others and that paid to himself. The service performed by him being the same as that performed by others, the committee think the petitioner is entitled to the same pay.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBERT G. ALLEN.

The bill (S. No. 277) for the relief of Albert G. Allen was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that in the settlement of the accounts of Albert G. Allen, late navy agent at Washington, one and one fourth per centum shall be allowed him upon the disbursements of extra pay made by him under the acts of August 31, 1852, and March 3, 1853, to the officers, seamen, and marines who had served on the Pacific coasts of Mexico and California.

Mr. KING. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

Mr. POLK. I was about to ask the Senator who made the report to state the amount of extra pay on which the per centum is proposed to be allowed.

Mr. HALE. If the Senate will indulge me, I will state the case in a much shorter time than the report can be read. Mr. Allen was navy agent here, and had the duty devolved on him to pay this extra compensation; and the Government officers have decided that, being navy agent, and not falling within the duties of his bonds, he was bound to respond for any payments that were made on papers that proved ultimately to be fraudulent. Under that construction they have charged him, and he is now debited on the Department books with, about three thousand dollars, for money that he paid after exercising the best discretion that he could. This is certified to by the officers. The former navy agent, by the action of the Government, had two and a half per cent. for the same service. We cut him down to one half of that; one and a quarter per cent. is the whole of it. I believe it amounts to about ten thousand dollars, of which $3,000 now stands charged to him on the books. He cannot settle his accounts, and he has an outstanding bond to respond to the whole of the rest.

Mr. PUGH. If you will put in a proviso that he shall pay the $3,000, I shall not object. I am apprehensive that we shall have another bill in for that.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no; this allowance is to be made in settling his accounts.

Mr. PUGH. I object to the bill.

Mr. HALE. Well, allow the report to be read. It is not very long.

Mr. PUGH. I take the Senator's statement; I do not care about hearing the report. If the Senator will put in the amendment, I shall not object.

Mr. HALE. I will accept the amendment. Put it in this form: "Deducting therefrom such amount as may be due from him to the United States." Will that answer?

Mr. PUGH. I am satisfied with that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BERNARD M. BYRNE.

The bill (S. No. 282) for the relief of Bernard

M. Byrne was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its purpose is to pay to Bernard M. Byrne, a surgeon in the Army of the United States, $616 26, in full, for special services rendered under a contract with the commanding officer at Fort Gilleland, Florida, in 1838.

In the summer of 1838, the petitioner was an assistant surgeon in the Army of the United States, and stationed at Fort Gilleland, in Florida. The surrounding country being infested by hostile Indians, a large number of the inhabitants were driven from their homes and compelled to seek protection in the vicinity of the fort, and so destitute was their condition that Congress, on the 1st of February, 1839, passed a joint resolution authorizing the President to cause rations to be issued to them from the public stores. It is further represented that the privations and exposure to which the people were exposed caused sickness to prevail amongst them, and there being no physician within twenty miles of the post, except the claimant, the commanding officer, who had been directed by the Government to protect the fugitive inhabitants from starvation by feeding them from the public stores, deemed it also to be his duty to provide them with the medical services which their condition rendered so essential to them, and which they had no other means of obtaining; he accordingly entered into a contract with Dr. Byrne to render the necessary professional assistance for $100 per month; and Captain Beale certifies that the services were diligently and faithfully rendered from the 17th of April to the 22d of October, 1838, and that "had it not been for the skill and unremitting attention of Dr. Byrne, the situation of those poor people would have been truly deplorable, as there was not, during almost the whole of said time, any physician within twenty miles of that post." These facts are stated in the report made to the House of Representatives at the third session of the Twenty-Fifth Congress, No. 213, which states that the contract and certificate were then before the committee, but they have since been lost; but the facts are substantially certified to by the Hon. Mr. YULEE. Although, in a strictly legal point of view, the officer may not have had the technical authority to enter into such a contract, the urgent necessity of the case affords a reasonable justification of the course he pursued; and, as the compensation stipulated was a moderate one, and the service was necessary, and faithfully performed, the Committee on Claims think the amount claimed, $616 26, ought to be paid.

JAMES MACCABOY.

The bill (S. No. 283) for the relief of James Maccaboy, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The object is to allow $500 to James Maccaboy, for losses and injuries suffered by him while engaged in the performance of his duty in the public service.

The memorialist, whilst engaged in the faithful discharge of his duty as a fireman on board the United States steam-dredge at the Washington navy-yard, received a severe injury, which resulted in the loss of one of his legs above the knee joint. The engineer in charge of the boat at the time, deposes that the accident occurred while Maccaboy was engaged in the discharge of his duty, and, he believes, without any neglect or carelessness on his part; that he was out of sight of the engineer, who, without being aware of his position, gave the order to start the machinery, without giving him notice. This is corroborated by other testimony. Commodore Forrest, commandant of the yard, says: "I should be pleased if the memorialist, who has been a faithful public servant, and who lost a leg in the performance of his duty, could be placed on the pension roll for the remainder of his life."

While the Committee on Claims would not recommend any departure from the established policy of the Government, which limits the allowance of pensions to cases arising in the military or naval service, yet they believe cases may occur where a volunteer, or laborer, or mechanic may be as justly entitled to the bounty of his Government, for injuries received in its service, as if he had been regularly enlisted in the Army or Navy. Where a skillful and industrious mechanic or laborer is employed by the Government in a necessary but dangerous service, and, without any fault or negligence, receives, in the performance of his duty, an injury which permanently disables him from providing for those dependent upon his skill and labor for support, it would alike become the Government or an individual employer to manifest sympathy "in the only way calculated to carry conviction of its sincerity," by extending some measure of material aid or bounty. Such a case, it is believed, is presented by the petitioner.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. W. P. LEWIS.

The bill (S. No. 284) for the relief of C. Edward Habicht, administrator of J. W. P. Lewis, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to pay $2,238 47, being the balance of the accounts of J. W. P. Lewis, the United States agent for the construction of a light-house on Sand Key, in Florida.

Mr. Lewis was appointed United States agent for the construction of a light-house on Sand Key, in Florida. On a settlement of his accounts, in April, 1853, a balance was found against him of $9,652 66; while he claimed a balance, as due him, of $2,400 24. On the 22d of June, 1857, a further settlement was made, by which a further allowance was made on vouchers which had been suspended or disallowed in the previous settlement, amounting to $9,652 66, which balanced his accounts on the books of the Treasury, and exhausted the appropriation for the Sand Key light-house, leaving still outstanding, of the amount of suspended and disallowed items, the sum of $2,400 24. Further vouchers were presented on the 28th December, 1857, upon which further allowances were made by the accounting officers, amounting in the aggregate to $2,238 47. This sum, thus finally decided to be due to the claimant's intestate, is now suspended for no other cause, as stated by the accounting officers, "than the want of an appropriation available for the settlement thereof." On this state of facts the bill is founded.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILES DEVINE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 288) for the relief of Miles Devine, of the State of Maine.

It proposes to pay him $500 for injuries received while in the employment of the United States, and for medical and other expenses incurred in consequence thereof.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. SIMMONS from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAY. I object to this bill on two grounds which—

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order. If the Senator objects, that puts the bill over.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senator will withdraw the objection. A bill passed a moment ago similar in its circumstances.

Mr. CLAY. I did not hear it, and I hope somebody will move to reconsider it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And one passed at the last Congress of the same description.

Mr. CLAY. What bill is it that passed?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The bill for the relief of James Maccaboy.

Mr. CLAY. I move to reconsider that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator from Alabama will not press the objection. It is a hard case.

Mr. CLAY. It may be very hard, but I do not think it is incumbent on the Government to provide for hard cases.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has been done in repeated instances.

Mr. CLAY. It has been done wrongly, and I want to raise the point on this bill.

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order. This bill gives rise to debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foster in the chair.) It must be passed over, it giving rise to debate.

WEBSTER S. STEELE.

The bill (S. No. 291) for the relief of Webster S. Steele was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Webster S. Steele, of Illinois, on the list of invalid pensioners, at the rate of eight dollars a month, commencing on the 4th of December, 1857, to continue during his lifetime.

Mr. POLK. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. KING, from the Committee on Pensions, by which it appeared that Webster S. Steele was, in October, 1814, mustered into the service of the United States as a private in the company of Captain William Eels, of the New York militia, called out in the war of 1812 with Great Britain; that he was stationed, with the company to which he belonged, at Sackett's Harbor, in the State of New York; and there, while in the service and in the line of his duty, contracted a disease, from hardship and exposure, which has resulted in making him an invalid, and rendered him unable to obtain his support by labor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES MACCABOY—RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. CLAY. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the relief of James Maccaboy was passed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know what right the Senator has to make that motion when he was not present?

Mr. CLAY. I was here and did not vote; but I suppose I am counted in the affirmative, as I did not vote against it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understood the Senator to say he was not here.

Mr. CLAY. I said I did not observe it, and did not hear the report.

Mr. MALLORY. I have no objection to the reconsideration of the bill; but I wish to raise the point of order to be decided now, because this motion is often made, whether a Senator who does not vote at all has a right to move a reconsideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foster.) I believe it is the usual practice, where votes have been taken rather silently, to consider each Senator as voting in favor of the passage of a measure, where there has been no division.

Mr. MALLORY. In this instance, the Senator did not know the bill was before the Senate at all, it seems.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Texas, who is before me, and did know, will make the motion.

Mr. MALLORY. That removes the objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. I make the motion, if necessary.

Mr. CLAY. I do not care to have the motion put now; but it may be entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be entered.

JAMES A. GLANDING.

The bill (S. No. 292) for the relief of James A. Glanding, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of James A. Glanding, of Pennsylvania, on the list of invalid pensioners, at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing on the 3d of December, 1855, to continue during his natural life.

The petitioner was in the battle of Baltimore, on the 11th day of September, 1814, and he received a wound in that battle, by a ball in the leg, which has resulted in totally disabling him from obtaining his support by labor. He applied to the Commissioner of Pensions for an invalid pension, and presented the affidavits of William Baisman and Thomas Bailey, who testified that they also were in the battle, and that when James A. Glanding was wounded, they carried him from the field to the hospital. The Commissioner of Pensions denied the application for a pension, because Mr. Glanding had not been mustered into the service, and the laws providing pensions granted them only to persons who were mustered into the service, and who received their injuries while in the line of their duty in the service. The affidavits of Daisman and Bailly have been lost, but their contents are testified to by Jesse C. Dickey, the Representative in Congress, through whose hands they passed to the Commissioner of Pensions, and by two other witnesses, who knew their contents at the time. It is deemed just that a volunteer, who unites in a battle, and who becomes an invalid from a gun-shot wound received in the battle, should receive a pension, although he may not have been mustered into the service; and, therefore, the Committee on Pensions recommend the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS SMITHERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of Thomas Smithers.

It provides for placing his name upon the invalid pension roll of the Army of the United States, at eight dollars per month, commencing January 1, 1855, to continue during his natural life.

The petitioner was an enlisted drummer in Captain Thomas O. Jennings's company of Virginia militia, in the regiment commanded by Major Stapleton Crutchfield. He entered the service on the 30th March, 1813, and was discharged with his company on the 11th of October, 1813. During an engagement at Hampton, Virginia, with the British forces, he received a wound in both legs, between the knees and ankles, caused by a splinter from a baggage wagon, which was shattered by a cannon shot, and this has caused him severe physical suffering during all the time since he received it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANKLIN PEALE.

The bill (S. No. 293) for the relief of Franklin Peale was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Franklin Peale $10,000 in full compensation for the use of all his inventions and improvements, and for his extra-official services, in connection with the Mint of the United States and its various branches.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to hear the report in that case.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The report is a very long one. The substance is that the United States has made use, in the Mint, of a series of valuable improvements of Mr. Peale, by which a large amount of wastage has been saved to the Government—I think in one year, over one hundred thousand dollars—and the proposition is to allow him $10,000 for the use of all his inventions which have already benefited the Government more than ten times the amount.

Mr. WRIGHT. I waive the call for the reading of the report.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to it, because I reported a bill which passed the Senate at this session on the same principle, and for the same thing—an improvement which saved money to the Mint; but I should like to understand what these improvements are.

Mr. BENJAMIN. His statement is "for improvements and inventions in refining; apparatus for saving and concentrating sweepings; coin-presses and mint machinery; service not official in making mint machinery and apparatus for the branch mints; and for the use of the processes and machines at the branches and offices."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID D. PORTER.

The bill (S. No. 295) for the relief of David D. Porter was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its purpose is to direct the proper accounting officers to pay to David D. Porter, a lieutenant in the Navy of the United States, $743, for certain extraordinary expenses incurred by him in the discharge of his duty, under the orders of the Navy Department, on special service to the Island of St. Domingo.

Mr. CLAY. I ask that the report be read.

The Secretary read the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which is based on the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE, April 20, 1858.

SIR: A letter, addressed to the Department by the Hon. S. R. MALLORY, chairman of the Committee of the Senate on Naval Affairs, inclosing a petition of Lieutenant David D. Porter, of the United States Navy, praying that he may be allowed certain expenses incurred by him some years since while engaged, by order of the Department, on secret service in the Island of St. Domingo, and which were disallowed by the accounting officers principally upon the ground that they were not chargeable to the ordinary appropriations for the Navy, having been referred to this office for a statement of the items thus disallowed, which, in the opinion of this office, are equitably due, and ought to be allowed, I have the honor to report that the sums claimed, but not admitted, were the following:

1. For the entertainment and transportation from place to place, on the Island of St. Domingo, of officers of the Dominican Government, on board of the United States brig Porpoise, commanded by Lieutenant William E. Hunt, which was placed by the Department at the disposal of Lieutenant Porter, for assisting him in the performance of the duty upon which he was ordered, $350.
2. Entertainment of public officers, and other persons of influence at the city of St. Domingo, $30.
3. Expenses incurred in receiving the Governor at Porte Platte, $20.
4. For loss of $92, in paper currency of the island, in crossing the rivers Barrilegas and Mainon, $92.
5. Loss of other personal property, including clothing, revolver, &c., $162.
6. For a pair of pistols left on board the Spitfire, and for which no receipt was taken, $30.
7. For a traveling sword left on board the Porpoise, for which no receipt was taken, $14.
8. For twenty-two days' detention at Pensacola; twenty in going to St. Domingo, and two on returning, $45.

I am of opinion that it would be equitable to allow Lieutenant Porter all these items, except the 6th, 7th, and part of the 8th.

The expenses of entertaining persons of distinction and influence abroad by the commanding officers of our national vessels, where such expenses have not been extravagant, and have been thought to be required by the dignity of the service or the interests of the United States, have been repeatedly sanctioned by Congress, and it could scarcely be but that such expenditures would be requisite in the performance of such service as was assigned to Lieutenant Porter. The amount, moreover, being very moderate, I have no hesitation in recommending that it be allowed. In judging of the equity of an allowance for losses of property sustained by Lieutenant Porter, it should be considered that he was taken from the ordinary line of naval duty, and dispatched upon a hazardous and delicate mission, which would seem more properly to have belonged to a civilian, but which was thought to require, with intelligence and tact, the courage, energy, and disregard of privation, which might more certainly be found in a military officer. He was sent among a semi-barbarous people, in a country replete with dangers, where precipices and mountain passes were to be traversed, and unbridged rivers to be crossed; where, from the roughness of the traveling, his clothing was more than once obliged to be taken from his own person for the relief of the animals he was using, and where, while on his route, he was for some time destitute of shoes or stockings.

His service was perilous and difficult, and he executed it gallantly and well. Under these circumstances, I think it equitable that he should be saved from pecuniary loss, and that he should be allowed the sum he claims for paper money, clothes, and other property lost, to the amount of about two hundred and fifty dollars.

As Lieutenant Porter was ordered to proceed to Pensacola, and there embark in a Government vessel for St. Domingo, and upon his arrival there found no vessel ready to receive him, it appears to me reasonable that the expenses of his detention there, on his way out, should be allowed him; but as it does not appear that there was any necessity for his remaining at that place on his return, the same reason for the defraying of his expenses by the Government does not exist.

I do not think he ought to receive any allowance for the pistols and sword left on board the Spitfire and Porpoise. If they were public property, he should have taken such receipts for them as would have exonerated him; and if they belonged to him, he does not appear to have exercised such carefulness in regard to them as would give him an equitable claim upon the Government for their value.

It is proper for me to state that there are no vouchers in this office beyond the certificate of the petitioner for the expenditures or losses which have been referred to, except receipts for his board at Pensacola, and the statement of Lieutenant Hunt as to the expenses of entertaining the Dominican officers on board the Porpoise.

I do not mean to imply the least doubt, however, of the correctness of the petitioner's representations of the case, for I have none.

The papers referred to me are herewith returned.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. O. DAYTON.

Hon. ISAAC TOUCEY, Secretary of the Navy.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASEL WILKINSON.

The bill (H. R. No. 307) to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to Ansel Wilkinson," approved August 13, 1856, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the act granting a pension to Ansel Wilkinson, approved August 13, 1856, be so amended that the word "Ansel" shall read Asel where it occurs in the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALIFORNIA CIVIL FUND.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 98) to authorize and direct the payment of certain moneys into the treasury of the State of California, which were collected in the ports of said State as a revenue upon imports, since the ratification of the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, and prior to the admission of said State into the Union.

Mr. MALLORY. That is not a private bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That bill properly requires some examination. It had better be passed over for the present.

The bill was passed over.

HENRY ETTING.

The bill (S. No. 301) for the relief of Henry Etting, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to allow Henry Etting, a purser in the Navy, $1,098 51, being the amount paid by him to Lieutenant J. C. Rich, as judge advocate during the years 1843, 1844, and 1845.

Mr. Etting was purser of the frigate Macedonian, the flag-ship on the coast of Africa, from the 7th of April, 1843, to the 4th of July, 1845. During that period several courts-martial were ordered by the commander-in-chief, commodore Perry, of which Lieutenant J. C. Rich, of the marine corps, was appointed judge advocate, and the service performed by him was rendered in a situation where no one could be found so capable. For this service Lieutenant Rich presented vouchers, approved by the captain of the Macedonian and the commander-in-chief of the squadron, to the aggregate amount of $1,098 51, which were paid promptly by the petitioner, as they were severally presented, at the termination of each respective trial. The petitioner, on his return from the coast of Africa, presented the vouchers, with the accounts of the ship, to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, who subsequently informed him that the amount "must necessarily be disallowed, as by the second section of the Army appropriation act, passed on the 23d August, 1842, it is declared that no officer in any branch of the public service shall receive any extra compensation or allowance for any service he may render." The section of the act of 1842, referred to by the Fourth Auditor, is: "That no officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person whose salary, pay, or emoluments is or are fixed by law or regulations, shall receive any additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation, in any form whatever, for the disbursement of public money, or for any other service or duty whatsoever, unless the same shall be authorized by law, and the appropriation therefor explicitly set forth that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation." The petitioner alleges that he was ignorant of the prohibition contained in the Army appropriation bill of 1842, and that he was governed by previous regulation and precedents sanctioned by the Department, and that the payments were made by him in good faith, upon vouchers in proper form, under the approval of the presidents of the courts and the commander of the squadron, and prays that he may be credited with the amount, which still stands charged against him on the books of the Treasury Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN A. FROST.

The joint resolution (S. No. 34) for the relief of the legal representatives of John A. Frost, deceased, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes so to construe the provisions of the first section of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the forward officers of the late exploring expedition," approved February 1, 1849, as to embrace the case of John A. Frost, who was acting boatswain of the United States brig Porpoise in the expedition, from January 1, 1839, to July 7, 1842.

Frost served as boatswain on board the United States brig Porpoise, in the South sea exploring expedition under Captain Wilkes, from the 1st of January, 1839, to the 7th of July, 1842, but owing to the omission of his name on the pay rolls rendered on the arrival of the expedition in the United States, the accounting officers of the Treasury disallowed his claim for the extra pay of $250 per annum, under the act of February 1, 1849.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES SMITH.

The bill (S. No. 302) for the relief of James Smith was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its object is to place the name of James Smith, now of the city of Washington, late a soldier in the war with Mexico, and on the frontiers of Texas, upon the invalid pension roll at the rate of eight dollars a month, to commence on the 4th of March, 1858, and to continue during his lifetime.

The petitioner was several years in the Army of the United States, serving throughout the Mexican campaign and doing duty upon the frontiers of Texas, where he received the injury, while out with a scouting party, which has resulted in a permanent disability. The duty upon which he was engaged at the time of receiving the injury is regarded of a hazardous character; and though the manner in which he received the wound does not appear in evidence, the petitioner appeared in person with an arm totally disabled, and stated that the injury was inflicted by a blow from a musket struck by the non-commissioned officer who was in command of the scouting party to which he was attached. The blow broke the arm and dislocated the elbow joint, and before he was able to return to camp and receive surgical treatment, a bony union of the joint had taken place, and left his arm so crooked as to be totally disabled. He remained in the hospital after his return until his wound was healed, when he was discharged from the service, on the surgeon's certificate, for ordinary disability.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISAAC VARN, SR.

The bill (S. No. 303) for the relief of Isaac Varn, sr., was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to require the Secretary of War to examine and adjust the claim of Isaac Varn, sr., of Duval county, Florida, for the use and occupation of his property, for wood and timber cut from his land, and for other property belonging to him, taken and used by the United States troops between April 1, 1836, and July 1, 1841; and to pay the amount so found due, upon competent and sufficient evidence, not exceeding $5,000.

Mr. KING. I think the bill had better lie over. The bill was passed over.

SAMUEL H. TAYLOR.

The bill (S. No. 306) for the relief of Samuel H. Taylor was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the allowance to Samuel H. Taylor of $540, for extra service performed by him as messenger in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury, from June, 1853, to June, 1856.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Secretary read the report, from which it appears that Mr. Taylor was employed as a laborer in the office of the Third Auditor, at fifty dollars per month. In June, 1853, it became necessary to hire a building, separate from the Treasury Department, for the use of a portion of that office, in which some twenty-four clerks were located. For this branch of the office Mr. Taylor was the sole messenger and laborer; and for a portion of the time, as stated by the principal clerk in charge, this office was kept open from five o'clock, a. m., until nine or ten o'clock, p. m., during all of which time the petitioner was in attendance as messenger and laborer. The late Assistant Secretary of the Treasury states that the average number of clerks employed in this division was about twenty-four, and that Mr. Taylor was the only person employed in the capacity in question in that division from June 1853, to June, 1856, and that his diligence and activity supplied the place of numbers, accomplishing twice, if not thrice, as much labor as, in general, is performed by employes of his class. The claimant deposes that his extra service extended to six or seven hours every day, and that Colonel Burt, then Third Auditor, told him to continue the duty, and he would see him paid. Colonel Burt soon after left the office, and subsequently died.

The committee do not recognize the right of officers of the Government generally, and especially of the higher and more expensive grades, to compensation for extra services, or for services performed out of office hours, or agree to give them such extra pay, except in extraordinary cases, yet there may be cases, especially of subordinate and poorly paid employes, in which justice and equity would not only justify, but demand, additional compensation for unusual and severe labor and attention performed beyond the ordinary requirements of departmental regulations, and they consider the case under consideration to be one of these. The committee think it just and proper that Mr. Taylor should be allowed an additional compensation, and they have fixed upon fifteen dollars per month as a reasonable rate for the time he was so employed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am satisfied.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

M. C. GRITZNER.

The bill (S. No. 308) for the relief of M. C. Gritzner was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to appropriate $379 77, to be paid to M. C. Gritzner, out of the patent fund, for compensation and damages on account of the rescinding, by the Government, of a contract made with the Commissioner of Patents, on the 30th of March, 1857, for the execution of descriptions and illustrations of the Patent Office report for that year, before the work was completed.

The petitioner, on the 30th day of March, 1857, entered into a contract with Charles Mason, then Commissioner of Patents, to prepare and execute descriptions and illustrations for twenty-five hundred patents for the year 1857, for which he was to receive $6,000, or pro rata, if they should exceed or fall short of this number; the price of each being $2 40. He entered upon the execution of his contract, and prepared descriptions for one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four patents, when, on the 22d of September following, he was notified that the contract had been disapproved by the Secretary of the Interior, to whom it had been submitted by the Commissioner of Patents only a few days previously; in consequence of which the prosecution of the work was discontinued. Payment has been made for the number then completed, at the pro rata rate of compensation. The petitioner claims that the contract was fully binding upon each of the contracting parties, and that he should be paid at the same rate for the whole number of illustrations for the year, being two thousand nine hundred and twenty-six, amounting, on the unexecuted portion, to $2,520 60. It appears that the contract was duly and regularly made according to precedent, in the office of the Commissioner of Patents, and that the petitioner executed the illustrations and descriptions of the year previous under a similar contract, which was never submitted to the Secretary of the Interior for approval. He was willing and anxious to perform and fulfill his part of the contract; and to the extent of two thousand five hundred illustrations, the cost of that number exhausting the appropriation for that purpose, the committee think he was justified in relying upon the contract as securing to him the work, so long as he performed it in accordance therewith and satisfactorily to the Government. The damages which he sustained by the suspension of the contract, after he had completed one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four illustrations and descriptions, are estimated at what would have been the petitioner's actual profits upon the six hundred and twenty-six illustrations which, under the contract, he was entitled to execute. Taking his own estimate of expenses incurred in the execution of similar work the previous year, it appears that his profit on each would have been sixty and two thirds cents, making, upon the whole, $379 77, which sum the committee think should be allowed him.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN B. MILLER.

The bill (S. No. 309) for the relief of John B. Miller was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its purpose is to place the name of John B. Miller upon the roll of invalid pensioners, at eight dollars per month, commencing on the 1st of September, 1857, and continuing during his natural life.

Mr. Miller served as teamster under Quartermaster Sibley and others, from May, 1846, until some time after the battle of Monterey, and while in the actual performance of his duty as such teamster, and while on the road from Carmargo to Monterey with provisions, his mules became mired, together with other teams, and during the efforts made to extract them from the mire, he received a severe kick from one of them upon the leg, which produced long and severe suffering, and finally resulted in necrosis of the bone, making amputation necessary. Though he never was attached to any regularly-organized military company, and transferred therefrom for duty as a teamster in the quartermaster's department, which would be necessary in order to give him a pension under existing laws, he has become totally disabled from an injury received while strictly in the line of his duty in the military service of his country, and the committee are therefore disposed to waive the technicality of the law, and to grant him a pension. The amputation was performed by Dr. Gibson, then surgeon of the San Francisco county hospital, in the year 1855, and he testifies to the extensive necrosis of the bone, but no evidence is produced to show under what medical treatment the patient was from the time of his discharge up to the time of his entering the hospital; but from the nature of the disease and the circumstantial evidence produced, and also from the established good character of the petitioner, the committee have the utmost confidence in his statements.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM SMITH.

The bill (H. R. No. 209) for the relief of the representatives of William Smith, deceased, late of Louisiana, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its object is to confirm the claim of William Smith to six hundred and forty acres of land, now occupied by William B. Allen, in the parish of Livingston, Louisiana, being the same he resided on at the time of his death, and settled originally by Stephen Terry, and represented on the map of surveys as section thirty-nine, in township six south, of range three east; and section sixty, in township six south, of range two east.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PIERRE BROUSSARD.

The bill (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Broussard, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the confirmation to the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Broussard, deceased, late of Louisiana, of their title to a tract of land situated on the Bayou Teche, in the parish of St. Martin, known on the recognized public surveys as section thirty-six, in township eight south, of range five east, containing about one hundred and seventy acres.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. AMEROISE BROU.

The bill (S. No. 276) for the relief of Mrs. Ambroise Brou, of the parish of St. Charles, State of Louisiana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to confirm her title to lot or section six, township twelve south, range twenty east, and lot or section ten, in township thirteen south, range twenty east, in said State; these lands being the unconfirmed half of a tract of nine arpents twenty-six toises front, by eighty arpents in depth, the other half of which was confirmed to Ambroise Brou, by the act of Congress of February 28, 1823.

Pierre Brou had been, in the year 1791, already forty years in possession of a tract of land of ten arpents front, by eighty in depth, which, at his death, became the property of his sons Ambroise and Jacques Brou, who, after a joint possession of a number of years, divided it in 1816. In 1820, Ambroise Brou presented his half for confirmation, which was granted by the act of Congress of 1823, confirming the report made by commissioners on 6th January, 1821. In 1826, Jacques sold his half to Seraphin Brou, and Seraphin resold to Ambroise in 1830, so that Ambroise became owner of the whole tract. It now appears that, while Jacques was owner of one half the tract, he neglected to apply for its confirmation, and the tract is now placed on the maps recently made by the Land Office as public lands. It is plain that the United States have no title to the lands; and that they are private property, which did not pass to the Government under the treaty of cession.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

R. W. CLARKE.

The bill (S. No. 324) for the relief of R. W. Clarke, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for paying R. W. Clarke, late assistant messenger in the office of Commissioner of Pensions, $225, in full compensation for extra services performed by him in that office as clerk, from January 1, 1851, to October 1, 1852.

Mr. CLAY. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. IVERSON, on the 10th of May, from which it appears that Mr. Clarke was employed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions as an assistant messenger, at a compensation of $500 per annum. After the passage of the bounty land law of September, 1850, the duties of the office were so much increased that it became necessary, as it is alleged, to call on the petitioner to devote a portion of his time to the performance of the duties of a clerk. He commenced the performance of these extra duties January 1, 1851. In November, of that year, the Commissioner of Pensions, on the suggestion of his chief clerk, represented to the Secretary of the Interior that the claimant was performing, in part, the duties of a clerk, in addition to his proper duties, and recommended that compensation, at the rate of $300 per annum, should be allowed therefor. The Secretary approved of the suggestion, and the additional pay was allowed, from October 1, 1851. The present application is for the extra pay between January 1, when the service commenced, to October 1, when the pay was made to commence. As the service from January 1 is certified by the then chief clerk, and was necessary, and was subsequently so recognized by the Secretary, the committee think it just that the amount claimed should be allowed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ANN P. DERRICK.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 325) for the relief of Mrs. Ann P. Derrick, widow of W. S. Derrick, deceased, which proposes to allow her the difference between her husband's pay as chief clerk of the State Department and the salary of the head of the Department, while he was acting Secretary of State.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am opposed to the principle of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.) The bill being objected to, it lies over under the rule.

KATHARINE M. HAMER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 6) to continue the pension heretofore granted to Katharine M. Hamer, which had been reported by the Committee on Pensions, with a request to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. PUGH. There is no objection to that bill that I know of, except the fact that we passed a general act yesterday. Now, if the general bill were passed, I should, of course, have this bill laid on the table; but this lady is in such circumstances that her case ought to be attended to. Her pension expired on the 3d of December, 1856. Her husband was a meritorious officer. She is a very poor lady, and I think she ought to have a pension.

Mr. JONES. You are aware of the fact, Mr. President, that the committee was unanimous in favor of the bill for this lady; there is no objection to granting her a pension; but we believed it would be more likely to pass if included in the general bill. I believe it is the unanimous opinion of the committee that the House of Representatives will be more apt to pass a general bill than a special bill. This is a strong case—

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. PUGH. I hope the bill will be passed without further debate.

Mr. IVERSON. If there is to be any further debate, I must object.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object. Let all these bills go together.

The bill was passed over.

CATHERINE DICKERSON.

The bill (S. No. 326) for the relief of Catherine Dickerson was announced as the next private bill on the Calendar.

It contains a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Catherine Dickerson, widow of John Dickerson, late a pensioner of the United States, upon the pension rolls, under the provisions of the act of July 7, 1838, entitled "An act granting half-pay and pensions to certain widows," and pay to her the amount to which she would have been entitled under that act, from March 4, 1836, to the date of the commencement of the pension she now receives.

Mr. IVERSON. Does not that come under the provisions of the general bill?

Mr. JONES. No, sir.

Mr. KING. I think this bill, granting back pensions, had better lie over.

Mr. CLAY. I object to it.

The bill was passed over.

WILLIAM CONWAY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 100) to revive an act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs, or their legal representatives, of William Conway, deceased."

The heirs of William Conway, deceased, or their legal representatives, having never been able to avail themselves of the provisions in their favor contained in an act approved July 2, 1836, partly because of some error or mistake as to the location of the portion of the lands applied for under the act, and partly because of the existence of a legal controversy between the parties in interest under its provisions, it is proposed to revive and continue the act for one year.

Mr. STUART. I should like to hear from the Senator from Louisiana what was the substance of the former act which is proposed to be revived.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I cannot exactly recollect this case, but there was a report in the House of Representatives. I think the act authorized these heirs to make an exchange of certain lands with the Government. They had litigation amongst themselves so as to make it impossible for them to comply with the provisions of the law within the year for which the former act was passed. This bill renews it for one year.

Mr. POLK. I recollect the case. There was before the committee a statement of counsel that explained the litigation which prevented the parties from availing themselves of the benefit of the act within the time limited, and the committee were unanimously of opinion that the time ought to be extended for another year.

Mr. STUART. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN PICKELL.

The bill (S. No. 328) for the relief of John Pickell, late a lieutenant in the United States Army, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of John Pickell, late a lieutenant in the Army, upon the roll of invalid pensioners, and to pay him such full pension per month as is allowed to officers of his rank, under existing invalid pension laws, commencing November 1, 1857.

Pickell graduated at West Point, in the year 1822, and was commissioned second lieutenant in the fourth regiment of artillery, and continued in the faithful discharge of his duties as an officer in the Army until the year 1838. During his services in the Florida war, in which he was actively engaged for some three years, his health was permanently injured; and in the battle of Fort Drane, August 12, 1836, he did most distinguishing service, in the performance of which he received an injury from which he has never recovered. In the course of the engagement he was compelled to detach the men under his command to act as light infantry, and to push his piece of artillery (a brass six-pounder) across a ravine to a position in the midst of a large body of Indians, and by a rapid discharge of his cannon, loading, poising, and firing with his own hands, and entirely unaided, he prevented a flank movement of the enemy, and thereby saved nearly the whole command. In thus gallantly performing this unusual duty, the nearest proximity to the cannon was necessary, and the shock upon the right ear, from the discharge of the piece, was so severe that the next day after the battle a violent hemorrhage from the ear ensued, of which he has had returns ever since. This local injury so enfeebled his constitution that he was finally obliged to withdraw from the service, and from its effects he has become totally disabled.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEPHEN R. ROWAN.

The bill (S. No. 330) for the relief of Stephen R. Rowan was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is a direction to the attorney of the United States for the southern district of Illinois to enter satisfaction of a judgment rendered by the district court for that district at its June term, 1856, in favor of the United States of America against Stephen R. Rowan, on his paying all the costs.

Prior, and down to the 29th of May, 1845, Rowan was receiver of public moneys in the land office at Shawneetown, Illinois. In pursuance of an order of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the evening of the 26th of May, of that year, he embarked on board the steamer New World, at Shawneetown, bound from New Orleans to Cincinnati, for the purpose of depositing the public moneys in his possession in the Louisville Savings Institution, at Louisville, Kentucky, taking the money with him, consisting of silver and gold. The silver was in boxes, and the gold in his trunk. The gold was in ten parcels, wrapped securely in paper and sealed. Four of these parcels contained $700 each, two of them $500 each, one $400, another $200, another $195, and the other one $46 80. They were carefully stowed in the trunk, which was of leather.

On his going on board the steamer, Mr. Rowan applied to the clerk to take charge of his money. This he declined to do, saying that he had no lock upon his office. Rowan then deposited the money in his state-room, and kept in sight of it all the way to Louisville. The boat arrived at Louisville in the night, and, being behind time, the captain notified the passengers intending to debark at Louisville, they could have only ten minutes to get on shore. Rowan went ashore immediately and as speedily as possible to get a hack to take himself and his trunk and boxes up to the bank. Being alone, he was compelled to cease his watch upon his trunk and boxes whilst absent in procuring a hack. In about five minutes he returned, got the boxes and trunk, and drove up to the hotel in which the president of the bank boarded; sent in for him, took him into the hack, and went with him round to the bank, where they deposited the trunk and boxes in the vault, and after locking them up left them there for the night. The next morning they proceeded to count the money, when they discovered that six of the parcels of gold, containing, $2,341 80, were missing, namely, one of the $700 parcels, the two $500 parcels, the $400 parcel, the $195 parcel, and the $46 80 parcel. On examination of the trunk, it was found that it had been cut with a sharp instrument, and the bundles abstracted. Mr. Rowan immediately proceeded to Cincinnati to try to find out something further about the theft, and, if possible, to secure the thieves. He learned, from the clerk, that a couple of men of very bad character, who had come on board the boat at New Orleans, escaped from it at Louisville without paying their passage; and that they had probably robbed the trunk and stolen the gold. Mr. Rowan offered a reward of $500 for the recovery of the money, and a quarter section of good land for the apprehension of the thieves. But all his efforts to regain the money or apprehend the thieves were unavailing. The silver was safe and untouched.

Mr. Rowan had often before taken the public money from Shawneetown to Louisville in large amounts, but had never met with any loss previous to this occasion, although he was not more careful than on the trip of the robbery. Indeed, the committee think he was as careful of the treasure in his charge as he knew how to be. His character for truth and honesty was shown to be irreproachable. Mr. Rowan gave timely notice of the larceny to the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. R. J. Walker, and also to General Shields, Commissioner of the General Land Office; and in May, 1846, with the concurrence of these officers, he presented his petition to Congress for relief. The case came into the hands of Judge Pennybacker, a member of the Senate, who died before he had reported upon it. The papers went into the files of the Senate, and remained there until quite recently.

On the 27th of August, 1845, Mr. Rowan's account was settled at the Treasury Department, and a balance of $2,386 83 was struck against him. On the 7th of March, 1856, his account was again stated, and he was charged interest on the above balance, from the 7th of August, 1845, to the last-named date, amounting to $1,369 73, and making, together with the principal, the sum of $3,756 56. At this date, it was found that there was a balance of $216 14 due by the United States to Mr. Rowan on another account. This amount was deducted by the Comptroller from the above sum of $3,756 56, and a balance of $3,540 42 was shown against Mr. Rowan. But while the accounting officer of the Treasury charged interest against Mr. Rowan on the balance of $2,386 83 in favor of the United States, he allowed no interest against the United States on the balance of $216 14 in favor of Mr. Rowan. On the balance, as last shown above, suit was instituted against Mr. Rowan, and judgment taken, with stay of execution for one year, at the June term, 1856, of the United States district court for the southern district of Illinois. The judgment was entered for debt as principal, not in the sum of $3,540 42, the balance shown as above stated, after deducting the $216 14, but for the whole sum of $3,756 56, without deducting the $216 14, and for interest on the above stated principal, amounting to $284 93, also for $39 50 costs of suit.

Thus, while on the one hand the United States got judgment for interest on interest, on the other hand not only was all interest refused to Mr. Rowan on the balance found to be due him, but even that balance was not allowed him.

The committee think that satisfaction ought to be entered on the judgment against Mr. Rowan, on his paying all the costs.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

P. S. DUVALL AND COMPANY.

The bill (S. No. 331) for the relief of P. S. Duvall & Co., was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to P. S. Duvall & Co., of Philadelphia, of $768 in full for sixty-four reams of paper furnished by them on which to print illustrations of the Japan expedition.

The petitioners contracted with the Government in 1856 to print, with plate illustrations, the second volume of Perry's Japan expedition, to be paid when delivered; the Government to supply the paper. In pursuance with this contract, they printed, with the illustrations, a large number of copies; and had them ready to deliver when they were destroyed by fire in April, 1856, together with the plates from which the work was illustrated. They recommenced the work, and applied to the Superintendent of Public Printing for paper; but as Congress was not in session, they obtained the paper from the manufacturer, with the consent of the Superintendent, subject to future adjustment, and proceeded to perform the contract. The account filed by the petitioners is for value of property as follows: Ten thousand and twenty each of ten plates for the Japan expedition, volume two, being on hand ready for delivery and destroyed by fire 11th April, 1856, $3,121 97; redrawing ten plates, at $30, $300; sixty-four reams of paper, at $12, $768; total, $4,209 97.

These statements are corroborated by the Superintendent of Public Printing. The Committee of Claims do not deem the petitioners entitled to relief beyond the value of the paper. They show no reason why they did not secure themselves against loss by insurance; and the Government, in contracting with them, did not undertake to insure them against loss by fire.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANTON L. C. PORTMAN.

The bill (S. No. 332) for the relief of Anton L. C. Portman was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to pay to Anton L. C. Portman, the clerk to Commodore M. C. Perry, while in command of the East India squadron, $1,000, for his services as Dutch interpreter during the negotiation of the treaty between the United States and the Empire of Japan.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS LAURENT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 334) for the relief of Thomas Laurent, surviving partner of the firm of Benjamin and Thomas Laurent, which proposed to return $15,000, paid by the parties to General Scott, for the purchase of a house in Mexico, since taken from them by the Mexican authorities.

Mr. PUGH. Let that bill lie over.

The bill was passed over.

EDWARD INGERSOLL.

The bill (S. No. 224) for the relief of Edward Ingersoll was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its object is to allow to Edward Ingersoll, military storekeeper at Springfield, Massachusetts, $335 75, being the amount of a judgment with cost against him for the hire of carriages used by the board of commissioners (appointed under the act of March 3, 1853) while in the discharge of their duties at Springfield armory.

Under the act making appropriations for the Army, approved March 3, 1853, a board of commissioners was appointed to examine the United States armories. While in the discharge of their duties at Springfield, in Massachusetts, Edward Ingersoll, the military storekeeper at that place, employed carriages for the use and convenience of the board, the expense of which, it was supposed, would be charged to their contingent account, which, including this item, was audited and passed by the board during their session. The appropriation to defray the expenses of this commission was not sufficient to cover them all, as the item of hack hire was stricken out of the estimate before it was sent to Congress, for the reason that it should be paid by the commissioners themselves. Application was then made to the commissioners for the payment of the amount thus due, and for which Mr. Ingersoll was held responsible; but they failed to attend to it, and Mr. Ingersoll has been compelled, by course of law, to pay the judgment and costs against him, amounting to $335 75. The commissioners should have paid this money; Mr. Ingersoll's agency in the matter only extended to making a bargain in order to obtain the use of carriages for the commissioners, at a reasonable price; but as the payment has fallen upon him, it is only fair that he should be reimbursed in the amount for which he was held accountable.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABNER MERRILL.

The bill (S. No. 335) for the relief of Abner Merrill, of the State of Maine, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs that there be paid to him a pension of eight dollars per month in lieu of the four dollars he now receives, the increase to commence on the 1st of December, 1857, and continue during his natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD P. VOLLUM.

The bill (S. No. 336) for the relief of Assistant Surgeon Edward P. Vollum, of the United States Army, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the ascertainment and payment of the value of the property lost by Assistant Surgeon Edward P. Vollum, of the United States Army, who, while under orders of the War Department, was on board the brig Fawn, bound for Fort Umpqua, Oregon Territory, when she was wrecked, on the 21st of November, 1856; but no allowance is to be made for any property except what was useful, necessary, and proper for such an officer while on the voyage, and engaged in the public service.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALEB SHERMAN.

The bill (S. No. 338) for the relief of Caleb Sherman was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Under its provisions, in the settlement of the accounts of Caleb Sherman, collector of customs at Paso del Norte, Texas, the proper accounting officers will allow to his credit $975 37, that being the amount of Government money of which he was robbed on the night of November 6, 1855.

The petitioner was appointed collector of the customs for the district of Paso del Norte, on the 5th of August, 1854, and immediately thereafter entered upon the duties of his office. He collected large sums of money, which have been duly accounted for; but on the night of November 6, 1855, his office was entered, and the iron safe, furnished by the Government, and in which the funds collected were kept, was broken open, and the contents abstracted and carried away, including the sum of $975 37. The office in which the petitioner transacted his business was on a public and frequented street, and in the neighborhood of occupied dwellings; the safe was such as afforded every reasonable evidence of its perfect security, and was used by other persons, by permission of the petitioner, for the deposit of funds; and no negligence is justly imputable to him in reference to the place of deposit, which was the best that could be afforded under the circumstances.

It appears, moreover, that on the night of November 7, 1855, some persons broke into the building, threw the safe down, unscrewed the handle of the door, and by this means were enabled to insert a quantity of gunpowder into a cavity of the lock, by which they blew open the door. This was a concealed defect in the construction of the safe, which, no doubt, was unknown to the petitioner. All the money then in the safe was carried off, of which several considerable sums belonged to merchants who had funds deposited therein. It appears that there was money therein belonging to the Government, apparently equal to the amount stated, but the exact amount of which can only be ascertained by the books of the office, and the statement of the petitioner. The individuals by whom the robbery was committed were at once pointed out by circumstances which left no doubt of their identity. They all decamped on the night of the robbery, and escaped into Mexico. All reasonable efforts were made to capture them and recover the money, but without success.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANN L. ROGERS.

The bill (S. No. 340) for the relief of Ann L.

Rogers was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for paying to Ann L. Rogers, assignee of John A. Rogers, $1,280 90, being in full of the balance due to John A. Rogers, as late examiner of land offices in Mississippi and Alabama, under an appointment of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. John A. Rogers, the husband of the petitioner, was appointed, in August, 1841, to examine the land offices in the States of Mississippi and Alabama, for which service he was to be allowed a compensation of eight dollars per day while engaged in the examination, and six dollars for every twenty miles' travel. In the settlement of his accounts, after the completion of the service, his charges of per diem for seventy-one Sundays, at eight dollars per day, $568, and eight days examining records at Mobile, $64, amounting in all to $632, were, amongst other items, disallowed at the Treasury. Also, his mileage for two thousand one hundred and sixty-three miles, which was disallowed on the ground that the nearest routes were not pursued, or that the travel was performed between some points more than once. This item amounts to $648 90.

The committee consider that he ought to have been allowed pay for Sundays, whilst in the service of the Government. He was to receive a stipulated sum per diem whilst engaged in the work. There was no exemption or exception as to Sundays. His expenses were as great on Sundays as on any other day. It is very probable that he traveled as well on Sundays as on other days. They made up a portion of the time that he was away from home and in a distant country amongst strangers. It is reasonable and just that he should be paid for them. In the per diem allowances made under similar circumstances, Sundays have not been excluded—as in the former pay of members of Congress, who always drew pay for Sundays as well as other days, and such has been the general practice of Government.

The charge for examining certain records at Mobile ought to have been allowed, as this service was performed by Colonel Rogers, and came within the spirit of his instructions, and proved beneficial to the Government.

In relation to the mileage, it appears that a longer distance was traveled over by him than the nearest routes between the offices he visited, but this was doubtless rendered necessary from the causes and circumstances stated by Colonel Rogers. At the time he was engaged in the service, the country was comparatively new, the facilities for traveling bad, and at that season of the year, during the rainy season, the water-courses were generally swollen and impassable. This is often, and, indeed, generally the case, in the winter in that country; so much so, that travelers are frequently detained days, and in some cases weeks, by these unavoidable causes. The committee can very well understand and believe that the routes taken by Colonel Rogers were necessary and proper, and that if he had waited for the subsiding of the streams, and charged, as he would have been entitled to, for the time of detention, it would have cost more to the Government than the mileage charged. The chairman of the committee has much knowledge of much of the country traveled over by Colonel Rogers, and has had some very similar experience as that alleged by him in passing from point to point across the country. Under the circumstances, the committee have no doubt that Colonel Rogers acted for the best, and that he could not avoid the necessity of passing over longer routes, in the faithful discharge of his duty, than the nearest distances between the consecutive points of his visitations. They, therefore, think that this item ought to be allowed, and, with the other sums above stated, make the aggregate of $1,280 90, for which a bill is reported. The claim of Colonel Rogers has been regularly assigned to his wife, now understood to be his widow, and the committee therefore reported the bill in her favor.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SMITH, PERKINS AND CO.

The bill (S. No. 106) for the relief of Elijah F. Smith, Gilman H. Perkins, and Charles F. Smith, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill, as introduced, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to Elijah F. Smith, Gilman H. Perkins, and Charles F. Smith, of Rochester, in the State of New York, the sum of $1,088 10, being the amount of penalty paid by them to the United States on one debenture bond, executed by John B. Glover & Co., dated April 2, 1857.

The Committee on Finance reported it with an amendment to strike out the words, "of Rochester, in the State of New York, the sum of $1,088 10, that being the amount of the penalty paid by them to the United States on one debenture bond executed by John B. Glover & Co., dated April 2, 1857," and insert:

Composing the firm of Smith, Perkins & Co., of Rochester, New York, the sum of $837, paid by them to the United States on one debenture bond, executed by John B. Glover & Co., dated April 2, 1857, as penalty over and above the regular duties on the merchandise therein mentioned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to suggest another amendment. One of the parties was killed on a railroad since the bill was introduced. I move to insert, after the names, the words, "or the survivors of them."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN GRAYSON.

The joint resolution (S. No. 38) for the relief of John Grayson, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Under it, the accounting officers of the Treasury, in adjusting the account of John Grayson, pension agent at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, are to place to his credit the amount of $526 73, paid by him to George DeCamp, one of the surviving children and heirs of Susannah Stokely, deceased, widow of Nehemiah Stokely, a captain in the revolutionary war; the same having been paid in conformity with the directions of the Secretary of the Interior, as conveyed upon the face of a certificate of pension issued by the Commissioner of Pensions to George DeCamp.

By the act of 4th July, 1836, the widow of a soldier of the Revolution, under certain circumstances, was entitled to receive "the annuity or pension which might have been allowed to the husband," &c. On the 11th December, 1844, a certificate was issued by the War Department, (then in charge of the subject,) in favor of Susannah Stokely, widow of Captain Nehemiah Stokely, for a pension, from the 4th March, 1831, to 27th August, 1836, the day of her death, at the rate of $480 per annum, payable to Joseph Stokely and Polly Finley, the only children of Captain Stokely, for whose service the pension was granted. Upon this certificate the two children received the sum of $2,630 66, the whole amount allowed by law. In 1854, Mr. DeCamp, a son of Mrs. Stokely by a subsequent marriage, applied for his portion of the pension, as one of the legal heirs of Mrs. Stokely, and in February, 1855, a certificate was issued by the Department of the Interior for the sum of $526 13. This certificate was duly paid by Mr. Grayson, the duly authorized pension agent. On the presentation of his accounts, the voucher for this payment was disallowed by the accounting officers, on the ground that the whole amount allowed by law had been already paid by competent authority, and Mr. Grayson was informed that he must apply to Congress for relief. The committee think, as the pension agent paid the money upon the regular warrant of the proper Department, which he had no authority to revise or question, he is entitled to credit for it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALIFORNIA BATTALION CLAIMS.

The bill (S. No. 367) to provide for the payment of certain California claims, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment of $8,129 41½, in full settlement of claims favorably reported upon by the board of Army officers (appointed under the sixth section of the act approved August 31, 1852) in their final report to Congress, dated April 19, 1855.

Mr. POLK. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. BRODERICK. There is a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ELIZA E. OGDEN.

The bill (S. No. 368) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza E. Ogden was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Mrs. Eliza E. Ogden, widow of the late Major Edmund A. Ogden, the sum of $1,396 19, being commissions for disbursements made by Major Ogden out of appropriations for the Mexican war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to hear the report.

Mr. IVERSON. I can obviate the necessity for the reading of the report by stating the facts. This bill is in conformity to various bills which have passed both Houses of Congress, to give commissions on money disbursed above his ordinary duties.

Mr. CLAY. I withdraw the call for the reading of the report.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHRISTIAN INDIANS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 323) to confirm the sale of the reservation held by the Christian Indians, and to provide a permanent home for said Indians.

Mr. PUGH. I think that can hardly be called a private bill. It had better go over.

Mr. BIGLER. I hope the Senator will allow the bill to be considered.

Mr. POLK. I think it is a private bill.

Mr. PUGH. It relates to the Indian policy. I think a bill of that sort ought not to be considered on the Private Calendar; but I will hear the bill.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Whereas, by the thirteenth article of a treaty made and concluded at Washington, on the 6th day of May, 1854, between the United States of America and the Delaware Indians, a grant of four sections of land was made to the Christian Indians, for which a patent was to be issued to the said Indians, "subject to such restrictions as Congress may provide;" and whereas, a patent was so issued to them on the 21st day of May, 1857; and whereas, it fully appears by the evidence and papers on file before the Committee on Indian Affairs, that the four sections of land set apart by said treaty were, on the 29th day of May, 1857, sold and conveyed by said Christian Indians to one A. J. Isaacks for the consideration of $43,400, which sum was a fair consideration for said lands: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That upon the payment of the said sum of $43,400, by the said A. J. Isaacks to the Secretary of the Interior, for the use and benefit of said Christian Indians, within ninety days from the passage of this act, it shall then be the duty of the President of the United States to confirm said sale.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to receive the proceeds of the sale of the said four sections of land, and apply the same as follows: that is to say, so much thereof as may be necessary to the purchase of a suitable tract of land for a permanent home for the Christian Indians, the erection of the necessary buildings for their accommodation, and the purchase of stock, agricultural implements, and whatever else may be necessary to establish them thereon; the balance of the said fund to be invested by the Secretary of the Interior in safe and profitable stocks, the interest whereof shall be applied to the support of a school among the said Christian Indians.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the Christian Indians desire it, the tract purchased under the provisions of the preceding section shall be divided among them, under the direction of the President of the United States, to be held in severalty and with all the rights incident to a fee simple estate: Provided, That the said tracts, when so divided, shall be forever inalienable by the grantees or their heirs, except with the consent and approval of the President of the United States.

Mr. KING. Is there a report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. KING. Then it had better go over.

Mr. SEBASTIAN afterwards said: I was not in, a few minutes since, when the Senate bill No. 323 was called, and its consideration objected to by the Senator from New York. He is now willing to withdraw his objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 323) to confirm the sale of the reservation held by the Christian Indians, and to provide a permanent home for said Indians.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, MAY 24, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 144.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SANTIAGO E. ARGUELLO.

The bill (S. No. 370) for the relief of Guadalupe Estudillo de Arguello, widow of Santiago E. Arguello, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Guadalupe Estudillo de Arguello, widow of Santiago E. Arguello, late a captain in the California battalion, of $14,888, for losses of property sustained by him during the period of such service, and in consequence thereof.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That bill had better go over.

Mr. POLK. I hope the Senator will allow the report to be read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to understand it.

Mr. MALLORY. I can state the substance of the case in a minute. Mr. Arguello was a native of California. When the war broke out, he took sides with the Americans. He fought very handsomely indeed, and distinguished himself. He was mentioned by Commodore Stockton very favorably. In consequence of what he did, the Mexican troops destroyed all his property, and he became a bankrupt, whereas formerly he had been a man of very large estate. The commission in California, sent there to examine claims for property taken for military purposes, did not think themselves authorized to recommend this claim as coming within their jurisdiction, but spoke of it very highly, as entitled to the consideration of Congress. That is the substance of it. He fought very bravely in every battle in California, in which Commodore Stockton was engaged.

Mr. POLK. I ask the Senator to state what is the condition of the family of the deceased?

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Arguello is dead, and he has left a large family of children. There is an agent appointed here, who, I am told, will get this money to the widow with as little cost as possible.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Were the Committee on Claims unanimous?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. PUGH. I ask why this bill estimates higher than the bill which was passed by the Senate at the last Congress? What new light has the Committee on Claims now? I understand they considered the valuation high then.

Mr. MALLORY. There is a difference between the two bills, but it is a very slight difference. The report will state that. I think it is in consequence of the long delay which has elapsed. The value of the cattle and other property was fixed at the sum named in the bill by a commission in California; but in the former bill one thousand or fifteen hundred dollars was deducted from the amount. In consequence of the long time that has elapsed the committee take the testimony given in California as to the value of property.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire how this bill differs from that of every other case where a true patriot has had his property destroyed by the enemy in war. Are we to pay for the property of private citizens destroyed by the enemy as a general principle?

Mr. IVERSON. Does the Senator object to the bill?

Mr. MALLORY. It cannot be argued now. If objection be made it must go over.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If this is to be distinguished from other cases of that class, I should like to know it. I do not wish to object.

Mr. IVERSON. If this bill is to be debated it must go over under the rule.

Mr. MALLORY. If the Senator from Illinois objects to this claim, it must go over, and there is no possibility of passing it at this Congress. The committee were unanimous.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to it unless some distinction can be shown between this and an ordinary case.

Mr. POLK. The Senator says he objects unless some distinction can be shown between this and an ordinary case. This man was a citizen of Mexico at the time California was invaded by General Kearny, and had belonged to what was considered the liberal party prior to that time, and he immediately espoused the American cause and aided General Kearny in his advance on the country. For that very reason he was the special object of attack by the Mexican authorities.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to the bill.

The bill was passed over.

ANTHONY W. BAYARD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 371) for the relief of Anthony W. Bayard.

Mr. CLAY. I object to the consideration of that bill at this time.

The bill was passed over.

FLORIDA CLAIMS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 373) declaratory of the acts for carrying into effect the ninth article of the treaty of 1819, between the United States and Spain.

Mr. SLIDELL. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The bill was passed over.

GEORGE J. KNIGHT.

The bill (S. No. 374) for the relief of George J. Knight, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to George J. Knight of the sum of $1,500, which, with the sum already paid him, is the lowest amount estimated as the value of a schooner called the Experiment, owned by him, which was impressed into the service of the United States during the late war with Great Britain, and was captured and destroyed while in the service.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MADISON SWEETZER.

The bill (S. No. 377) for the relief of Madison Sweetzer was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Its object is to secure to Madison Sweetzer the payment of $1,100 97, the balance of his account against the See-see-ton and Wah-pay-toan bands of Sioux Indians, of Minnesota, for necessary supplies heretofore furnished, examined, and verified by Governor W. A. Gorman, superintendent, and Agent R. W. Murphy, as commissioners, and the sum is to be deducted from the annuities payable to those Indians for the year commencing on the 1st of July, 1858.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSE DE LA MAYA ARREDONDO.

Mr. MALLORY. A bill was passed over yesterday in consequence of my being out of my seat for a moment. There is no objection to it, I believe. It is Senate bill No. 126.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will allow the bills on the Calendar to be gone through with.

Mr. MALLORY. This was taken up yesterday, and there is no objection to it. I happened to be out of my seat at the moment, or it would have been passed. It is simply to confirm a land title. I have an amendment to offer. I move to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 126) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of José de la Maya Arredondo was read the second time.

Mr. YULEE. I shall desire to examine the amendment which I understand is to be offered.

Mr. MALLORY. I offer an amendment, and my colleague can see from the reading what it is. It is, in line sixteen, after the word "representative" to insert, "of B. Chaires to Gad Humphries and Pierce Miranda."

Mr. YULEE. I would rather that the bill should go over.

The bill was passed over.

STATE OF MAINE.

The bill (S. No. 380) to provide for the payment of the claims of the State of Maine for expenses incurred by that State in organizing a regiment of volunteers for the Mexican war was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to hear the report, or some statement from the Senator from Maine, explanatory of this bill. I doubt whether it is a private bill, in the first place.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That has been decided. I suppose I can state the case in a few words. At the time of the raising of troops for the Mexican war, the State of Maine was called upon by the General Government to have a regiment in readiness for that purpose. It went immediately about it, organized the regiment, incurred the expense, but the regiment's services were not called for. This is simply to pay the expense of organizing the regiment.

Mr. CLAY. In pursuance of call?

Mr. FESSENDEN. In pursuance of a call from the President.

Mr. CLAY. The patriotism of Maine is commendable, and I will pay it with pleasure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am glad there is something satisfactory to the Senator.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJOR H. L. KENDRICK.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 272) for the relief of Brevet Major H. L. Kendrick.

It is a direction to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to credit and allow Brevet Major H. L. Kendrick, of the second artillery, the sum of $1,294 66 in the settlement of his account for the sales made by him, by order of General Worth, of certain ordnance property belonging to the United States, at Puebla, in Mexico, in June, 1848; that sum being so much of the proceeds of the sale as were stolen from him at Jalapa, while transporting the same to Vera Cruz.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN RICHMOND.

The bill (H. R. No. 225) to increase the pension of John Richmond was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to increase the two-thirds pension heretofore allowed to John Richmond, of Massachusetts, a private in the war of 1812, to a full pension, commencing January 1, 1855, and continuing during his natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGIS LOISEL.

The bill (H. R. No. 214) for the relief of Regis Loisel or his legal representatives, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to confirm the title of Regis Loisel or his legal representatives, to a tract of land ceded by Don Carlos Dehault Delassus, Spanish Governor of Upper Louisiana, on the 25th of March, 1800, to Regis Loisel, situate in what was then known as Upper Louisiana, on the Missouri river, including Cedar island, as the same was surveyed on the 20th of November, 1805, by Antonio Soulard, surveyor general for the Territory of Louisiana, according to the plat now on file in the archives of the Missouri district.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PIERRE GAGNON.

The bill (H. R. No. 250) for the relief of Pierre Gagnon, of Natchitoches, Louisiana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It will allow Pierre Gagnon to enter and pay for his preëmption claim to the northeast and southeast fractional quarters of section seven, in township nine north, of range six west, containing about one hundred and eighty-nine acres, in the land office at Natchitoches, Louisiana.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARIE MALINES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 327) for the relief of the legal representatives of Marie Malines.

It proposes to confirm the legal representatives of Marie Malines, born Rillieux, in all the right, title, and interest now held or possessed by the United States in and to a certain tract of land in Louisiana, containing about thirty-two hundred arpents, being a part of a grant made by the French Government in 1764 to Marie Rillieux, according to a survey and plat made by the royal surveyor, Don Carlos Trudeau, and of record in the land office at New Orleans; and upon a proper survey, duly approved, being returned to the General Land Office, a patent is to issue.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS L. DISHARON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 317) for the relief of Thomas L. Disharoon, which proposes to confer certain assignments of land warrants.

Mr. PUGH. I think that bill had better lie over.

The bill was passed over.

DANIEL HAY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 230) for the relief of the legal representatives of Daniel Hay, deceased.

Mr. PUGH. I object to that bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will explain that bill in a moment. If the Senator from Ohio will see what it is, I think he will withdraw his objection. I the Senator persists in the objections, there is no use in stating what the bill is.

Mr. PUGH. When a bill cannot be explained, I object to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That objects to every bill.

Mr. PUGH. I will object unless I am satisfied.

The bill was passed over.

Mr. PUGH subsequently said: In reference to the bill on which the Senator from Illinois desired to speak, I was under the impression that interest was allowed from 1836. That was the reason I objected. I find it is only allowed from 1856, and, with the consent of the Senate, I move to take it up. It is the bill (S. No. 230) for the relief of the legal representatives of Daniel Hay, deceased.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to the legal representatives of Daniel Hay, deceased, of a sum equal to two per cent. on all moneys disbursed by him as agent for paying pensions, from and after the 20th of April, 1836, with interest from the 30th of April, 1856.

Mr. STUART. If that is one of the class of cases I think, I should be opposed to it. If there is a report, I should like to learn that fact.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is a report made by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Thomson.] I do not see him in his seat. I can state the case in a moment.

Mr. STUART. Let us hear it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. Hay was pension agent in Illinois in 1836. He proposed to resign, but the Secretary of War requested him not to do so. He disbursed about $150,000 as pension agent—

Mr. STUART. That is enough.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH VANCE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 339) granting a pension to Joseph Vance; which was reported upon adversely.

The bill was passed over.

JOHN DAVIS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 318) recognizing the assignment of land warrant No. 35,956, issued to John Davis, as valid.

Mr. PUGH. I object to that bill.

Mr. STUART. The Senator is mistaken in regard to it. It is a bill I reported yesterday morning from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PUGH. I object to it.

The bill was passed over.

JOHN HUERTAS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 251) to authorize the claimants in right of John Huertas to enter certain lands in Florida.

It will authorize the claimants in right of John Huertas to a tract of six thousand acres in Florida, confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States at the January term, 1834, to enter, at any land office in Florida, the quantity of three thousand three hundred and thirty-two acres and thirty hundredths of an acre of any of the public lands in that State, offered or unoffered, the same being in addition to the area of two thousand six hundred and sixty-seven acres and seventy hundredths of an acre surveyed for the claim, and designated as section forty-eight, in township nine south, of range twenty-seven east, in the St. Augustine land district, Florida, and being the difference between the quantity embraced by the survey and the six thousand acres confirmed for the claim; and the register and receiver of any of the Florida land offices are to receive the proper applications and proofs, and issue the necessary certificates, upon the return of which to the General Land Office, with satisfactory proof of the rights of the claimants, a patent is to issue for the lands so located, provided they shall not be located upon any land within six miles of any railroad.

Mr. YULEE. I move to amend the bill by striking out the words in the tenth line of the first section, "offered or unoffered," and substituting "subject to private entry."

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have only to say that I know nothing further about the merits of this case than is disclosed in the report of the House committee. That committee deemed it unjust to restrict the claimants to an entry on lands offered for sale, and that they ought to have their choice of lands offered or unoffered in lieu of lands of theirs which the Government sold.

Mr. IVERSON. If the bill is to be debated, it must go over.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is for a constituent of the Senator from Florida. If he insists on limiting the relief, I have no objection.

Mr. YULEE. He is not a constituent of mine. It is in defense of my constituents that I propose the amendment. If there is any objection to the amendment, I must object to the bill; because I shall desire to state why the amendment should be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. There is no objection.

Mr. YULEE. I have another amendment at the end of the section; instead of the words, "within six miles of any railroad," to insert, "within six miles of the projected route of any railroad to which grants of land have been made by the United States." This amendment is necessary to give effect to the intention of the House of Representatives, which otherwise would not be accomplished.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. YULEE. It has been suggested to me by my colleague that one of the Senators from South Carolina takes an interest in the bill. Perhaps, in that view, it would be as well to let the third reading stand over.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is better to pass the bill as it is—the gentleman has already done it all the harm.

Mr. YULEE. No, sir. This morning I showed the Senator from South Carolina the amendments I proposed; and I did not observe that he was not in his seat. As he may desire to be heard, I propose to let the bill go over.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the gentleman will permit the bill to pass, I shall move a reconsideration if the Senator from South Carolina wants it.

Mr. YULEE. Very well.

Mr. KING. Is there any report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, sir. Mr. KING. I think it had better lie over. The bill was passed over.

JOHN HUDRY.

The bill (S. No. 385) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of John Hudry, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the heirs or legal representatives of Captain John Hudry, of the State of Louisiana, $9,705, being the amount of his account for uniform clothing, arms, and accouterments furnished by him, in the year 1814, to a company of the Louisiana legion engaged in the battle of New Orleans.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I heard that bill it only authorizes the Secretary to pay. I think the proper form is "authorized and directed." I move to insert the words "and directed."

The amendment was agreed to.

JOHN FORSYTH.

The bill (S. No. 388) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late John Forsyth, was read a second time, and considered, as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to the legal representatives of the late John Forsyth of $2,140, in full of a balance due him on account of his salary as Minister to Spain, from 18th February, 1819, to the 3d of March, 1823.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the report in that case.

Mr. IVERSON. The report is a pretty lengthy one, and in manuscript, not yet printed. As I am a party in interest, I trust the Senate will indulge me in stating the case. I am one of the heirs of John Forsyth, and therefore interested in this bill. It is reported by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. POLK,] who understands it better than I do.

Mr. SEWARD. It is reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. IVERSON. Yes, sir; in the settlement of Mr. Forsyth's accounts, as Minister to Spain, the accounting officers charged him with what was called gain of exchange on drafts drawn from Madrid on London. That was usual at that time. It was charged up against all foreign ministers, under similar circumstances, until Mr. Webster was head of the State Department, in 1843, and then General Cass, being Minister to France, protested against it as an illegal charge, and Mr. Webster decided that it was an illegal charge, and instructed the Fifth Auditor to refund to Mr. Cass the sum that had been charged against him, amounting to something over $4,000. Under that decision of Mr. Webster, repeated afterwards, every minister has been refunded back the amount lost on his account except Mr. Everett, of Massachusetts, and Mr. Forsyth. The reason why it has not been refunded to Mr. Forsyth has been simply because he died in 1841, before the decision of Mr. Webster was made, and his heirs knew nothing whatever about this case until the last year. While I was here last summer, my attention was drawn to it by a gentleman who has been a clerk in one of the Departments, and I made application to the State Department to refund this amount to Mr. Forsyth's heirs, according to former decisions. There are twenty, perhaps thirty cases where it has been done. The Secretary declined to refund the money, in consequence of the accounts having been settled so far back that he did not wish to open them, and said I had better refer the case to Congress.

Mr. POLK. The Senator from Georgia has not stated the case as strongly in favor of Mr. Forsyth as the facts justify.

Several SENATORS. He stated it strong enough. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. IVERSON. I should like to insert an amendment, with the consent of the Senator who reported the bill, directing the money to be paid to the heirs instead of the legal representatives. The estate of Mr. Forsyth has long since been closed up.

Mr. POLK. Are not the heirs the legal representatives?

Mr. IVERSON. Yes; but the Department might construe it as going to the administrator.

Mr. POLK. I think the proper word is used.

Mr. IVERSON. Let it go.

ISAAC DREW.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 578) for the relief of Isaac Drew, and other settlers upon the public lands in the State of Wisconsin.

Isaac Drew, and such other persons as may have settled, in good faith, in Wisconsin, since July 1, 1850, upon any portion of the lands that were erroneously selected by that State as a part of the five hundred thousand acre grant, which selections were not confirmed, and who were at that date, or since that time have become an actual settler and housekeeper, and made improvements on any tract embraced among these erroneous selections, are to be entitled, under this bill, to the same right of preemption, and upon the same terms and conditions as are prescribed by an act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and grant preemption rights," approved September 14, 1841; but the lands are to be paid for by the settlers at the minimum price.

Mr. GREEN. I object to that bill.

Mr. STUART. I will say to the Senator that these settlements arose out of a mistake by the State itself in the selection of lands. These people are there in good faith. The case has been here for years, and they have been trying to get relief. It is one of the plainest cases in the world.

Mr. GREEN. I withdraw my objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time and passed.

ISAAC CARPENTER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 260) for the relief of Isaac Carpenter.

It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Isaac Carpenter, of the State of New York, upon the invalid pension list, at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing on the 10th of June, 1856, to continue during his natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OLIVER P. HOVEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 256) for the relief of Oliver P. Hovey.

Mr. PUGH. I object to that bill.

The bill was passed over.

SHERLOCK AND SHIRLEY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Calendar has now been gone through with.

Mr. WADE. I hope the Senate will indulge me by taking up the bill S. No. 287. There were some objections to it on a former occasion when it was called up; but an amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida, the chairman of the Post Office Committee, I believe, will remove those objections; and I hope that the bill will now be suffered to pass.

Mr. GREEN. I object to that bill. I want to go back to the beginning of the Calendar, and go on regularly.

Mr. WADE. There is really no objection to the bill that I know of.

Mr. GREEN. Is it satisfactory all round?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GREEN. Will it give rise to debate?

Mr. WADE. I think not.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 287) for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley.

Mr. GREEN. I object to that.

Mr. POLK. I think it had better go over.

Mr. YULEE. I have prepared a proviso in such distinct terms that it is satisfactory to all who before objected to the bill, because it puts the principle in distinct language:

Provided, That no case of any fine or deduction heretofore considered and decided by any former Postmaster General, upon the application of the contractors, shall be reviewed under the provisions of this act.

That covers the whole principle which was contended for, in distinct terms.

Mr. GREEN. I still object. I cannot agree to that. That is the existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is objected to, and lies over.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Are there any other bills on the Calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We have gone through with those bills which have not been objected to.

SEUR DE BONNE.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The bill (S. No. 259) was laid over on account of my momentary absence. There is, I believe, no objection to it, and I hope it will be taken up.

Mr. PUGH. I think we had better commence at the beginning of the Calendar.

Mr. BENJAMIN. This is a bill to which there is no objection. It was passed over at the moment because I was out.

Mr. PUGH. Very well.

Mr. MALLORY. Are there not other bills which have not been placed before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, sir; we have gone through the list on the Calendar.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator from Florida reported a bill this morning.

Mr. MALLORY. It has not been read. There can be no objection to the bill I reported this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That bill has not come from the Printer. All that have come from the Printer have been read.

The motion of Mr. BENJAMIN was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 259) authorizing the courts to adjudicate the claims of the legal representatives of the Sieur De Bonne and the Chevalier De Repentigny to certain land at the Sault Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan.

Mr. PUGH. I understand that this is a bill authorizing a suit against the United States.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will explain exactly what it is. It is as perfect a title, I consider, as was ever presented to a piece of land; but the Government of the United States has sold a great deal of it out to private settlers. They are unwilling to disturb the settlers, and they propose to close the case by bringing a suit against the Government; and if their title is established on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States to leave all persons to whom the Government has sold, in possession, and take warrants to locate elsewhere, taking only what remains undisposed of by the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. My attention has been accidentally called to this bill, and I should like to know from the gentleman who makes the report, what is the extent of the land claimed.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky, that we found in the papers a grant by the King of France—the parties have the original parchment—giving six leagues square to these two parties. The land has been in possession of themselves, or persons claiming under them, in part, ever since. At the time the board of land commissioners was appointed for confirming land titles in that district, they were limited to the cognizance of claims covering one league square. This claim was put before them and not acted upon, because not within their jurisdiction. The Government has sold out a portion of the land claimed to private parties. Instead of suing the private parties, they propose to sue the Government; and if their title be confirmed, to take warrants and locate them elsewhere, and not disturb the settlers. That is the whole case. It is to be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States whether they have a title.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Does the bill authorize a suit against the United States?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yes, in the court of the United States, in Michigan, where the lands lie, to be defended by the district attorney, and brought, on appeal, to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Would the United States, in that suit, be permitted to avail itself of the ancient possession of the citizens of the United States who now occupy the land claimed?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The bill neither provides any special right of the United States nor of the parties claiming the land. It directs the suit to be determined by the court. This is in preference to suing all these settlers. If they were sued and evicted, the Government would give them a dollar and a quarter, and they would all be deprived of their land.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I rather suspect the claimants would much prefer to litigate with the United States—it would be rather a pastime—than with the private occupants of the land. There is a real antagonist; but the Government is rather an ideal, speculative opponent than anything else. This seems to be a very ancient claim—I presume long neglected.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The claim has never been neglected. It has been asserted and reasserted ever since the land office has existed there, but it was beyond the jurisdiction. It has been lying on record here in the Land Office as a caveat and protest against the disposal of these lands ever since the lands have been held by the United States; but there has been no tribunal to determine the claim. Now, instead of determining this grant in favor of the parties, the committee preferred, as the amount was large, to submit it to a defense by the United States. It is a class of titles we usually report for confirmation, but it was because it was a large amount that we preferred to have it settled by a court of justice, where the Government can be defended.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Has it happened—

Mr. GREEN. I rise to a question of order, that, as the bill gives rise to debate, it goes over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no objection made to the bill, but rather an informal conversation.

Mr. GREEN. I cannot see how there can be debate without objection on one side or the other.

Mr. KING. There ought to be some objection to the passage of this bill. It is a bill for six square leagues of land, which is, I suppose, a very large quantity.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Who will he have to decide it if the gentleman will not trust the courts?

Mr. KING. If the land is theirs, they can sue the parties on it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Does the gentleman object to the bill?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; I object to it because I am opposed to its passage.

The bill was passed over.

RICHARD FITZPATRICK.

Mr. MALLORY. I am told that the bill to which I called attention is now on the table. I ask that the bill (S. No. 393) be taken up in its order.

The bill (S. No. 393) from the Court of Claims, for the relief of Richard Fitzpatrick, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Richard Fitzpatrick, $12,000 in full, for the use and occupation of his plantation as a military post of the United States, between the years 1836 and 1842, as also for the damage done to his plantation in cutting off the wood and lumber during the occupation.

Mr. MALLORY. I will simply state that this bill passed the Senate once, went to the other House, and was reported favorably there. It has now unanimously passed the Court of Claims and the Senate Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is there a report in the case? I should like to hear it.

Mr. MALLORY. The report is the report of the Court of Claims, embodying all the facts. The court were unanimous.

Mr. WRIGHT. I waive the call.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING.

Mr. GREEN. I desire to withdraw my objection to the bill (S. No. 287) for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley, saying at the same time that I believe my objection is proper; but I do not choose to stand in the way of a majority of the Senate. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MASON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer a resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With reference to private bills?

Mr. MASON. No.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to it, then.

Mr. MASON: It is in regard to the general business of the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I want to get through private bills.

Mr. MASON. I move that the Senate adjourn. The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WADE. As the objection to the bill S. No. 287 is withdrawn, I hope it will be passed.

Mr. POLK. I object to it. It does not come up in its order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is the Private Calendar gone through with?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Some bills have been brought in within a few minutes. The Calendar is not gone through with yet.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to take up a motion I made to reconsider a bill which I think is in order before the Calendar. It is a bill which belongs to the Private Calendar, and will come up, therefore, before these others. It is a bill for the relief of George Ashley, administrator de bonis non of Samuel Holgate. I move to reconsider the vote on its passage, rejecting that bill. It is bill No. 89.

Mr. PUGH. I object to that being considered now. It is putting the bill ahead of its place on the Calendar. The Senate rejected it on a call of the yeas and nays. Unless the Chair decides the motion to be in order, I object to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It stood ahead of these bills now on the Calendar, and has been acted on. A motion to reconsider is a privileged motion, and must take precedence.

Mr. PUGH. The bill is not on the Calendar. The order of the Senate is to take up bills on the Calendar.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a private bill.

Mr. PUGH. It is not on the Calendar. It was rejected and put aside. I object to everything but the Calendar in order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I contend that this is at the beginning of the Private Calendar, the bill having been acted on and a motion for reconsideration made, which must necessarily take precedence over cases put on the Calendar to-day. It belongs to the Private Calendar just as much as if it was printed on the Calendar; but according to the idea of the Senator we should be compelled to go through the whole Calendar, bill by bill, before we could take up this measure for reconsideration.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir. I move that that bill be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Maine is, that the Senate reconsider its vote, rejecting the bill indicated by him, (S. No. 89.)

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 13; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 21, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m.

MOTION FOR A CALL, ETC.

Mr. CLEMENS. Is there a quorum present? The SPEAKER. There are but ninety-eight members in their seats.

Mr. CLEMENS. I move that there be a call of the House.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. STANTON. I ask for tellers on the motion for a call.

The SPEAKER. If it be the pleasure of the House, tellers may be ordered, although the result has been announced.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If we cannot do anything, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CLEMENS asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 7, nays 157; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Huyler, George W. Jones, Kilgore, Jacob M. Kunkel, Matteson, Murray, and Ruffin—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adran, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingham, Bingham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Cockerill, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Craig, James Craig, Burton, Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, English, Farnsworth, Falkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gattrell, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goode, Grainger, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Macley, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pottle, Powell, Quimman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Russell, Scott, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Troup, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Caldwell, G. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whitley, Wilson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—157.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the vote,

Mr. STEVENSON asked leave to vote, he not being within the bar when his name was called.

Mr. MORGAN objected.

Mr. HAWKINS. I voted "ay" out of respect to the gentleman who made the motion; but I change my vote, and vote "no."

Mr. HILL stated that if he had been within the bar when his name was called he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. COCKERILL moved that the reading of the vote be dispensed with.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, objected.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

READING OF THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FIFTEEN MILLION LOAN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, asking an additional loan of $15,000,000; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills and resolutions of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 198) for the relief of Joseph Hardy and Alton Long;

An act (No. 221) for the relief of Frances Ann McCauley;

An act (No. 225) for the relief of Anthony Caslo, a soldier in the war of 1812;

An act (No. 297) to extend an act entitled "An act to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans," approved February 3, 1853;

An act (No. 115) for the relief of J. Hosford Smith;

An act (No. 116) for the relief of Jeremiah Pendergast, of the District of Columbia;

An act (No. 128) for the relief of George Phelps;

An act (No. 130) for the relief of Jennett H. McCall, only child of Captain James McCall, of the revolutionary war;

An act (No. 156) for the relief of Joshua Shaw, of Bordentown, New Jersey;

An act (No. 172) for the relief of William D. Moseley;

An act (No. 186) to confirm the title of Benjamin E. Edwards to a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico;

A resolution (No. 20) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to pay to the officers and seamen of the expedition in search of Dr. Kane, the same rate of pay that was allowed officers and seamen of the expedition under Lieutenant De Haven;

A resolution (No. 43) for the relief of John C. Carter;

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill of the House (No. 564) to create a land district in the Territory of New Mexico.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States covering a report, maps, &c., of the geological survey of the Territories of Oregon and Washington, made by John Evans, Esq., United States geologist, under an appropriation made by Congress for that purpose; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I am authorized by the Committee on Public Lands to move that five hundred extra copies of the report be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It would be better, I suppose, to refer it all to the Committee on Printing, and let them report whether it is necessary to print this report at all or not. It is one of those things which, if illustrated, will cost $100,000. I move to reconsider the vote ordering the report to be printed, and to refer the subject to the Committee on Printing, for a report as to whether it is right to have any of it printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I desire to say a few words on that point. The Committee on Public Lands have had the question under consideration not only at this session, but during the last Congress. They have given it a thorough examination, and have, at this session, directed me to report in favor of printing the report.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That being the case, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I move that the report be laid on the table and ordered to be printed; and that five hundred extra copies be printed.

The SPEAKER. The motion as to the extra copies will go to the Committee on Printing.

DENNIS CRONAN.

Mr. EUSTIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of an adverse report from the Court of Claims (No. 163) in the case of Dennis Cronan, for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on Claims.

It was so ordered.

CATHARINE ANSART.

Mr. KNAPP. I make the same application in reference to a like adverse report from the Court of Claims in the case of Catharine Ansart.

It was so ordered.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA MEMBERS.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. FLORENCE. Before that motion is submitted, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the resolution presented yesterday by the chairman of the committee of investigation in the matter of the purchase of Willett's point.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire whether the business we had yesterday, in relation to Minnesota, does not come up first this morning?

The SPEAKER. That is the business first in order. The motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House cannot be, pending that question, received.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I thought the Chair decided, yesterday, that the refusal of the House to order the main question rescinded the seconding of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so decide.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Did the Chair decide that it is not in order to postpone the consideration of a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. No. The Chair did not decide any such thing.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Well, will not the going into committee operate the same as a postponement?

The SPEAKER. While a privileged question is before the House in proper shape, a motion to postpone its consideration can be made with perfect competency.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. On the same principle, can it not be done by going into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar? Whenever a motion to postpone is competent, is not the motion to go into committee also competent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The rules say that the motion can be made at any time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to address myself to my colleague [Mr. JONES] for permission to report back a Senate bill to the House, in order that the adverse report upon it may be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] will give way for me one moment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I want to have one thing decided at a time.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to lay the whole subject of the Minnesota election on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to make a proposition to the House, that, by unanimous consent, all these motions be waived, and that the vote be taken to-morrow at twelve o'clock on this Minnesota question, and that this day be devoted to the consideration of private bills in the House, and in committee.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the Chair to put the question to the House.

The SPEAKER repeated the motion.

Mr. LETCHER. What is the reason for the proposition? Why cannot this business be voted on to-day as well as to-morrow?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will state the reason. I have two reasons.

Mr. REAGAN. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order except by the consent of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I object; and ask that the House proceed to the regular order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Will the gentleman from Texas not allow me to answer a question?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. REAGAN. I object.

Mr. COVODE. If there is no business to be done on the Private Calendar, and if we are to adjourn in two weeks, I move a call of the House. I am ready to postpone this matter, proceed to the business of the Private Calendar to-day, and take up and dispose of this question at any time for which it may be fixed. I object to having this day, which is set apart for private business, devoted to other purposes.

Mr. KEITT. Public business is more important.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. GROW. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, under the 156th rule, which says that the House may at any time, by a vote of the majority of the members present, do so.

The SPEAKER. There are two reasons why the Chair cannot receive the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In the first place, the House is now engaged in the consideration of the question of privilege; and, in the second place, the House has seconded the demand for the previous question on that question of privilege. The Chair therefore overrules the motion.

Mr. GROW. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. KELSEY. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would beg leave, with the indulgence of the House, to get rid of this question in another way.

The SPEAKER. Debate is objected to by the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. REAGAN and Mr. RUFIN.]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I know; but I hope the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his objection.

Mr. REAGAN. I cannot withdraw it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not see why I cannot go on and do what business we can to-day.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it not be in order to move that the members from Minnesota be sworn in and allowed to take their seats, and to let the whole subject with reference to the certificates be referred back to the Committee of Elections? I was in favor yesterday of having this matter disposed of; but now the report is on the tables of members, and I suppose they have all read it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that such a motion would not be in order.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish very much to have the matter disposed of, and taken out of the way, so as to let us proceed to other business.

Mr. KEITT. I wish to inquire whether it is not in order for the House unanimously to postpone the decision of the Minnesota question till to-morrow, and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to take up the appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. KEITT. I would suggest that, if we do not take up the appropriation bills, we cannot adjourn on the 7th of June.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not expect that we can do that anyhow—

Mr. KEITT. Otherwise I am satisfied there can be no business done to-day.

Mr. GROW. We can take the vote to-morrow. The report has been just laid on the table, but we have not had time to examine it.

Mr. KEITT. Is there any objection?

Mr. REAGAN. I object.

Mr. KEITT. I will modify my proposition, so that the question shall come up to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. EDMUNDSON. I object.

Mr. KEITT. I move to postpone the further consideration of the question until to-morrow, at eleven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion.

Mr. KEITT. Well, I have done my best to disentangle the House.

Mr. COMINS. I desire to ask the Chair what has become of the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair by the gentleman from Ohio yesterday, and if two appeals can be pending at the same time?

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn over fell by the adjournment of the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I hope that, by unanimous consent, this question will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. REAGAN. I object.

Mr. McQUEEN. I object; because gentlemen on the other side of the House consumed the day yesterday by filibustering, and now they hold their hands up in holy horror because the Private Calendar is to be overslaughed. Let them take the responsibility, as they are, in fact, responsible.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask to be excused from voting upon this proposition; and on that I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. STANTON. I move that I be excused from voting on the motion to excuse the gentleman from New York; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLSON. Would it be in order to move to postpone the further consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. COVODE. Why is not my motion put to the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not entertain the motion, inasmuch as the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to disembarass the House, if possible, from its present complication, and I rise to a question of order. I understand the Chair to decide that it is not in order to move to postpone this report until to-morrow. Now, I raise this question of order: that the motion for the previous question is like any other motion. Formerly, one member only was required to second the previous question; but the House, for good reasons, required that a majority should second it. But it was still a motion; and when the motion had been rejected by the House, as the vote ordering the main question was yesterday, it went over until the next day, and there was an end to the main question. And, though there is a paragraph in the Manual stating that a vote refusing to order the main question carries the subject over until the next day, yet, when it comes up the next day, it comes up free from the second of the previous question. If it were not so, the House could never come to a vote upon the bill, because the House, having determined that they would not come to a final vote upon the bill until an opportunity should have been given for debate or amendment, they would be in the same condition the second day; and the Chair having very properly decided that no motion can be made to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded, the House never can come to a vote upon the bill unless they do it in a manner which they have deliberately determined not to do, without debate and without amendment.

These are the reasons why it seems to me the business of the House demands that the Speaker should deliberately consider before he decides the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that after the House yesterday refused to order the main question to be put, if no other proceedings relating to the matter had taken place, the question would have come up this morning, as the Chair intimated yesterday evening, disembarassed of the second to the previous question. The theory of the previous question in the British Parliament, from which we derive our practice, is, that when the previous question has been seconded and the main question not ordered to be put, the effect is simply to remove the question from the consideration of the House for that day. And the Chair thinks that, however inconvenient its operation here, the same result follows.

Since the House has changed its rule, requiring a majority to second a demand for the previous question, the Chair has never perceived any reason why two votes should be taken instead of one. That would be the practice, if the Chair had the making of the rules. But the House yesterday reconsidered the vote refusing to order the main question to be put, and the House now stands in the position of having seconded the demand for the previous question, with the pending motion, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Have not the gentleman who moved the previous question and all other gentlemen who have made motions in relation to this matter, the right to withdraw their motions, and by general consent allow this matter to go over until to-morrow, with the general understanding that no business shall be transacted to-day except that relating to the appropriation bills or private business?

The SPEAKER. By general consent that result of course would be reached. But a demand for the previous question having been made, and the House having seconded that demand, in the opinion of the Chair the gentleman has not the right to withdraw the demand. The Chair thinks the matter has gone beyond the control of the gentleman making the demand.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The House having voted down the motion to order the main question, I think the second of the previous question stands precisely like a new demand, and that it is competent for the gentleman making the demand to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The House having voted upon the demand, in the opinion of the Chair it cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. COMINS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that all pending motions shall be withdrawn, that this question shall go over until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, and that the House shall then resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. I hope all objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. McQUEEN. I object.

Mr. SEWARD. It is apparent that we cannot force gentlemen on this side of the House to take a vote to-day; and it seems to me a matter of good sense, if we ever intend to adjourn this session, that we should consent to allow this matter to go over until to-morrow, and proceed to business. It is evident that we can accomplish nothing by this process.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order of business. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to inquire whether, if the House should refuse to order the main question now, the question would not go over until to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I hope all these side motions will be withdrawn, and the House will refuse to order the main question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope the question will be taken, and that the main question will be ordered. The House may as well dispose of this question to-day as to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. If the House orders the main question, the effect will be to force the House to a vote to-day upon this question when the reports which have only now been laid on our tables have never been read at all.

Mr. COMINS. I again ask the unanimous consent of the House—

The SPEAKER. The Chair has thus far allowed the suggestions of gentlemen in the hope that some agreement would be arrived at which would relieve the House from its present position. The Chair will now enforce the rules to the extent of his ability. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] to be excused from voting upon the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN] to be excused from voting on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] to lay on the table the appeal taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HILL. I rise to a privileged question. I yesterday paired off with a gentleman on this Minnesota question, and I ask instructions of the Chair whether this is a motion so connected with the Minnesota question as to bring it within the terms of my pair? I do not want to do an unfair thing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must be the judge of that for himself. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HILL. I ask the Chair, then, to allow me to state that my pair is with Mr. McKINNEY; and that, for the reason of having made that pair, I shall decline to vote upon the pending question.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 75, nays 102; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Boeck, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burroughs, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Dimmick, Edie, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Has-kin, Hawkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Kelsey, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Lawrence, Leiter, Lovejoy, Maclay, McQueen, Maynard, Miles, Moore, Parker, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Quinman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Robbins, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Wade, Walbridge, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Boyce, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Burton Craige, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Durfee, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Grow, Harlan, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Kelsey, Knapp, Kelly, John C. Kunkel, Letcher, Humphrey Marshall, Milton Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Murray, Palmer, Pendleton, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Ricard, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Spinner, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, Woodson, and Wortendyke—102.

So Mr. STANTON was not excused.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. RICAUD stated that Mr. CARUTHERS had paired off with Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland.

Mr. KEITT stated that he had paired off with Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland.

Mr. NIBLACK stated that he had paired off with Mr. GOODWIN.

Mr. POTLE stated that Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts, being unwell, had paired off with Mr. WARD.

Mr. SEWARD said that he had declined to vote, not wishing to take any part in any such contest.

Mr. CRAWFORD said he declined to vote because there was nothing practical in the question. He should vote upon no question until some question came up involving something practical.

The question recurred on the motion to excuse Mr. MORGAN from voting upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair; on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to be excused from voting upon the motion to excuse the gentleman from New York; and upon it I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GILLIS. I would inquire whether that motion is susceptible of amendment? If it is, I propose to move to amend.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks no amendment is in order.

Mr. GILLIS. My proposition was, if it were admissible, to move to excuse every member upon that side of the House from voting upon any question?

Mr. LEITER. As I see nothing that can be done to-day, I move (half past twelve o'clock,) that the House adjourn.

Mr. KELSEY demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 27, nays 143; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Blair, Case, Caskie, Clawson, Clay, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Iowa, Edie, Greenwood, Huyler, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Leiter, Nichols, Quinman, Reagan, Robbins, Royce, Ruffin, Savage, Stanton, Stevenson, William Stewart, Miles Taylor, Elihu B. Washburne, Wood, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Bliss, Boeck, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Chaffee, John B. Clark, Clemens, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Curry, Curtis, Damrell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Granger, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hawkins, Hoard, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Kelsey, Knapp, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Lovejoy, Maclay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Miles, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Powell, Purviance, Ready, Reilly, Ricard, Roberts, Sandidge, Seales, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—143.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the call,

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE stated that Mr. HATCH had paired off with Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. BILLINGHURST stated that upon the Minnesota question, Mr. SICKLES had paired off with Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. LOVEJOY stated that Mr. LEACH was detained from the House by sickness.

The result was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a report from the Committee on Public Lands on the geological survey of Oregon and Washington Territories, and geological explorations in connection with the explorations for a railroad route to the Pacific. My object is to have them printed and referred to the Committee on Printing, that they may have all the facts before them in connection with the report of Dr. Evans, which was sent in here this morning by the President, and referred to that committee.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I object.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I ask the House to excuse me for the remainder of the day. I have business which requires my absence; and I make the application in good faith.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GROW. I object.

Mr. CLEMENS. The objection comes too late. The Chair had announced the decision before the objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The decision was announced before the Chair heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman insist upon his objection?

Mr. GROW. I do.

Mr. CLEMENS. The gentleman did not rise in his seat and object.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion to excuse the gentleman from New York [Mr. KELSEY] from voting upon the motion to excuse his colleague from voting; upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. No other business is in order.

Mr. MASON. What is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. It is to excuse the gentleman from New York from voting.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order. I suppose the gentleman from New York has a right to withdraw his request if he desires. Has he not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he has, of course.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I think gentlemen had better withdraw their motions made pending the motion on ordering the main question to be put; as I understand, if it is done, that that motion will not be insisted on to-day.

Mr. KELSEY. With that understanding, I will withdraw my motion to be excused.

Mr. GROW. I am willing to withdraw my motion, if it is understood that this Minnesota question shall go over until to-morrow.

Mr. LETCHER. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon excusing the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN] from voting upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MORGAN. Understanding that there are sufficient gentlemen pledged to vote down the main question, I withdraw my motion to be excused.

Mr. MASON. What is the next question in order?

The SPEAKER. It is upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to lay upon the table the appeal of his colleague [Mr. GROW] from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. STANTON. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw his appeal.

Mr. GROW. All these questions will drop if I withdraw the appeal; will they not?

The SPEAKER. The appeal is the first motion.

Mr. GROW. I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The question is, "Shall the main question be ordered?"

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays upon it. What will be the effect of ordering the main question?

The SPEAKER. If the main question is not ordered, the subject goes over until to-morrow; if it is ordered, the House will be brought to a vote upon the report.

Mr. MASON. I understand if we vote down the main question, gentlemen on the other side—

[Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MASON. I shall vote against ordering the main question, as will others on this side of the House.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 101, nays 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Boeck, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Moore, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quinman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Has-kin, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Milton Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Woodson—90.

So the House ordered the main question to be put.

Pending the call, Mr. COX stated that he had paired off on the Minnesota question with Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SEWARD stated that he had paired off with Mr. EDIE upon the Minnesota question, and upon all contested-election cases.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia, stated that he had paired off for to-day and to-morrow with Mr. OLIN, upon the Minnesota question, and also on the Ohio contested-election case.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, stated that he voted in the affirmative for the purpose of moving a reconsideration.

Mr. COBB said: I desire to know whether my name was recorded upon the last vote?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. COBB. I ask that my vote may be recorded. I was sitting in my seat, but did not understand what the question was at the time my name was called.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I object. The question was an important one.

The resolution was then announced as above recorded.

[Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, here reported, as correctly enrolled, an act (H. R. No. 564) to create a land district in the Territory of New Mexico; which thereupon was signed by the Speaker.]

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the main question; and upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the House, having already once reconsidered the vote, it is not in order again to move it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. That was yesterday, and if the Chair refuses to entertain my motion, I will take an appeal.

Mr. GROW. And the vote yesterday was upon a different motion from this.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. With the consent of the House, I will state—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish, before the Chair decides the question of order, to enter a motion to lay upon the table the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to lay that motion upon the table, and upon it I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GROW. Is the motion to lay the whole subject upon the table in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. GROW. I withdrew that, with the understanding that the main question would not be ordered, and that the matter would go over until to-morrow. I now renew the motion.

Mr. DEAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask to be excused from voting on the proposition to lay on the table; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PHILLIPS. We will excuse him by unanimous consent.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask to be excused from voting on the proposition to excuse my colleague.

Mr. FLORENCE. No objection.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I raise the question of order that after the main question being ordered to be now put, these motions to be excused from voting are not in order; and that no motion can be entertained except a motion to adjourn or to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order. It has been the practice of the House to receive such motions.

Mr. MORGAN, (at a quarter past one o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 69, nays 120; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Branch, Burlingame, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Fenton, Gilman, Goode, Granger, Greenwood, Grow, Harlan, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Huyler, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, Lamar, Leitch, Letcher, Lovejoy, Maclay, Mason, Morgan, Morrill, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Potter, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Ruffin, John Sherman, Spinner, Stevenson, William Stewart, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Winslow, Wood, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoock, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, John Cochrane, Cocke, Corning, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Gregg, Groesbeck, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hawkins, Hoard, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Scales, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Trippie, Underwood, Wade, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—120.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the vote,

Mr. COX stated that he had paired off with Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania.

After the announcement of the vote, as above recorded,

Mr. WALBRIDGE said: I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays 143; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis of Iowa, Hawkins, Kelly, Kilgore, Lamar, Maclay, Mason, Murray, Potter, Stephens, William Stewart, Miles Taylor, Walbridge, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Wood, and Augustus R. Wright—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Bliss, Bocoock, Bowie, Branch, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, Goode, Granger, Groesbeck, Hoard, Hopkins, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leach, Leidy, Leitch, Letcher, Lovejoy, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Miller, Milton, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Phillips, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reilly, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Trippie, Underwood, Wade, Walton, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Winslow, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—143.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

Mr. QUITMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make an appeal, with the object of terminating the difficulties in which both sides of the House have become involved. What is the contest in which we are engaged? It is a contest, as I understand, whether the matter of the admission of the members from Minnesota shall be disposed of to-day or to-morrow, and whether we shall make use of to-day for the appropriate business of the day, or whether—so near the end of the session—we shall lose the day in this manner, and still have no understanding as to the taking up of this Minnesota business to-morrow. It seems to me that this is a plain statement of the question, and that neither party can derive any advantage from persisting in—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If a majority of the House is decided to take a vote now, let the responsibility of these proceedings rest upon the other side of the House.

Mr. GROW. We do object to taking a vote to-day, and ask that the matter may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HUGHES. I was on the floor making a point of order when the first motion to adjourn was entertained. I would now like to finish that question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] has the floor.

Mr. QUITMAN. The question is simply—

Mr. SEWARD. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I object.

Mr. WINSLOW. It is evident we can do nothing to-day, and therefore I move that the House do now (two o'clock, p. m.) adjourn.

Mr. BARKSDALE. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 78, nays 102; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Branch, Burlingame, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Haskin, Hawkins, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, Mason, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Potter, Reagan, Ricard, Robbins, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Winslow, Wood, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollcoffer—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoock, Bowie, Bryan, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cocke, Corning, Comins, Corning, Crawford, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dick, Dimmick, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Houston, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leitch, Lovejoy, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Miller, Millson, Isaac N. Morris, Mont, Pendleton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Ready, Reilly, Roberts, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Trippie, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Woodson, and John V. Wright—102.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the vote,

Mr. PALMER stated that his colleague, Mr. THOMPSON, had paired off with Mr. JENKINS.

The question recurred on excusing Mr. KELSEY from voting on the proposition to excuse his colleague, Mr. MORGAN, from voting.

Mr. BRANCH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report back from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a joint resolution authorizing Commander Maury to receive a gold medal from the Emperor of Austria.

Mr. DEAN. I ask for the regular order of business.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered on Mr. KELSEY's motion.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, (at fifteen minutes past two, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is there any objection to excusing the gentleman from New York from voting? If there be no objection, I suppose he may be excused, as a matter of course.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the proposition.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask simply the privilege of allowing us to do what we can to-day with the business on the Private Calendar. We might as well do that as adjourn.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. KELSEY. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WINSLOW, (at twenty minutes past two o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I appeal to the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion, that I may ask the unanimous consent of the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. It is manifest that we can do nothing to-day with the regular order of business. We may, however, by unanimous consent, transact business of a private character which will be a benefit to those interested in private claims.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise for information. Suppose the motion to reconsider is carried, will the matter then go over?

The SPEAKER. No; the question will recur "Shall the main question be now put?"

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 83, nays 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Branch, Burlingame, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Davidson, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Haskin, Hawkins, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Millson, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Potter, Quitman, Reagan, Ritchie, Royce, Ruffin, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Trippie, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B.

Washburne, Israel Washburn, Winslow, and Augustus R. Wright—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Admin, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Bishop, Boeck, Boyce, Bryant, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochran, Corning, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Darnell, Davis of Indiana, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gattrell, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leiter, Lovejoy, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Miles, Miller, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, White, Wilson, John V. Wright, and Zolltoffer—93.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. DAWES stated that Mr. CURTIS had paired off with Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.

The question recurred upon the motion to excuse Mr. KELSEY from voting.

Mr. KELSEY. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet at nine o'clock, a. m., to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

Mr. KELSEY. Then I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. GROW. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I demand the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WRIGHT of Georgia, and BUFFINTON, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—
ayes 26, noes 106.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ENGLISH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PEYTON and DEAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—
ayes 96, noes 32.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at fifteen minutes to three o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 22, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. H. N. SIFES.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, papers in relation to claims of Blocker P. Gurley and James P. Davis, to compensation as counsel for Lieutenant Anderson and his detachment; which, on motion of Mr. FITZPATRICK, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Treasurer of the United States, communicating copies of his accounts of the receipts and disbursements for the Post Office Department for the fiscal years ending the 30th June, 1856, and 30th June, 1857; which was ordered to be laid on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a statement showing the unexpended balance for the payment of claims of citizens of the United States under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. IVERSON presented the memorial of the State of Georgia, praying that the money advanced by that State for the purchase of clothing for the use of the army then quartered near the city of Savannah, during the revolutionary war, may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GREEN presented the petition of Noah Gammon, praying that an amount paid by him on the entry of certain land, to which he did not obtain a title, may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the memorial of Henry Addison and Robert Ould, in behalf of the corporate authorities of Georgetown, District of Columbia, praying an appropriation for removing obstructions from the channel of the Potomac river; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of O. Bowne, in behalf of the commissioners for the removal of the quarantine station of the State of New York, praying that the value of the property of the United States at the present quarantine station may be applied to furnish such accommodations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem necessary for revenue purposes at the new quarantine site; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KING presented papers relative to the claim of James A. Mott to compensation for medical services to sick and wounded soldiers in the war of 1812; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of William Nicholson, praying that the children of Marvel Nicholson, deceased, may be authorized to locate or assign a land warrant granted to her; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BENJAMIN presented the petition of E. B. Bishop, praying an appropriation to test the utility of certain improvements in dredging machines patented by him; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Henry M. Fleury, and others, praying the confirmation of a certain land title; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of William B. Whiting, a lieutenant in the Navy, praying an appropriation to make experiments with fire-arms, and materials to resist projectiles from fire-arms; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to the present condition of the finances of the Government, reported a bill (S. No. 396) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000; which was read, and passed to a second reading. He gave notice that he should ask for the consideration of the bill on Monday next.

Mr. STUART. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the memorial of J. H. Langley and others, citizens of Illinois, relative to Rock Island; the memorial of the preëmptors of the island of Rock Island, in Illinois; and the petition of the Mayor and Council of the city of Rock Island, Illinois, asking for some legislation by Congress, in respect to that island, have instructed me to move that they be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. I will briefly state that the Secretary of War is proceeding to sell Rock Island under authority of law, and for that reason the Interior Department declines exercising any authority on the subject. It appears to the committee that there is some controversy between individual claimants; but the whole subject is so completely under the control and discretion of the Secretary of War that the committee do not think it proper for Congress to take any steps in the matter.

The motion to discharge the committee was agreed to.

Mr. STUART, from the same committee, to whom were referred resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey in favor of a donation of public lands to that State in common with other States, for establishing agricultural colleges; a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, praying a donation of land for the establishment of an agricultural college in that State; a resolution of the Legislature of California in favor of a donation of lands to the States and Territories for agricultural colleges therein; a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, praying a donation of land for the purpose of establishing scientific agricultural schools in that State; resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of a donation of land for the endowment of the Michigan Agricultural College; a memorial of the Michigan State Agricultural Society, praying that a grant of land be made for the endowment of an agricultural college in that State, and similar institutions in every State in the Union; resolutions passed at the annual meeting of the Oneida County Agricultural Society, New York, in favor of the endowment and maintenance of a college in each State and Territory of the United States, to teach such branches of learning as relate to agriculture and the mechanic arts; a memorial of the members of the Board of Education of the State of Michigan, and of the faculty of the Agricultural College of that State, praying a donation of land for the agricultural college; a petition of the New York State Agricultural College for an appropriation of public lands for an agricultural college in each State of the Union; a petition of the Ohio State Board of Agriculture, praying that a donation of land may be made to each of the States for the establishment of agricultural colleges; a memorial of the regents of the University of Michigan, praying a donation of land; resolutions of the New York State Agricultural Society recommending a grant of land to each State and Territory, and the District of Columbia, for the endowment and maintenance of agricultural colleges; a memorial of the directors and faculty of the Farmers' College, Hamilton county, Ohio, praying a grant of land to the several States and Territories for the establishment of agricultural colleges therein; a petition of citizens of New London county, Connecticut, praying that a grant of land be made to each State, to endow therein an industrial university; a petition of inhabitants of Michigan, praying that a grant of land may be made for the benefit of the Michigan Agricultural College; a petition of inhabitants of Michigan, praying that a donation of land be made for the use of the Michigan Agricultural College; a memorial of the Board of Trustees of the Farmers' High School of Pennsylvania, praying a grant of land for the endowment of that institution; a petition of the State Agricultural Society, of Michigan, praying that a liberal donation of public land may be made for the promotion of agricultural education in that State; a memorial of Sallie Eola Reneau, praying an appropriation of a portion of unappropriated public land in the State of Mississippi, for the purpose of endowing the State Female College of Mississippi; a memorial of the Board of Trustees of the Protestant University of the United States, at Cincinnati, Ohio, praying that that institution may be endowed by a grant of public land; a memorial of the officers of the Oakland County Agricultural Society, in Michigan, praying a donation of land to each of the States, for the encouragement and promotion of agricultural education therein; a petition of the Calhoun County Agricultural Society, Michigan, praying that a liberal donation of public land be made to Michigan, and other States, for the promotion of agricultural education; asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to, the committee having already reported a House bill (No. 2) on the subject.

Mr. BIGLER, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 318) for the relief of Keep, Bard & Co., J. Caulfield, and Joseph Landis & Co., asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of William Money, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 398) for the relief of William Money. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Anastacio Caxxillo, submitted an adverse report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 397) to authorize the construction of six small war steamers, of light draught; which was read and passed to a second reading. He notified Senators that he would probably offer the bill as an amendment to the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 300) declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases, reported it without amendment.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Maurice K. Simons, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

M. C. GRITZNER.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 358) for the relief of M. C. Gritzner, was passed yesterday. I am not certain but that it is right; but, being connected with the Committee on Printing, my attention was called to it several months ago, and then I was pretty well satisfied that everything had been settled up, and all that was due had been paid. I ask that the motion to reconsider may be entered, so that I may have time to look into the papers; and after that I will withdraw the motion if I find that the claim is reasonable and ought to be paid.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

SEIZURE OF AMERICAN VESSELS.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested (if, in his opinion, not incompatible with the public interest) to communicate to the Senate any correspondence that may have been held between this Government and the Government of England, concerning the seizure on the coast of Africa by the naval forces of the latter Power, of the American vessel "Peachin," sent in charge of a British naval officer, after said seizure, to the port of New York; and if there be any further correspondence or documents received by the Executive concerning the visitation or search of American vessels in the Gulf of Mexico or elsewhere by foreign armed cruisers, since the message of the President of the 19th May, instant, that he communicate the same to the Senate.

G. A. PENN AND EMILÉ LA SÈRE.

Mr. WILSON. I offer a resolution of inquiry, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate, under what authority Alexander G. Penn and Emilé La Sere were appointed disbursing agents of the Government at New Orleans, by whom and when appointed, and the nature of the service of each; the total amount of compensation paid to them, and the reasons for fixing the compensation of Mr. La Sere at sixteen dollars per day and the compensation of Mr. Penn at thirty-two dollars per day.

Mr. SLIDELL. If the Senator from Massachusetts—I do not know that he was under any obligations to do it—had taken the pains to make some preliminary inquiries, I think he would not have presented this resolution. It states what is not the fact, both in relation of Mr. La Sere and Mr. Penn. I believe Mr. Penn receives sixteen dollars a day and Mr. La Sere receives but eight dollars for his services, such as are rendered in almost every city of the Union, where public buildings are being erected. I should prefer, if the Senator from Massachusetts does not choose to make the correction of the facts I have stated, that at any rate he will not assume facts to exist which I know not to be true. The resolution is an assertion that these gentlemen are receiving this per diem allowance, and it asks the Secretary for reasons why it is granted. The fact is not so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first point is, "Is there objection to the resolution?"

Mr. SLIDELL. I am willing that the inquiry should be made, but I think it ought to be amended.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to striking out the declaration objected to by the Senator from Louisiana. In the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I hold in my hands, I find a list of superintendents of custom-houses and court-houses. I find that one gentleman in New Orleans receives, as superintendent, ten dollars per day; Mr. Penn, sixteen dollars per day. I find that, in the list of marine hospitals, Mr. La Sere receives, as disbursing agent, eight dollars per day, and under "the custom-house, post office, and miscellaneous," Mr. La Sere receives eight dollars per day, and Mr. Penn sixteen dollars per day, while the superintendent of the custom-house receives nothing. Here is the statement that these gentlemen receive this sum. However, I move to amend the resolution by striking out so much as makes a declaration that they receive these sums per day.

Mr. SLIDELL. One receives eight dollars a day, and attends to two or three public buildings; and the other receives sixteen dollars as the superintendent of the building and disbursing agent. I am certain the facts are so. However, I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. CRITENDEN. I should like to hear the resolution read as amended.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate under what authority Alexander G. Penn and Emilé La Sere were appointed disbursing agents of the Government at New Orleans, by whom and when appointed, and the nature of the service of each; the total amount of compensation paid to them, and what compensation per diem Mr. La Sere and Mr. Penn respectively receive for all services.

The resolution was agreed to.

RETRENCHMENT AND REFORM.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to the Senate specific estimates for "retrenchment and reform" in the expenditures for the several branches of the public service "to remedy the evils of the excess of expenditures over the means of the Government" as mentioned by him in his report of May 19, 1853, and that he be further requested to report to the Senate what efforts have been made, and by whom, since the 4th March, 1857, "to restrain the Government to an economical expenditure of the public money," and what have been the results of those efforts.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 395) to authorize the increase of invalid pensions in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were signed by the Vice President:

An act for the relief of Isaac Drew, and other settlers upon the public lands, in the State of Wisconsin;

An act for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Broussard, deceased;

An act to revive an act entitled, "An act for the relief of the heirs, or their legal representatives, of William Conway, deceased;"

An act for the relief of William Smith, deceased, late of Louisiana;

An act for the relief of Regis Loisel, or his legal representatives;

A joint resolution for paying the compensation of stenographers employed by committees of the House of Representatives;

An act to prevent the inconvenient accumulation in the Post Office Department of postmasters' quarterly returns;

An act to increase the pension of John Richmond;

An act for the relief of Thomas Smithers;

An act for the relief of Pierre Gagnon, of Natchitoches, Louisiana;

An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to Ansel Wilkinson;"

An act for the relief of Isaac Carpenter;

An act for the relief of Brevet Major H. L. Kendrick; and

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Marie Malines.

EMPLOYÉS OF THE SENATE.

On motion of Mr. GREEN, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by him on the 10th of May:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the employés of the Senate who did not receive the same at the last session of Congress the same compensation, respectively, that was allowed to the employés of the House of Representatives, by a resolution of the House of Representatives of 2d March, 1857.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire of the Senator whether the resolution proposes a payment out of the contingent fund?

Mr. GREEN. Under the rules of the Senate I cannot offer a provision for the payment of this money as an amendment to an appropriation bill, unless the Senate shall have sanctioned the principle beforehand; and the resolution is to get that sanction in order to move an amendment to the appropriation bill. That is the object of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire of the Senator whether this contemplates the payment of money out of the contingent fund? He supposes it does.

Mr. GREEN. It does.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a rule of the body which requires all such resolutions to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. GREEN. I am aware of that; but we cannot pay it out of the contingent fund unless there is an appropriation made by law authorizing it. This is to get a sanction which will justify, under the rules, an amendment to the appropriation bill, when the bill comes up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a direction of the Senate to the Secretary to pay money.

Mr. GREEN. But he has no money, and he cannot pay it, and he cannot have any money until the appropriation is made, and I cannot move to amend the appropriation bill unless the Senate first sanctions the principle.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not aware that there is no money in the contingent fund. Unless some question be raised, however, the Chair will not press it.

Mr. SLIDELL. I raise the question of order, if there be any such question.

Mr. GREEN. Pray, what question?

Mr. SLIDELL. The question the Chair has raised. I am very sure this subject of extra compensation cannot now be debated without interfering very much with the regular order of business of the Senate. I am of opinion that all our employés are amply compensated now; and in order to test the sense of the Senate on the subject, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. GREEN. I do not see how the Senator can move to lay the resolution on the table while he raises a point of order. But if that is to be a test question, I have no objection to taking it on that. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bright, Cley, Col-lamor, Davis, Fesseuden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Hammond, Henderson, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, King, Mason, Pearce, Sidel, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Bigler, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Dixon, Douglas, Fitch, Foster, Green, Gwin, Harlan, Iverson, Jones, Kennedy, Rice, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, and Thomson of New Jersey—23.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PEARCE. Some three or four years ago, we increased the pay of all the employés of the Senate, with the understanding that that increase was to supersede the very objectionable practice which had prevailed theretofore of making extra allowances at the close of the session. That was the distinct understanding of the Senate. The Senate appointed a committee on the subject. That committee considered it deliberately, and I think in a most liberal spirit. They enlarged the salaries; they made many of the employés permanent, with compensation running throughout the whole year; and we did suppose that after having exercised this liberality, there would be an end to applications for extra allowances which are not founded in any propriety or in any facts which would justify them, but which seemed to owe their passage solely to the kindly feeling and liberal spirit of Senators. We thought we had settled it once for all; but it seems there is no getting rid of extra compensation. No matter at what rate we fix the salaries, the same application will be made session after session. I think this is manifestly improper. It is a contradiction of that determination which the Senate deliberately entered into three or four years ago, and of the expectation of every member of this body. There really is not a single fact suggested to justify us in making this extra compensation now, except the fact on which I understand the Senator from Missouri relies, that the House of Representatives has set us a very bad example, which, in my opinion, we ought not to follow.

I have said thus much upon the general subject. I wish now to say, in regard to the amendment I propose to offer, that if we are to increase the salaries of our employés, I trust the Senate will not leave out a very valuable set of officers who belong to the library, of whom no notice is taken in the resolution. Perhaps the Senator will consent to amend it, by adding, "and the officers of the library."

Mr. GREEN. I would consent, if the Senator did not think it so wrong. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEARCE. Well, sir. I only wish to make it uniform, and to make it apply equally to all. If the thing is wrong in itself, it is still more wrong if it discriminates and exhibits this partiality. I do not think there can be any question of the propriety of that argument.

Mr. GREEN. That is precisely my argument.

It is not only the bad example of the House, as the Senator calls it, but it is an example of paying officers of the House sanctioned by the Senate. The House could not do it, until the Senate sanctioned the same thing; and the Senate has now said the House employes shall have what it will not give to the Senate employes. I propose equality—equality is equity—proceeding precisely upon the same principle that the Senator from Maryland proceeds when he suggests the idea of putting in the librarian. I am willing to accept his amendment; but if his argument is worth a straw, it is wrong to put his amendment in. I believe it is right enough; but if he is going to vote against it all, I do not see with what propriety he undertakes to amend the resolution.

The principle, he says, is wrong, but it will be less wrong if you make it uniform. That is my opinion, too. But still the Senate has sanctioned that wrong with reference to its application to the employes of the House of Representatives. Is it not right that the Senate should sustain its own honor and dignity, and pay its own employes as much as the Senate allows to be paid to the employes of the House of Representatives. We have acted upon the same principle with regard to the reporters. We have never yet made a discrimination against them; and if we do discriminate against them now, it will be the first in the history of the Government. I am willing to accept the Senator's amendment, but it seems to me that by making that proposition, he destroys the whole force of the argument he made against this resolution itself.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Delaware pause for a moment? In the impression of the Chair, this resolution must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. He will hear a suggestion on the point. It is not a joint resolution, but it is a resolution of the Senate directing the Secretary to pay money to the employes. The Chair knows of no fund out of which it can be paid except the contingent fund, and the rule expressly requires that all resolutions directing money to be paid out of that fund, or creating a charge on it, shall be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Chair read the 30th rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The 30th rule is:

"No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session."

Mr. GREEN. I have offered this resolution, and I do not desire to say "the contingent fund," but "such fund as may be appropriated by Congress for that purpose." I will modify my resolution so as to put it in that shape.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It seems to the Chair that it creates a charge on the contingent fund, if any fund. It directs the Secretary to pay money.

Mr. GREEN. I will modify it to say "out of any appropriation for that purpose." My object in moving the resolution is to make it the foundation for an amendment being in order when the appropriation bill comes up.

Mr. BAYARD. The resolution, whether it directs payment out of the contingent fund or not, is not a joint resolution. It is directly in the face of the joint resolution of Congress, of 1854. It proposes a deliberate violation of the law on the part of the Senate of the United States. Sir, we cannot expect the people of this country to obey the laws, if one of the organic branches of the Legislature deliberately chooses to violate them by a resolution of its own; yet, certainly, that would be so if the resolution passes. It is true, the House of Representatives passed a resolution of the same kind, and the honorable Senator from Missouri says we sanctioned it. How did we sanction it? Sanctioned it because we were forced to yield to that measure which was attached to the deficiency bill, when the general interests of the country required us to have the bill passed. We struck it out in the first instance; but the House of Representatives insisted on the appropriation by such a majority that we were obliged to yield, or derange the whole expenditures of the country. I confess that, for myself, I was against abandoning the amendment made by the Senate. I think the principle shocking that either House should undertake deliberately to violate the law of the land, for it just comes to that proposition. The House of Representatives have done it; and we have been forced, against the vote of the Senate, in order to save the deficiency bill, into admitting afterwards an appropriation to be made. Now, the argument is, that because a plain violation of the law has been made by the other branch of the legislative power, we shall do the same thing ourselves which we condemned in them. I cannot understand the proposition as one that ought ever to be sustained by the Senate. I am disposed to give to the employes of the Senate, or any other employes of the Government of this country, as liberal salaries as any man in it. I am opposed to the principle of extra compensation. I see nothing involving the dignity of this body, or their self-respect. Because the House of Representatives choose to violate the law of the land, I hope the Senate will not be induced to follow their example.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri, as now modified.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay out of any fund which may be appropriated for that purpose, to the employes of the Senate, &c.

Mr. HUNTER. As I understand, the Chair decides that all resolutions making appropriations must go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair decided that all resolutions directing money to be paid out of the contingent fund, or creating a charge upon it, must be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I suppose the money proposed to be appropriated here can only come out of the contingent fund, and therefore the rule applies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution, as now modified, directs that the money be paid out of any fund that may be appropriated for the purpose. It requires an appropriation by law hereafter.

Mr. STUART. That is very clear.

Mr. HUNTER. The resolution can have no effect, unless the money is to be paid out of the contingent fund.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not feel himself authorized to construe the law further. The resolution does not now require the money to be paid out of the contingent fund, or create a charge on it.

Mr. HUNTER. In 1854, the Senate, in order to get rid of these applications, passed a law which I should like to have read at the Clerk's desk.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Joint resolution to fix the compensation of the employes in the legislative department of the Government, and to prohibit the allowance of the usual extra compensation to such as receive the benefits hereof.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the officers, clerks, messengers, and other employes in the legislative department of the Government, shall be paid an increased compensation of twenty per cent. upon the compensation now received by them respectively; and the messengers of the House of Representatives shall not receive less than is allowed to messengers of the Senate of the same class; such increased compensation to commence from the 1st day of July, 1853; and that a sum sufficient to pay the same to the 30th of June, 1855, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no person whose compensation was increased by the act approved April 22, 1854, shall be benefited by the joint resolution; And provided further, That the usual extra compensation shall not hereafter be allowed to any person receiving the benefits of this joint resolution.

Approved July 20, 1854.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senate passed that joint resolution for the purpose of getting rid of these applications for extra allowances. They passed it for the very purpose of avoiding such a resolution as is now offered. It seems, however, that the result is to be this: not that we are to get rid of making these allowances at the end of the session, but there is to be a compound allowance. These officers are to get twenty per cent. not only upon the old salary, but twenty per cent. on the additional twenty that was added then. We are thus to give not only upon the old salary, which would have been all that would have been asked if we had not made an addition, but upon the new which is made by the addition of twenty per cent. It seems to me that the Senate owes it to itself to forbear passing any such resolution until at least the repeal of this law, and I think the Senator from Missouri ought to accompany his resolution with a proposition to repeal this law. If they prefer these annual extra allowances at the end of the session, let us go back to the old state of things, the old salary, adding twenty per cent. at the end of each session. I think, myself, the whole practice is wrong.

Nor do I see that there is the least force in the argument which has been urged, that the House of Representatives has been permitted to do it. How permitted? The Senate struck out the provision; the House insisted upon it; and sooner than lose the deficiency bill, the Senate receded. But does the action of the Senate upon that convey to the public or to the world the impression that it approved of any such appropriation? Does it not affirm the precise contrary? Yet, after that action, after expressing that opinion that it was wrong in the House of Representatives, we now come here to make this addition to the salaries of our own employes. Is it just to the employes in the other Departments of the Government? Is not this an unjust discrimination? Are we not paying these officers largely more than we pay to any other persons who are employed in the public service? Suppose they come here from the city post office, from the Coast Survey, from the Executive Departments, hereafter, for extra allowances, on what principle of justice can we refuse them, if we admit that we are bound in honor to make our own employes equal in salary and emoluments to those of the House of Representatives? Does not the same obligation rest upon us in regard to those employed in the Departments, in the Coast Survey, and in the city post office? I can see no difference. I hope the Senate will not pass this resolution.

Mr. GREEN. When the Senator from Virginia says we ought to accompany this proposition—

Mr. COLLAMER. Will the gentleman indulge me a moment? I wish to put a question to him. How will the passage of this resolution produce any operative effect? The accounting officers have decided at the Treasury Department, under this law, that they will not allow anything paid by the mere order of one House to its employes; how then can this resolution have any effect, if we pass it? That is what I wish to learn.

Mr. GREEN. I was proceeding to say—I will answer the gentleman in a moment—that the Senator from Virginia said I ought to accompany my resolution with a proposition to repeal the law of 1854. I intend at the proper time to propose to repeal it pro tanto. Now I answer the Senator from Vermont: if this resolution can have no operation and effect, and it cannot be executed, there is no harm in it. But I announced to the Chair my purpose in offering it. It is to lay the foundation to make it in order to move to amend the appropriation bill. That is the whole object of the resolution.

Mr. COLLAMER. How will it enable you to do that?

Mr. GREEN. Under the 30th rule of the Senate.

Mr. COLLAMER. The 30th rule of the Senate says that such an amendment may be moved where there is a law for it, but this will be no law.

Mr. GREEN. A law or resolution of the Senate. It is to enable me to comply with the rule of the Senate, and make it a law at the proper time. I know the Finance Committee will report against it, if I were to refer it to them, for they report against everything except what draws money into the Treasury. I desire to put our employes on this principle of equality. This is the only legitimate method of accomplishing that end. It is in conformity with the rules of the Senate. It will lead to the repeal, at the proper time, when the appropriation bill comes up, pro tanto, of the law to which the Senator from Virginia referred, and it does not produce any conflict; it makes it legal, orderly, and just. I shall, therefore, support it, and insist upon its passage.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The explanation which the Senator from Missouri has given of this matter puts it in a tangible shape, and gives it some importance. I sincerely hope, however, that the Senate will not pass the resolution, because I think it will lay the foundation of applications continually to be made in the future. We have had this same difficulty every Congress, and every session of Congress. As the Senator from Virginia remarked, and as shown by the law he has read, it is perfectly manifest that the Senate at one time thought it had got rid of it. It took steps with a view to get rid of it; with a view to finish the matter up, and have no further trouble with these allowances, which are constantly pressing upon us.

Now, sir, what is the situation in which we find ourselves, and what is the argument? In violation of the law, the last House of Representatives undertook to vote extra compensation to employes. That allowance met with difficulty in the Treasury Department, and, in consequence of that, it came in here, and it came in the shape of an appropriation on the deficiency bill. It was opposed, and opposed strongly; but the Senate very soon found that the deficiency bill could not be passed unless we did accede to it, and the Senate was reluctantly compelled to recede. That is now made the foundation of an argument to violate the same law ourselves, and plunge the Senate back into the difficulty that it experienced before.

I was in favor of yielding to that provision in the deficiency bill, in the first instance, for another reason; and that was, that the Clerk of the House of Representatives was in difficulty in relation to the matter, and I thought it best to end it. In conversation some of us came to the conclusion—I know it was discussed in the committee of which I am a member—that the Senate, in order to put a stop to this thing, must show that it was willing to make a sacrifice of what was a mere form, and notify the House of Representatives that we would not yield again; and, in order to show the House that we were in earnest, we would, when an application was made to us, reject for our own clerks that which we granted for theirs, because, if we kept yielding, granting to our own clerks what was wrong, simply because it was given to the clerks of the House, the same consequence would follow year after year, whereas, if we yielded to the necessity in that case, but when the matter was presented to us, refused to make the same grant to those under us, we should have some face on which to say to the House of Representatives that any further attempt of that kind would be met with absolute refusal on the part of the Senate.

Notwithstanding the ideas which prevailed at that time, and notwithstanding the fact that we were compelled to yield to that necessity, this same application is made again here, and made on the express ground that we were compelled to yield to it on that occasion. Suppose we do it again; the result will be probably that the present House of Representatives will send precisely the same provision for their clerks, and we shall have to meet the same argument—that it has been granted to the clerks of the House, and we must, to maintain our own dignity, grant it to the clerks of the Senate. Why, Mr. President, it is really surprising to me that the dignity of the Senate is held by so slight a tenure, and depends on such miserable trifles as the amount of compensation to its clerks. If that is a matter which sincerely and really affects our character and dignity, I think what there is left of it is hardly worth preserving. If the question was whether we would make a sufficient, proper, generous allowance to the clerks, it would be another thing; but when it is said that we compromise our own dignity, unless we grant what the law prohibits, and for which there is no necessity, in order to make a proper allowance, I really think it is putting the dignity of the Senate on a basis on which it cannot stand.

What is the amount of this argument after all? Money has been granted to the clerks of the House of Representatives under the circumstances I speak of. Do not the clerks of the Senate receive enough? They do not pretend themselves that their salaries are not adequate. I grant all that is claimed in regard to the character of these gentlemen. I think no body in the world was ever better served. If their salaries are not high enough I am willing to go as far as any one to raise them; but what is said to us? Not that they are not amply provided for; not that they do not have enough for their services; but simply that the House has wrongfully paid more in the face of law, and without any adequate reason, and that the Senate, in order to preserve a valuable bill, thought it expedient to yield it. Hence it is argued we must do that which the law prohibits with regard to our own clerks, or change the law, although they now receive salary enough, for the purpose of giving them more in order to preserve the dignity of the Senate by giving the clerks of the Senate as much as the clerks of the House of Representatives got on a particular occasion, although on that occasion more was paid than ought to have been paid.

Now, sir, I object to that on principle; and I object to it still further for our own convenience and comfort. We have had this difficulty every session. If we maintain our stand now, and say that we are governed by no selfishness, no pride of association, in reference to the matter, but knowing that this is wrong, we are willing to refuse to those who serve us (while they receive all that is sufficient for their services) what, under other circumstances, we have granted to others, I think it will afford sufficient notice, sufficient reason, for us to say to the House of Representatives, ever after, "we shall preserve this position and apply the same rule to you which we have applied to ourselves." What will be the consequence if we yield? Why, sir, as I said before, the same appropriation will meet us again; we shall be placed, probably, in the same predicament; and then we must come again, and increase twenty per cent. that which we have already increased twenty per cent., and give, as the Senator from Virginia says, the twenty per cent., not only upon the original salary, but upon the increase itself. The only fault I have to find with the clerks of the Senate is, that any of them are so unreasonable as to tease members of the Senate to do this, knowing that they have salary enough, and that they are amply and generously provided for; and they ought to have more character and respect to themselves, and to this body, than to be continually making these applications, as if it were necessary they should receive a certain sum of money (although there is no reason in the world why they should have it) because others have got it and they have not got it. That is no reason to any man. Because we have done wrong in one instance, is that a reason why we should do wrong in another? I do not hold to the argument. I have resisted it heretofore, and I resist it now, and I hope the Senate, for the sake of its own comfort, for the sake of putting an end to this question, and finally settling it at rest, will refuse, in this instance, to pass the resolution which has been offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I rise to call attention to the objection made by the Chair, in my judgment with perfect propriety, and which is unanswerable. There are two modes by which we can direct money to be paid: One is by a joint resolution, or by an appropriation bill which has to pass both Houses; and the other is by a separate resolution of the Senate, and that resolution can only be answered by an appropriation out of our contingent fund. This is no joint resolution. Being a resolution intended to be passed by the Senate alone, it cannot be satisfied otherwise than out of the contingent fund; and being such a resolution, under the rules of the Senate, it must go to our Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has the Senator heard the resolution read as amended?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have not heard of an amendment.

The Secretary read the resolution as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair decided that it was not for him to construe the resolution further than to say that it does not direct the money to be paid out of the contingent fund, and does not now create a charge on it. The only object, it occurs to him, which the mover could have had would be to lay a foundation for an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If it is not to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, it cannot be passed by a separate resolution of the Senate. There can be no resolution passed by the Senate separately, to order money to be paid by its Secretary, except out of the contingent fund. There is no other fund for the Senate to order money to be paid out of. This resolution directs the Secretary to pay these allowances out of money that may hereafter be appropriated. If the money shall be hereafter appropriated, the law making the appropriation itself will provide for the payment of it. The Secretary cannot pay it, then, under this resolution. If both branches of Congress pass a law for the payment of a certain sum of money to be drawn from the Treasury, then that sum of money will be appropriated according to the law, and not according to this resolution. This resolution directs a payment by our Secretary, and directs it by our independent authority. The Senate has no right to pass any such resolution. It has no constitutional power to pass it.

The Senator from Missouri wants to get rid of the rule of the Senate, which is a salutary one. It is this: that no amendment shall be moved to an appropriation bill for the purpose of increasing the appropriations, except for satisfying some object previously provided for by law, or in consequence of some resolution of the Senate. Now there is a plain and straightforward mode of reaching his object. Let him move the Senate that the Committee on Finance be instructed to offer an amendment to the appropriation bill providing for extra pay; and if he gets that resolution through, he will accomplish his object in order; but a resolution by the Senate itself, as a distinct body, ordering its Secretary to pay money cannot be satisfied out of the contingent fund, because that is against the law for the special purpose now in view; and it cannot have any constitutional effect if it is to act upon a general appropriation, because the general appropriation bills provide themselves for the mode in which the money is to be drawn and paid. We cannot ourselves provide in advance what is to be done with an appropriation to be made by both Houses. The Senate alone can take no control over an appropriation that is to be made by both Houses. This resolution contemplates a joint appropriation—an appropriation by a bill or joint resolution; and it assumes in advance that one of the two branches of Congress shall make disposal of it. This branch of Congress has now no power to make disposal of an appropriation that is to be made by both Houses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon the point of order raised by the Senator from Louisiana, the Chair will simply state that it is enough for him to see that the legal effect of passing this resolution is not to take money out of the contingent fund, or any other fund. He has nothing to say upon the argument addressed to the consistency of the resolution. Of course, if the Chair supposed the resolution required money to be paid out of the contingent fund, it would first be obliged to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and then when it came back it would have to receive three readings like a bill; but the resolution does not now direct money to be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. MASON. If I understand the resolution aright, as modified, the Chair is certainly right in its construction. It does not direct money to be paid from any possible source; but it seems to me, with all possible respect to the mover, that the resolution is insensible on its face. It directs the Secretary to pay this money to the employes of the Senate, whenever there shall be an appropriation for the purpose. Now, whenever there is an appropriation for the purpose, the appropriation itself will direct the payment; and it is therefore, as the Senator from Louisiana has well said, a mode of doing indirectly what, if done at all, I think it is due by the Senate to itself, should be done directly. If it be the judgment of the Senate that the officers of the Senate should receive this or any other additional compensation, there is a direct mode of doing it.

I wish to say a few words upon the general subject. When I first came into the Senate some years ago, I found the practice to be for the Senate, at the close of each session, perhaps regularly or irregularly, I do not remember which, to make a compensation, in the nature of a gratuity or a bounty to its officers, so much to the pages, so much to the messengers, &c. It was found, in the experience of the Senate, to be an inconvenient and disagreeable matter, and one of very doubtful expediency and propriety. It was found, also, that the organization of the Senate was leading to the practice which prevailed in the House of Representatives, periodically, at the commencement of every new Congress, to change the officers and bring in a new set, upon some principle of rotation; and, after a good deal of consultation with gentlemen who were far my seniors, who were then in the Senate, amongst whom was General Cass, the late Mr. Clayton, and some others, it was agreed that a committee should be raised, of which those very justly distinguished gentlemen were members, for the purpose of reorganizing the corps of the Senate, and to place things upon a durable footing; and, amongst other purposes, to get rid of this annual allowance, which was at last but the subject of impotency between the officers and members of the Senate.

The committee was raised—the one alluded to by the Senator from Maryland. That committee reported. They increased the compensation of all, or very nearly all, of the officers of the Senate. They increased it not altogether by giving additional salaries, but by making the compensations of all of them permanent, so that their compensation ran from year to year and from session to session. We had a full and free exchange of opinion with all the officers of the Senate at that time, for the purpose of doing it in such a manner as would be agreeable to them, while it would answer the purposes of the Senate, and facilitate the dispatch of public business. The salaries were fixed of every one of them; and one clear purpose was to make the body permanent, and put them at their ease, and to cut off these contingent allowances. The House of Representatives pursued a different course. We know that, in the House of Representatives, always when there is a political change of power, and probably, according to my recollection at the recurrence of each new Congress, there is a general sweep of officers; and the inconvenience that results there, I know from conversation with those gentlemen, is that they bring in inexperienced men in positions for which they are totally unqualified and unfit. We have obviated all that. We have a permanent body of officers here, holding their office by a tenure, the effect of which is to make it permanent. No officer of the Senate can be removed except by a vote of the Senate, or, if done by a superior in power, by those having the appointing power, it must be for reasons to be made known to the Presiding Officer, if the Senate is in session at the time, or to be made known to him at the first meeting of the Senate afterwards, and to have his approbation.

The object was to make the corps permanent, and it has had the effect to give them improved salaries, to make their compensation satisfactory and agreeable to them, and to cut off these contingent allowances at each session. The House of Representatives, as I have said, pursued a different course. But there are many Senators here who say, with the honorable Senator from Missouri, that we have a duty to perform to the officers of the Senate, to place them upon the footing on which the House chooses to put its own officers. I utterly disclaim any such duty. I disclaim any such propriety. We have organized the officers of the Senate in one way, and the House of Representatives have organized their officers in another; and the consequences which may ensue in the House ought not to ensue here. If this movement be persevered in, I shall feel it my duty in good faith, having had something to do with making the present arrangements, to propose that the salaries of these officers be permanently reduced to the old scale, in order that we may put an end to these contingent allowances. I can see no reason in the world why, because the House has done this thing, there is any cause of complaint on the part of any officer of the Senate; but I do say, if persevered in, it will lead to that very disorganization which it was the intention of the committee, to whom I have alluded, to prevent. I should deem it a part of my duty to bring the subject to the attention of the Senate, and to look again into the scale of these salaries, with a view to reduction.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to lay this subject on the table.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator withdraw that motion to permit me to make one reply to strictures made by Senators, and which, I think, places me in an improper light?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would state to the Senator from Missouri that my only object in making the motion is to get rid of the debate. Will the Senator renew the motion?

Mr. GREEN. I will.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. GREEN. My object is to notice very briefly some remarks that have been made against this proceeding. The Senator from Virginia says that the resolution is insensible; and at the same time he says it is an indirect method of accomplishing what ought to have been done by a direct method. My understanding of all indirect proceedings with a design, is that there is a little more sense in them than if they were direct. The resolution, therefore, cannot be insensible.

Mr. MASON. I meant only that the resolution would have no effect per se. It professes to direct the payment of money when it is appropriated; but when the money is appropriated, the appropriation will provide for that.

Mr. GREEN. I shall come to all that. I understand it. There is not a new point in it. The Senator from Louisiana makes a point of order without raising it. He seems, as well as the Senator from Maine, to think that this is an attempt to do what is contrary to law. It is the first time I ever heard a lawyer and a Senator say Congress could not do acts contrary to law; in other words, change a law—change it when and where they please. You have a law, and I have announced to the Senate that my object in proposing this resolution is to place me, in accordance with the rules of the Senate, in such a position that I can legitimately move to change the law pro tanto. Without this, I cannot do it. But the Senator says he would suggest to me that I move a resolution instructing the committee. I choose to respond to him, and say that I have considered this subject, and I know my own method. If he desires to take that method he may adopt it and pursue it. I know I am acting in conformity with law, usage, and the rules of proceeding of the Senate. What does the 30th rule mean when it says that no amendment shall be offered to a general appropriation bill unless reported by a committee, or to fulfill an existing law, or to carry out a resolution of the Senate?

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator, not as to the question of order now; but, if I read the rule rightly, his own object will not be attained by the resolution. I think this is the true construction of the rule: the rule provides that on a general appropriation bill no amendment shall be made, unless it is for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of an existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate. Can there be a doubt, the words being coupled together, "act or resolution," that the word "resolution" means a joint resolution, not a separate order of the Senate? As I view it, if this resolution passes, it being a simple order of the Senate, it will not come within the meaning of the 30th rule, so as to justify an amendment being offered to an appropriation bill.

Mr. GREEN. "Order or resolution of the Senate." Is there any such thing as a joint order? Who, in parliamentary language, ever heard of a joint order?

Mr. BAYARD. "Act or resolution," is the language.

Mr. GREEN. "Act or resolution"—of what body? Of the Senate. A joint resolution is a resolution of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. This is to enable the Senate to pay according to its order, with the concurrence of the House of Representatives, as a matter of course, when it is put upon the appropriation bill; for whenever it goes upon the bill it requires the concurrence of the two Houses; but in order to come within the rules of the Senate to propose it to the appropriation bill, it must be to carry out some resolve of the Senate, or be in fulfillment of some law, or be reported by some committee. Put any other construction upon it, and you make that branch of the rule nugatory.

But the Senator from Louisiana seems to be horrified with the idea of paying these employés of the Senate extra compensation. I find a resolution moved by him and passed since this law, to which reference has been made. On the 17th of February, 1857, I find this entry in the Journal:

"Mr. BENJAMIN, from the select committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of amending the 34th rule of the Senate respecting the standing committees of the Senate, and of regulating the appointment of clerks to committees, submitted a report."

Among the provisions of this report are these items:

"The clerks of the Committees on Finance, Printing, and Claims, shall be permanent clerks, at a salary of $1,860 per annum.

"The clerks employed by all the other committees shall receive a compensation of six dollars per diem during the time of their actual employment, and at the close of the second session of each Congress, shall be entitled to an extra compensation equal to the amount of their per diem for sixty days."

This report not having been acted on, the Senate, on the 14th of March, 1857, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the clerks employed by the standing committees of the Senate, except the clerks of the Committees on Finance, Printing, and Claims, including those committees which have been discontinued by the partial adoption of the report of the special committee, submitted on the 17th February, 1857, shall receive at the close of this session an extra compensation equal to the amount of their per diem for sixty days."

This was on motion of the Senator from Louisiana. On the 16th of August, 1856, two years after the passage of the law alluded to, a resolution was submitted and passed—twenty-one voting for it, and only eleven against it, in these words:

"Resolved, That there be allowed and paid to each of the employés of the Senate, and in the congressional library, for the last session, the same compensation that is allowed to the employés of the House of Representatives, by a resolution of the House of the 15th of August, 1856, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, under the direction of the Committee to Audit and Control the same; and that there be paid out of the contingent fund to Robert Carter and Henry Dodson, and to the folders temporarily employed in the service of the Senate, fifty dollars each."

I refer to these instances because they occurred since the passage of the law to which reference is made. That law may be wise in its provisions; but the Senate has sanctioned a departure from its provisions, and the excuse made by the Senator from Virginia is not satisfactory. There are no life tenures in the Senate. If there be any difference, it might perhaps be supposed the position held by the employés is more precarious in the Senate than in the House, liable to be turned out in a moment; though by resolution they can always be turned out of the House of Representatives in a moment. They are not elected in the House for a definite period of time. Custom keeps them in during a Congress; but they sometimes turn them out before. Custom keeps them in here while they behave well; but they are sometimes turned out even while they do behave themselves. Hence the tenure of office is no reason why they should work at a smaller compensation. How would the Senator like that argument to be made against him? He is put in here for six years, and members of the House of Representatives for two years; and how would he like the argument to be made that members of the House of Representatives must get $3,000 a year, but the Senator from Virginia, having a longer tenure, must only get $2,000 a year? I expect he would demur to it. There is no propriety in such reasoning as that.

There is no difficulty in this question. I have adopted this method because I knew it would be in conformity to rule to deceive no one, to mislead no one, but so as to be in order when the proper time comes to make the motion to amend the appropriation bill; but when the bill is amended, it is the joint action of Congress, and it cannot be said to violate the law, for one law cannot violate another. It repeats it so far as they come in conflict; and if they do not come in conflict there is no violation, and hence there is no difficulty on that subject. However, I believe the Senate understand this subject well enough, and I prefer to have a direct vote, without any further argument.

Mr. BAYARD. I think this rule important in its construction, or it may be hereafter. The honorable Senator from Missouri chose to read the words of the rule, as if it read "an order or resolution." Take the language of the rule, and even if this resolution passes, it will not justify him in moving the appropriation to the appropriation bill. The language is, "some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate." It is very evident there could be no separate act passed by the Senate. "Act" and "resolution" are used conjunctively here, and it must mean joint resolution. If it had not meant that, the language would have been, "some resolution of the Senate." The language is, "some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate," which evidently precludes the idea of a mere resolution by the body alone, without reference to its legislative power in concurrence with the House of Representatives.

Therefore, if it becomes a question, if this resolution be passed, and a movement be made to place it on the appropriation bill, the question of order will be raised under the rule.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. If I understand it correctly, the resolution is entirely hypothetical, and must be without any effect whatever. The resolution directs the Secretary to pay to the employees of the Senate such sum of money as may hereafter be appropriated for the purpose. That is the whole substance of it—if any sum shall hereafter be appropriated for the purpose. Now, what effect can this resolution have? It is hypothetical. It does not affirm that any particular sum shall be paid; but if an appropriation shall be made by a subsequent law to pay them anything, the Secretary shall execute the law and pay it. Now, if a law passes appropriating a sum of money for this purpose, will not the law express the purpose for which it appropriates the money? That is absolutely essential to the appropriation of money. It is itself a direction of the application to a particular subject.

Suppose, then, a law should pass appropriating a particular sum of money exactly as the Senator wishes, to be paid to the clerks: what is the use, then, of this resolution? It will have no effect whatever. But the gentleman supposes it may have the effect of authorizing him to move an amendment to the appropriation bill. It can have no such effect as that, because it does not direct anything to be paid, in general or in particular terms. You are authorized, upon a resolution of the Senate, to move an amendment to an appropriation bill. That is where the Senate has passed a positive resolution, incurring or involving the expenditure of money. It is to carry out a resolution of the Senate that you have the privilege of moving an amendment to an appropriation bill; but does this resolution direct any expenditure? None whatever. If Congress shall hereafter appropriate money—

Mr. GREEN. It is not conditional. It says, to be paid out of money that may be appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. No, sir; the gentleman will find that I am right in his resolution. If a sum of money shall be appropriated, the Secretary shall pay it according to law. The law itself is a direction to him; not only an authority to him to pay, but it is an obligation upon him to pay it, and the resolution becomes useless if the appropriation be made. If the appropriation be not made, then certainly the resolution does not authorize anything. Nor does the resolution authorize any amendment to be made to an appropriation bill, because that authority only exists where the resolution incurs an expense. This incurs none. It is entirely hypothetical, that they shall receive pay if Congress chooses to give it. Certainly, they will receive it, if Congress chooses to give it to them without any resolution whatever, but by force of law, and certainly the gentleman will admit that this resolution appropriating nothing, directing no expenditure, but only providing for an expenditure if an appropriation shall hereafter be made for that expenditure, will authorize under the rule no amendment to be proposed to an appropriation bill.

It is in this view that I regard the subject; and so regarding it, it seems to me it can have no effect, and that it will be an idle proceeding on our part, without any consequence whatever, and that therefore the motion has been very properly made to lay it on the table; a motion which I renew.

Mr. GREEN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bright, Clark, Clay, Clingan, Collamer, Crittenden, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Hammond, Hayne, Henderson, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mason, Pearce, Pugh, Reid, Simmons, Sliedell, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Dixon, Douglas, Fitch, Green, Harlan, Iverson, Jones, Kennedy, Polk, Sebastian, Seward, Stuart, and Thomson of New Jersey—17.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

SHERLOCK AND SHIRLEY.

On motion of Mr. WADE, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 289) for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley.

Mr. WADE. I understood that the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. POLK,] who objected to this bill before, has an amendment to offer, to which I see no objection. I desire to call his attention to the matter, so that he may offer his amendment. There is also an amendment, proposed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, that I suppose will be satisfactory. When these amendments are made, all the objections which have been suggested to the bill heretofore will have been disposed of, and I hope it will be passed.

Mr. YULEE. If the amendment which has already been adopted does not, in the view of the Senate, cover the principle for which gentlemen are contending entirely and exactly, I have another prepared which can be substituted for it. Perhaps it would be as well to read the amendment which was made the other day, and the one that I propose to substitute for it.

The amendment made when the bill was under consideration yesterday was read, as follows:

Provided, That the reexamination herein above authorized shall be confined to the cases of fines which have not been heretofore reexamined and finally decided by a former Postmaster General upon the application of the contractors for remission.

The amendment suggested by Mr. YULEE was read, as follows:

Provided, That no case of any fine or deduction heretofore considered and decided by any former Postmaster General upon the application of the contractors shall be reviewed under the provisions of this act.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope the Senate will consent to take this new amendment. I think it is better than the first.

Mr. YULEE. Both are directed to the same point, but I think the last is a more distinct amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the amendment last read will be substituted for that which was before agreed to. The Chair hears no objection. By unanimous consent the substitution will be made.

Mr. POLK. I desire to offer a further amendment, providing that in taking the proof which may be offered as the basis of the reconsideration, the Postmaster General shall have an opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses. I understand that to be acceptable.

Mr. YULEE. Certainly.

Mr. POLK. My amendment is, to add to the bill as it now stands:

And the Postmaster General shall be authorized to cause the persons to be cross-examined, whose testimony may be offered for the purpose of such examination by him as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were agreed to. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. STUART. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up and pass at this time a House bill to which, I believe, there is no objection. It is the bill (H. R. No. 300) declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases. Its purpose is simply to vest a land warrant that issues after the death of the applicant.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senate have passed the same bill, in substance.

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir. The same bill, in substance, has been already passed by the Senate at this session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides that when proof has been or shall be filed in the Pension Office, during the lifetime of a claimant, establishing, to the satisfaction of that office, a right to a warrant for military services, and such warrants have not been or may not hereafter be issued until after the death of the claimant, and all such warrants as have been heretofore issued subsequent to the death of the claimant, the title to such warrants shall vest in the widow, if there be one, and if there be no widow, then in the heirs of the warrantee; and all such warrants, and all other warrants issued pursuant to existing laws, are to be treated as personal chattels, and may be conveyed by assignment of such widow or heirs, or by the legal representatives of the deceased warrantee, for the use of such heirs only. By the second section it is to be enacted that the provisions of the first section of the act approved March 22, 1852, to make land warrants assignable, and for other purposes, shall be so extended as to embrace land warrants issued under the act of March 3, 1855.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I should like to have some explanation of the propriety of authorizing personal representatives to dispose of land warrants issued to widows or to minor heirs. I believe it has been a little the ambition of personal representatives, in all instances, to draw, as far as possible, all the property of the deceased, real and personal, within their management and administration. I do not think it is entirely wise or proper. A court of chancery may authorize minor heirs to dispose of their property when it is most for their benefit to do so; and I think it is safer to leave that property in the hands of a chancellor, than to authorize universally the administrators of the personal estate to take hold of land warrants granted to widows and heirs. Land warrants are real estate, even before they are located. Is it the policy of Congress arbitrarily to convert them into personal estate, merely to render the disposition of them more facile and easy for personal representatives? I only desire to bring the question to the attention of the Senate. I shall not vote for the bill if this provision be retained.

Mr. STUART. I did not very distinctly hear the honorable Senator from Kentucky, but I will say to him that the great effect of this bill is to give vitality to land warrants issued after the death of the applicant. That is the principle of the bill. The other provisions are in regard to the manner of making the assignments, the whole being subject to such directions as may be given by the Commissioner of Pensions. I do not myself discover any objections to the bill in that respect. There may be some such difficulty as the Senator supposes, but, from the examination I have given the bill, I did not see any practical objection to it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. For the purpose of presenting the question, I move to strike out so much of the bill as converts land warrants into personal estate, and authorizes administrators to sell them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will ask the Senator to reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It is only to strike out; but I did not exactly hear the bill read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. STUART. I will ask the Senate to consider this bill. I will agree to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. PUGH. I have other objections to the bill. I object to its being considered. I think it is a bad bill, and ought not to pass in any shape.

Mr. STUART. I am very sorry the Senator did not make his objections in committee. The Committee on Public Lands unanimously reported the bill.

Mr. PUGH. I was not present. I cannot attend every meeting.

Mr. STUART. Inasmuch as we have it under consideration, I hope the Senate will dispose of the bill. It will not take ten minutes. I move to postpone the special orders to afford an opportunity to continue the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Kentucky proposes to strike out all that which declares the warrant to be personal property, and declares the mode of assignment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is to strike out, from line eleven to line sixteen, the following words:

"And all such warrants and all other warrants issued pursuant to existing laws shall be treated as personal chattels, and may be conveyed by assignment of such widow or heirs, or by the legal representatives of the deceased warrantee, for the use of such heirs only."

Mr. STUART. The effect of that will be to leave them assignable under existing laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan what he means by one provision in this bill. Does he mean where the soldier applies, and dies pending his application, that then the land warrant shall go to the heirs instead of the widow?

Mr. STUART. I will state the effect of the bill. The person entitled to the warrant makes his application, and makes it in such a form as entitles him to a warrant; but owing to the business in the office, it cannot be issued at once; and that being no fault of his, the proof being complete, the bill vests the land warrant as if he were living. That is the effect of the bill. Most of the cases occur where the land warrant is issued after he dies. It is not located; in most cases it does not reach him; and if it does not reach him, by existing laws it is of no avail. The object is to give force to it, as if it had been issued on the instant he made his complete proof.

Mr. PUGH. When this subject was before the Senate a few years ago, on the general revision of the bounty-land system, this very provision was made in half a dozen different shapes; and was debated from day to day, and fully considered, and rejected by a decisive vote. It was then thought by the Committee on Public Lands—for I had the honor to report the bill by the direction of the committee—that it was a very bad extension of a very bad system. The whole system of bounty land warrants is giving the public domain into the hands of non-resident proprietors. If they were actually located by the soldier, there would not be so much objection; but they have got to be a species of land-scrip in the community, bought up by speculators; and there are cases which have come before the committee in which one person, as assignee of a variety of land warrants, has located as much as thirty thousand acres of land at once. The committee at that time having a vast number of petitions and memorials, and amendments of every shape before them, while examining the question, reported the act of 1856—which was supposed to be the furthest extent to which this system could be carried. As I said, this very proposition was made in the Senate, I think by the Senator from Maine; and it was argued, and voted down. But so it is; get an inch, and then, in a year or so, the system is carried much further. The bounty land bill, as it now stands, has granted twice or thrice as many acres as was estimated at the time it passed. It was said it covered so many acres. It has gone far beyond that. It is nothing in the world but a system of distributing the public lands, and distributing them not to actual settlers.

As to the second section of this bill, I warn the Senate that it will produce more mischief than anything else. In the original bounty land act of 1850, on account of the representation that the discharged soldiers of the Mexican war were very poor, and could not go to the various land offices and make application to enter the lands, a proviso was put into the fourth section that the soldier—the original warrantee—might cause the Commissioner of the General Land Office to locate his warrant here for him. We give that privilege to no purchaser. No man can enter an acre of public land at the General Land Office with money; but it was supposed to be a special favor to the soldier; and at that time a land warrant was not assignable—the law did not allow it to be assigned. It did not allow the certificate of location to be assigned. Nothing could be assigned connected with the transaction until the soldier had his title. But in 1852 you passed another act making land warrants assignable; and the consequence is, that the assignee of the land warrant, who buys it for less than a dollar and a quarter an acre, can enter it at the General Land Office; and a man who comes forward with the money cannot. The consequence is, that instead of going to the land offices where the actual settlers can compete, speculators come here with their hands full of land warrants, and enter them at the General Land Office; and there is continual dispute and quarrel between the General Land Office and the local land offices as to the priority of entries. The object of this second section is to extend the assignability of land warrants further, to carry it over to the act of 1855, and thus burden the General Land Office, and make a necessity for more clerks, leading on to the everlasting monopoly of the public domain. If I can get nothing else, I move to strike out the second section.

Mr. STUART. I think my honorable friend from Ohio is mistaken in regard to the second section. I have myself looked at this matter very carefully, and so did the members of the committee who were present when the bill was considered. I did not think, and do not now, that the second section is necessary; but the House thought it was, in order to make these land warrants assignable; that is all. It does not touch the case alluded to by the Senator from Ohio, in regard to locating land warrants here at the General Land Office; and if he will turn to the section that he has alluded to he will see it. It simply makes them assignable. I think they are assignable without it, but the House thought otherwise; and as it was a House bill, there could be no objection to retaining the section, for it only makes the warrants assignable. The effect of the bill, as it stands, is simply to vest title to the land warrant where the applicant dies after making his application, and before the warrant is received by him. That is all there is in it. A class of cases of that sort now exist, where a man has perfected his proof, but there is so much business before the Pension Office that it is impossible to make out the papers during his lifetime. He dies before he receives the warrant, having done everything that the law made it incumbent on him to do. This bill vests that land warrant in his widow, if there is one; and if not, in the heirs; it does no more. By the existing law, the land warrant is of no avail to anybody if the applicant dies before he receives it. Now, sir, the whole effect of the bill, as it stands, is to vest that title, and to make it assignable. It does not affect the question referred to by the Senator from Ohio at all.

Mr. PUGH. That affects the whole question. The original act of 1850 allows the holder to enter it at the General Land Office, but the holder there must be the original warrantee. The assignee could not, because the assignment was forbidden. Now, when you make that assignable, you open the door, and that is the object of this provision; for if they were assignable before, why do you want this section?

As to the other point, we have already provided that, if the soldier is living, he can have the warrant; if he is dead and leaves a widow, the widow can get it; and if he has no widow, the minor children can get it. That is under our present system. We went on the idea that the warrant was a benefit to the soldier, his widow, or minor children, for services rendered, and we refused, on I do not know how many votes—I could tell by looking at the Globe—to extend it to adult heirs; and that is what this bill is intended to do. If the soldier dies before he gets the warrant, the object is to let it go to the adult heirs. We refused that very provision. I shall vote against this bill, if nobody else does; but I insist on my motion to strike out the second section. If they already have that benefit, the section is not necessary, and if they have not got it, I am opposed to giving it.

The motion to strike out was rejected. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. PUGH. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan whether the effect of this bill will be that the land warrant goes to the administrator, so that the creditors may get it, or whether it goes to the heirs?

Mr. STUART. The effect of the bill, with the amendment which has been made to it, as I said, is simply to vest the land warrant in the widow, if there be one living, and, if not, in the heirs of the person who was entitled to it; and the second section makes it assignable, to stand then like existing land warrants received by the applicant before he died.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 44, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Mallory, Pearce, Reid, Rice, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—44.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Fitzpatrick, and Pugh—3.

So the bill was passed.

LIUTENANT T. A. CRAVEN.

Mr. GREEN. I rise to a privileged question. It is to file a motion to reconsider the order of the Senate referring to the Committee on Printing the report made by Lieutenant Craven, of the Atrato and Truando route to the Pacific across the Isthmus of Darien. I shall not call it up for consideration now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FITZPATRICK.) The motion will be entered.

WILLIAM CROMPTON.

Mr. DIXON. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 394) for the relief of Edson Fessenden.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. There is no Senator I would feel more pleasure in accommodating than the Senator from Connecticut, but I trust we shall proceed with the regular order of business, the homestead bill. Is the special order before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is, unless the Senate postpone it.

Mr. DIXON. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection to the bill which I wish to have taken up. It is a matter of very small importance.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. What is the nature of the proposition? Will it give rise to discussion?

Mr. DIXON. I do not think it will give rise to discussion. If so, I shall not press it to-day.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 394) for the relief of Edson Fessenden, conservator of William Crompton, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to extend for seven years from November 25, 1853, the patent granted to William Crompton in 1837, for an improvement in the power-loom for weaving figured and fancy goods. It further provides that the manufacture and sale of the improvement, or of the looms containing it, shall be free to the public, on payment to Edson Fessenden, Crompton's conservator, for the latter's use, fifteen dollars for each loom thus manufactured and sold, which shall not exceed the size required to manufacture cloth three quarters of a yard wide, and in the same proportion for a greater width.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is there any report in that case from the Committee on Patents?

Mr. DIXON. There is a report; but I can state the case in a single word. I think he will make no objection.

Mr. CLINGMAN. As a new Senator, I am reluctant to interpose; but I examined these patent extension cases a great deal in the other House, and I never met with one which I thought ought to pass. In fact, for the last five years, but one has got through the other House, and that was done under the previous question, without a word of discussion. If this bill ought to pass, it is an exception to all bills of like character which I ever had occasion to examine while I was a member of the other House of Congress.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator permit me to state this case? It is an exception. I will barely state very briefly that the inventor in this case has been, ever since the patent was first granted to him, insane, and now is in that condition—hopelessly, incurably so. The Committee on Patents have reported this bill in consequence of his inability to receive any advantage from the patent previous to this time, or at least any considerable advantage. The case was considered by the committee, and the late Senator from South Carolina, the lamented Mr. Evans, said himself that he considered this an exception to all cases of that sort; that he would not report in favor of a single patent extension, except in this one instance. He was about to report this bill when he deceased, and he would have done so before this time, if he had not died. I think the Senator will admit that this is an exception to the class of cases he has mentioned.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to ask whether the original patent has expired, or whether this is a renewal before its expiration?

Mr. DIXON. It expires on the 27th of November next, before the next session of Congress.

Mr. CLINGMAN. How long has he had this privilege—fourteen or twenty-one years?

Mr. DIXON. He will have had it for twenty-one years when the patent expires; but during most of this time he has been in the condition I have mentioned.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then he has already had a patent for twenty-one years.

Mr. DIXON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLINGMAN. And this is a further extension.

Mr. DIXON. It is.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the report will be read. I am so much satisfied that the cases are wrong in principle, that I wish to hear the reading of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report has not yet been returned from the Printer.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I hope the bill will go over; because I have an idea that these cases are wrong in principle. I should like to accommodate the gentleman; but I cannot yield a principle.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I hope we shall proceed with the regular order of business.

Mr. YULEE. I will state that this bill is rather upon the principle of pension than an ordinary extension of patent. The grant has extended in this case two terms, one of fourteen and one of seven years, and has, therefore, been a grant of twenty-one years. The judgment of the committee is against extension by special acts of legislation, in any case, and especially beyond the twenty-one years. This case, however, presented itself as an exceptional one—one which might be treated as an exception to a general rule. It presented itself in this light to the committee: this party had made an improvement which it had been admitted on all hands was a very useful one. Before the expiration of his patent, he became a lunatic, and during the whole of the last term of seven years he has been a lunatic. He became disabled from paying attention to making provision for his own support and for that of a large family. We inquired into the condition of his estate, and found that there were in the hands of his conservator about ten or eleven thousand dollars, the interest on which was not sufficient to provide for his own comfort, nor for the necessary education and support of that part of his family which remained dependent upon him. The manufacturers who were in the use of this improvement, and at whose charge is the cost for the patent, came forward almost in a body and represented that, in their opinion, the extension should be allowed, and that they were willing to pay for it themselves. They were the parties mainly interested. On the other hand it was contended by machinists that the effect of the treatment which the existing patent received at the hands of the conservator, was a restriction upon their trade, because it confined the manufacture of the article to the assignee. They said themselves they would be perfectly willing to pay a fee if the use of the improvement were allowed them. It seemed to us a case in which those who were using the improvement might be permitted to provide for the comfortable maintenance of this lunatic, who had made an improvement which they were using, and which was useful to them. It is rather a case of pension—pension by the consent of those who are using the instrument—to a man who had done them a good. That was the idea on which we acted, and on which we thought it to be altogether an exception.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I would make this suggestion to gentlemen: if it is to be a pension, is it not better to pay it directly out of the Treasury? That will not interfere with private right, but if you pass this bill, there is no telling to what extent it will interfere with private rights. The Senator from Florida says that some of those interested—I do not know how many—are willing that the patentee should have the extension. It is very clear that there must be some understanding between them and him. Possibly those who are pressing it here have agreed that if certain parties will waive all objections, they may go on and use the improvement. I cannot imagine why it is that those who are to be interfered with should consent to the extension, unless there be some understanding of that kind. I would much rather vote money out of the Treasury, if this be a meritorious case—and on that point I have doubts as to all of them—than to pass an act which will interfere, to a very great extent, with private rights. I have had occasion to look into these matters, and am satisfied that, on examination, the Senate will not be likely to extend any of these patents. This bill, however, seems to be founded on entirely a new principle, something of the nature of a pension, and it ought to be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. YULEE. I did not speak of it as a pension, but as in the nature of one, and a pension derived from those who use the improvement. Persons who do not use the improvement contribute nothing; but if they do use it, it is but fair and reasonable that they should contribute to the comfortable support of the man who has given them its benefit.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That is, these gentlemen have been obliged to pay taxes for, say twenty-one years, and it is now proposed that if they use this improvement they shall pay for it further in the form of a pension. I confess I do not see anything in the statement that takes this out of the general principle. By the patent laws you tie up the inventive genius of the country for a limited period. It was originally thought that fourteen years was long enough. If fourteen years was long enough at the foundation of the Government, certainly now much larger profits are made during that period of time than were then. The effect of these laws is to say that when an individual has made a discovery, though another man may make it the next day, the second shall not have the benefit of it, and it turns out that so many of these discoveries are contemporaneous that you often cannot tell who is best entitled; and there are constant disputes about the telegraph and other discoveries as to who was in fact the first discoverer. It seems that the human mind makes one step, and which it does, a number are prepared to carry it forward.

My objection is that by the patent laws you tie up the inventive genius of the country, and no matter what a man discovers, he cannot avail himself of it until the period allowed to the patentee has expired. The existing law allows fourteen years in all cases, and that I think is long enough. This individual, however, has had seven years more, and there is now a proposition to extend his patent still further. I think it would be better to remunerate him out of the Treasury than to interfere with private rights after patents have expired. I make these objections in the hope that none of these bills will be passed without a thorough examination.

Mr. YULEE. The Senator interrupted me, I supposed, for the purpose of making an inquiry, but I have been very much interested in his address.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg pardon of the gentleman; I thought he had concluded his remarks.

Mr. YULEE. I was proceeding to say that while the case excited the sympathy of the committee, there was a reasonable consideration on which it might rest without introducing any new principle. The law as it exists contemplates that a period of twenty-one years is only a reasonable time within which to enable the inventor of a useful improvement to acquire a profit which shall be remunerative to him. It supposes him to be in a condition to make a full use of the grant which the law has made to him, but in this instance, for nine of the twenty-one years, which the law has in all cases deemed to be a reasonable period within which to allow a party by his activity and energy to make a profit from his improvement, this man has been confined in a lunatic cell, and has been unable therefore to supervise his affairs. He has been unable to go into the world and make that profit by the management of his business, which the law contemplated he might within twenty-one years. This excepts it from ordinary cases. There has been no fault on his part, no remissness, no negligence, no sin, which has disabled him from making all the use of the twenty-one years which the law supposes he might do; but it has been his misfortune, on account of a providential dispensation. Under such circumstances, the committee thought a reasonable time ought to be allowed in order that his representative might, by a further attention to the interests of the improvement for seven years, accumulate a sufficient addition to the present estate of the lunatic to provide comfortably for him in the future. It seemed to be a case in which we might reasonably extend the patent, and it is the only case I have ever seen that, to my mind, presented a state of facts upon which I thought we might reasonably extend the period beyond twenty-one years.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move to postpone the bill for a day or two, until we can see the report. I am willing to name any day that may be suggested by the friends of the bill. I move to postpone its further consideration until Monday.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 25) to grant any person who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified.

The pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. CLINGMAN, in the first section of the bill, after the word "entitled," in the fifth line, to insert:

To have issued to him by the Commissioner of Public Lands a warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, to be located in the same manner as that under which the bounty land warrants heretofore issued have been located on any of the public lands of the United States subject to entry, the applicant being required to make proof in support of his claim in such manner and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

So as to make the section read:

That any person who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, shall be entitled to have issued to him or her by the Commissioner of Public Lands, a warrant, &c.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not wish to trouble the Senate with any general discussion of this question; but the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] in his remarks the day before yesterday, appealed to me not to press this amendment, and even said that he doubted whether I could be serious in proposing it. I determined to hear the Senator, as I did with very great pleasure; but it struck me that his objections to this amendment were of such a kind that, on reflection, he will be very likely to abandon them himself; and I rather think he will be disposed to take my amendment in preference to his own proposition. I believe I can in a few minutes satisfy Senators that the only objection which he makes to my amendment lies with equal force against his own bill, while there are several grave objections to his proposition which do not exist to mine.

He says that my proposition will stop the coming in of money into the Treasury; that it will deprive us of all revenue from the public lands. Well, he will see, on a moment's reflection, that his must have the same effect. He proposes that every man who wishes it may go, settle upon, and occupy one hundred and sixty acres of land. Of course, if all those who want land can go and get it for nothing, they will not pay anything. The land warrants which I propose to issue, the titles to land, are mere permits to an individual to occupy it. If I get one of them, it gives me permission to go and occupy one hundred and sixty acres to the exclusion of everybody else. The gentleman's own proposition does that; and the consequence is, that the very moment you provide that every man in this country, who is the head of a family may take possession of the land, without money and without price—your land warrants will sell for nothing. The Senator seems to have confounded the present price of land warrants with what they might be hereafter. A permission to occupy the land is valuable if you can only get it in that way. I might illustrate my view in this way: Suppose there was in the city of Washington a valuable mineral spring, like the famous Saratoga or the White Sulphur Spring, and the man who owned it would allow nobody to use the water without a permit from him: those permits would be valuable. I might be willing to give ten or more dollars for a permit to get that water, and they might bear a price in the market. But suppose he would come out and say he would allow anybody to use the water who thought proper. Then, if a man would come to me and ask me to buy a permit for its use, I would say: "it gives me the privilege of going and taking the water without it, and, therefore, I will give nothing for it." If the public land is made, like the water in the Potomac, free for anybody, of course it can have no price in market. I think, therefore, the Senator, on reflection, will see that if one million, as he estimates, one third of all the heads of families—for he estimates them at three millions—go and take this land, of course, it will be worth nothing in the market. He says that taking up some sections will enhance the value of all the others. Not at all; because any man who wants land may go likewise and get it for nothing. I think, then, this the only objection he offers to my amendment, applies with equal force to his own proposition.

Now look at the objections to his bill. First, its gross partiality. Here is land belonging to all the freemen of the Union. He proposes that a certain set of them shall have the right to occupy it as farmers. Is nothing to be done for manufacturers? Here are our blacksmiths, our shoemakers, our carpenters, whose trades require them to be in their shops. They are interested; they pay taxes to support the Government. Why should they not have the same privilege with everybody else?

Again, even if you limit it to the class of farmers—I put it to the Senator himself—suppose he should go into the State of Tennessee and advocate this measure, and have my proposition submitted; on the other hand, nineteen twentieths of the men he addressed would say to him, "we do not expect to emigrate; we are tax-payers; we are ready to fight for the Government; and why should we not have a land warrant to sell for whatever it would bring?" He will see that my system is free from that objection.

Toward the close of his speech, the Senator made a very ingenious argument of this kind: He says there is land enough to satisfy every man and still leave a surplus; and that, therefore, the effect of his bill is to give an individual his own share, and let him occupy it at once. That looks very well; but when you come to examine the effect of it, you find that a goes and takes up one hundred and sixty acres of land as his share, and then he comes in with all the rest of the citizens for a division. The public land goes to support the Government; to pay the taxes; to furnish soldiers in time of war; and he gets the full benefit of it with everybody else. It is exactly like the case of a head of a family who has a dozen children, and he says to one of them, "I will give you your share of my money and lands." Suppose that one, after getting his share, should remain at the public table and be supported by the family: that would not be fair. The proper course would be for the old man to divide his property among all, and let each live on his share. My amendment proposes that identical thing. It takes every head of a family in the United States and gives him one hundred and sixty acres, so that one cannot encroach upon another. I think, therefore, the Senator from Tennessee will, on a moment's reflection, see that my system is the very one that is calculated to carry out his views; and I hope that he will adopt my amendment in lieu of his bill.

Again: he says there are a great many men about the cities whom he wants to tempt into the country, because they are not doing well in their present position, and become paupers. I grant that; but let these men look at the two propositions side by side. By my proposition they have a title to the land at once; but by his, they have to go there and work on it for five years. Many men will say, "that is paying a great deal, to go into the woods, cut down heavy timber, and labor and sweat five years for a title; I do not think I will go." This view ought to have occurred to the Senator from Tennessee. A great many men may go out there and settle down in the woods, and after working two or three years they may find the place sickly, or they may have some inducement to move away. Under my proposition, each one may sell and move elsewhere. I think, therefore, that a moment's reflection will satisfy the gentleman that mine is the very proposition which meets his views in this respect.

I will present another view for the Senator's consideration. Suppose the public lands were divided among all the States of the Union, and the State of Tennessee, for example, had twenty million acres to dispose of, and the Legislature of Tennessee had control of its disposition; suppose a member should get up in that Legislature and say, "Here we have got twenty million acres in the new States; I propose that every citizen of Tennessee who chooses to leave his own

State, and go and settle on those lands, shall have one hundred and sixty acres; and that every citizen of the United States who chooses may settle on our land;" how many votes would such a bill get? Suppose part of the land belonged to the State of Tennessee: how much would they give, upon these terms, to tempt their people to go away? I ask the gentlemen from New England the same question. Suppose Maine, Vermont, or any of those extreme States, had ten million acres: would their Legislature agree to give land to anybody who would settle upon it, merely to fill up Iowa, or Arkansas, or some new State? Why should not we act just as we would if the land belonged to us in the individual States?

Mr. President, the allusion to those States reminds me that a few years ago, when I came into public life, it was the fashion for gentlemen of that quarter to say that our people were excessively devoted to agriculture; that we were all making breadstuffs; and the result was that for grain and pork we were getting little or nothing, and that to diversify pursuits we must tempt men into manufactures, and they advocated a protective tariff. That is the proposition just reversed. It says that the people are engaged in mechanic arts and manufacturing to a great extent, and we want to get them to go out of these pursuits and embark in agriculture. I ask gentlemen from that quarter if any of them intend to vote for this bill? have they abandoned their old doctrine? have they come to the conclusion that manufactures and the mechanic arts are carried to too great an extent in the United States, and that you must vote away a portion of the public property, to tempt men to engage in agriculture?

It may be that some of those gentlemen are actuated by an argument which was used in conversation by a member from New York; some years ago, in the other House. On the occasion to which I allude, I happened to express some opposition to this bill which was then pending in that House. When I concluded, a gentleman by whose side I sat, said to me, "I agree in the force of your objections, but I have one motive for voting for this bill that you have not down in North Carolina." "What is it?" I inquired. "Why," said he, "I represent a manufacturing district, and if we can take some millions of revenue from the Treasury"—I think the public lands then yielded about three millions a year—"the result will be that we shall get an increase of the tariff." If gentlemen from the New England States ever had any idea of that sort, I think they have seen enough lately to satisfy them that it will be a dangerous game. There is now a deficiency in the Treasury; I believe the public lands last year brought in $8,000,000. If they mean to take away the public lands as a source of revenue, under the idea that they will obtain an increase of protective duties, I think they will be mistaken. The effect will be, most probably, not to come to direct taxation immediately, but to impose taxes upon the free list, just as was done in 1841, when there was found to be a deficiency. If there be a permanent deficiency in the revenue, gentlemen will find that there will be propositions to tax the free articles. I hope, then, if any gentleman is actuated by any such idea as this, he will not allow it to operate upon his mind.

I frankly confess, Mr. President, that I am for retaining the public lands as a source of revenue to the Treasury; but if they are to go, I say let us have an equal distribution. The Senator from Tennessee alluded to the agrarian laws of Rome, to the distributions made there, and their demoralizing effects. Sir, his allusion brought to my mind the fact that we are treading exactly the same course. He will remember that in Rome the first donations of land were made to the soldiers just like our bounty-land system. Afterwards they passed agrarian laws to give land to the poor. That is what he proposes. The third step was to give money, and to give provisions to feed the populace. If you go on with this system, first giving land to soldiers; next giving land to anybody who will take it; finally, when you have exhausted the land fund, the loafers and beggars will get up a clamor, and you must give them something in some other way.

Now, I put this question to the gentleman: suppose you let men have the public lands for nothing: will not those who have already paid for their lands come to Congress to have the money which they have paid refunded? The force of that argument every Senator will feel. Only last week, I believe, a proposition was carried through the Senate, merely upon the idea that the officers here must be put upon a footing of equality with the officers of the House of Representatives. Suppose you give lands away to one third of the citizens of the United States: will not the people to whom you have already sold lands ask you to refund to them the money they have paid?

It strikes me, then, that in every point of view the bill is expedient. I am not, however, Mr. President, to be drawn into any general discussion of the bill. I have offered my amendment in good faith. I have two objections to the bill; first, that it takes the proceeds of the lands from the Treasury; and, second, that it makes an unequal distribution. My amendment meets the latter objection. It cannot meet the former, I admit. I hope that, upon reflection, the Senator from Tennessee will see that my proposition is, in fact, a better one than his. I thank the Senate for having heard me thus far, and I shall no longer trouble them.

Mr. HALE. I should like to hear the first section read, as it will be, if amended, as proposed.

The Secretary read as follows:

That any person who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, shall be entitled to have issued to him or her, by the Commissioner of Public Lands, a warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, &c.

Mr. HALE. The amendment is a very philanthropic and disinterested proposition on the part of the Senator from North Carolina; but I should propose—certainly for his benefit, if for nobody else's—to insert an amendment that every person who is the head of a family, or who, within twelve or eighteen months, shall become the head of a family, shall be entitled to a warrant. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. When I was a member of the other House, I remember that on one occasion when a bounty land bill was under consideration, a proposition was made to except from its operation all members of Congress, and that was done. In the present instance I introduced this proposition because I could vote for it without being affected in this way. I see the difficulty with my friend from New Hampshire, however. He cannot well vote for my proposition, because it gives him a land warrant. If he desires, therefore, to except members of the two Houses, I shall not object. It is not necessary for me to do that to enable me to vote for the proposition; but I am willing, if he feels sensitive on the point, and thinks he cannot give it his support, to put in such a provision—for I do not mean to tempt my friend by holding out this inducement to him. I am willing that he may move an amendment excepting all members of Congress, and then I hope my proposition will have his support.

Mr. HALE. I would rather put mine in.

Mr. HAYNE. Mr. President, it is not my intention to detain the Senate; but I desire to state a fact or two. If it were desirable that the Government of the United States should give lands free of cost to the people, the period for it would have been immediately after the revolutionary war. At that time I should have voted for such a measure; but now, sir, I cannot do otherwise than sustain the amendment of my honorable friend from North Carolina. I entirely concur with him. I say, decidedly, that the whole system of giving away the public land in my day has been unjust in every respect. There has been no justice; there has been no equality; there has been no good sense; there has been no fairness in the system.

The truth is, sir, in this country, that a man who cannot sustain himself is a drone; he is not worthy of protection in a country where every man goes ahead who has any strength of will, or any firmness, or any character. Measures like this, that give your lands away, will destroy enterprise in that class to whom you give them. It will make them drones in the human hive.

Why, sir, look at the effect of the system you have pursued. Some time ago you passed a law giving bounty lands to the officers and soldiers who had served in any of the wars in which the country had been engaged. Why did you not pass a similar law for the officers and seamen of the Navy? What is the difference between them? Are not the sailors as much entitled to it? Look at their conduct in the war of 1812. Sir, England would this day give $500,000,000 if the Guerriere had conquered the Constitution; and if the Guerriere had conquered the Constitution, I believe all our victories would have been lost; the tables would have been turned, and we should have exactly occupied the condition England did—beaten, beaten, beaten everywhere. I object in toto to the system of donations to the officers of the Army and not to the Navy. How did you dispose of that land to the Army? There was no gradation in it; but just the reverse. A drummer of the regular Army or volunteer corps was put upon a footing with Major General Scott—one hundred and sixty acres for each. I guard Senators not to act upon principles of that kind. The public domain is valuable. You are now suffering for want of money; or, rather, you are in imaginary suffering, for our credit is as high as it ever was, and it is as easy to get money now as if our tariff gave us an excess; and we ought to do whatever should be done, without any regard to the present crisis. I shall vote for the amendment of my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I think the honorable Senator from North Carolina falls into an error in supposing that the object of the homestead bill is to make a gift to anybody. I understand the ground on which it rests to be simply this: that the person who, with his family, goes upon one hundred and sixty acres of the public domain, and occupies and cultivates it for five successive years, earns it and becomes entitled to it. I do not intend to detain the Senate, but simply to call them back to the first principles upon which all title to real estate rests. It rests upon occupancy, and upon nothing else, by the law of nature and of nations. I will read a single extract upon this point from a learned author, whose authority will be universally acknowledged:

"The only question remaining," says Judge Blackstone, "is, how this property became actually vested, or what it is that gave a man an exclusive right to retain in a permanent manner that specific land, which before belonged generally, to everybody, but particularly to nobody. And, as we before observed that occupancy gave the right to the temporary use of the soil, so it is agreed, upon all hands, that occupancy gave also the original right to the permanent property in the substance of the earth itself, which excludes every one else but the owner from the use of it. There is, indeed, some difference among the writers on natural law, concerning the reason why occupancy should convey this right, and invest one with this absolute property—Grotius and Puffendorf insisting that this right of occupancy is founded on a tacit and implied assent of all mankind; that the first occupant should become the owner; and Barbeyrac, Titius, Mr. Locke, and others, holding that there is no such implied assent, neither is it necessary there should be, for, that the very act of occupancy alone, being a degree of bodily labor, is, from a principle of natural justice, without any consent or compact, sufficient of itself to gain a title—a dispute that savors too much of nice and scholastic refinement. However, both sides agree in this, that occupancy is the thing by which the title was, in fact, originally gained; every man seizing to his own continued use such spots of ground as he found most agreeable to his own convenience; provided he found them unoccupied by any one else."—Blackstone's Commentaries, book 2, chapter 1, page 8.

Sir, by the law of nature and of nations actual occupancy of real estate is the only basis upon which a title to it rests. In giving my support to the homestead bill, as it has been introduced by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, I do so, not upon the ground that I am voting to give to any person a title to the land, but to grant land to the person who actually enters upon it, and occupies it for five years in succession, mingling his own labor with the soil, and setting up and perfecting in himself the title to real estate in the only manner in which that title can be set up by the law of nature and of nations. In saying this, I do not wish to be understood to say that Government may not by conventional regulations establish other title to real estate. I do not question at all the legal title of the Government, or of any individual to land which may be derived from the Government, although not actually occupied. That, however, is a legal right, based upon the law itself, established by the Government, and not the right, as based upon the law of nature and the law of nations. The true policy in our legislation, it strikes me, is to conform as nearly as we reasonably and practically can to the law of nature and of nations. In giving my support to this bill, I do not vote, as I understand it, to make a donation to anybody, but simply to grant the lands to those persons who actually earn them, pay a consideration for them, and that consideration which, by the law of nature and of nations, gives the best title to real estate—actual occupancy.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I come from one of the old States, and I appreciate the appeal that has been made by the Senator from South Carolina, in regard to the manner in which the public domain has been administered. It is fifteen years since I was first a member of Congress. From that time to the present my observation has taught me, and my convictions have strengthened, that the old States have nothing on earth to expect from the public land. Various attempts have been made at various times to interpose something in their behalf, but the day has gone by—no, sir, it has not gone by; it never existed. They never have got anything, and they never will, and they never can. The only satisfaction the old States can have is, that the domain was procured by their blood and treasure. The benefits of it are to go to the new States. I know it, and it is useless to contend against it.

I live in New Hampshire, one of the severest climates, and one of the most ungrateful soils, perhaps, of any State in the Union. I know it is utterly idle to indulge the hope that all our young men, as they grow up, will stay with us. No, sir; they will go out; and they will go out and people the new States and Territories. I have traveled somewhat extensively in the West, and wherever I have gone, I have found the young men of New Hampshire, who have left her severe climate and ungrateful soil, and gone out to this western country and settled. Some of them, like my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] come back here as Senators occasionally. But as they are to go out and settle there—and they will go out, and we cannot keep them at home—all we can do is, to give them our blessing and our title to the land. Let them have it; I am willing they shall take it.

But now I want to say a word that has been brought out by an allusion made by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, in regard to a class of men who are not particularly interested in this bill—I mean the agrarians. It is customary and it is fashionable, and it has been for more than eighteen hundred years, when you wanted to put a thing down in everybody's mind to denounce it as agrarian; and the idea has been prevalent that if you could fasten upon a proposition the term "agrarian," you made it odious to every honorable mind. Sir, if there ever was a class that the page of history has brought down to this country that is entitled to the commendation, to the warmest gratitude, to the admiration of every philanthropic and democratic heart, it is that much-abused class upon whom history has heaped her labels for eighteen hundred years—the agrarians. The discoveries of the modern historian have brought no more grateful tribute to the altar of truth, than the redeeming that much-abused class from the odium which has so long rested upon them.

Sir, the agrarians of the olden time were the friends of humanity; they were the patriots; they were the honest, the upright, the bold, and the unflinching advocates of equal rights, equal laws, and equal privileges. It is a mistake, a gross mistake, to say that the agrarians ever contended for what it is so fashionable to attribute to them at the present day—an equal distribution of property and of the public land. No, sir; the agrarians saw in olden times, as the agrarians see to-day, that the public domain of the Republic of Rome, after it had been won by the blood and treasure of the common people, the plebeians, was engrossed in the hands of an aristocracy, and that they had no part or lot in it. They saw, and they felt, as agrarians have seen and felt ever since, that the part which society required of them was to labor, to toil, to go to battle, to fight, and to die, and to conquer territory from other nations; and, when it was acquired, to see it grasped, absorbed all in the hands of a grinding and an inexorable aristocracy; and when they saw that they strove against it. I do not care what you may say of any of those who figure upon the page of history, the warmest sympathy of my heart and its deepest gratitude is due to those much-abused, calumniated agrarians, the old Gracchi of Rome, who were slain by a mob composed of the men of property and standing in Rome.

Sir, it is that same spirit to-day which would lock up your public domain, and keep it to be doled out to great gigantic corporations, and to be dealt with in any other way except to make it what I believe God Almighty intended the world should be when he did make it, and that was a home for man to live on. Sir, I want to see the country come up to that. If they will not quite come up to looking on the earth as a place for man, it will be some beginning if they look on it as a place for white men to live on; and when they have realized that idea, perhaps, by and by, in the progress of truth, such light may dawn on us that we may work our spirits up to the conviction that God actually intended that black men should live upon the earth somewhere.

It is in view of this that I shall make up my mind to go for this bill. My State, as such, will never be benefited by it one dollar; it will be injured; but I know, when we have such men as my friend from Michigan, we cannot keep them; they will go; and the only question is, whether we shall give them a homestead and blessing, or give them a blessing without a homestead? that is all. I am willing to give them a blessing and a homestead too. It is for the reason that I know it is hopeless to think the old States will ever get any benefit from the public domain that I am willing to give it to men who will cultivate it.

I sympathize a good deal with what was said by the Senator from Wisconsin; but I do not go quite so far as he did. I think, in a primitive state of society, before they got to making deeds and signing and sealing, occupation was a good title; but since we have had courts, they have got an idea, somehow or other, that these papers, wax-seals, hand-writings, &c., do sadly interfere with the right of occupancy, squatting, or whatever you please to call it. That might do as a theoretical disquisition upon a new world, if God should see fit to make one and give it to us; and I do not know that it would not be good philosophy; but at the present day it would not do. These ugly deeds, these seals, these signatures, and these courts who enforce them, are great obstacles in the way of the idea of possession. I know that possession is a good title in law. It is said to be, I believe, nine points out of ten. But, aside from all that, I think the best thing you can do with the land is to give it away. I do not mean to give it away in the way it was distributed to the Wisconsin Legislature [laughter;] but I mean to give it away in something like the way proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, or I am not entirely certain that I do not prefer the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina; but one of the two. For these reasons, I shall give the measure my support.

Mr. HOUSTON. Without designing to commit myself exactly to all the provisions of this bill, I must object to the amendment of the honorable gentleman from North Carolina. I cannot see how the object of the Senator who introduced the bill would be accomplished by giving this universality to its provisions, nor can I see any benefit to result to the country from that. He contemplates an increase of revenue from the plan he has devised, and argues very reasonably that, by settling on alternate quarter sections, the remaining quarter sections will be so much more valuable that the Government of the United States will be benefited. With a single eye to revenue, I am inclined to believe it would enhance the value of the remaining portions of the land if one half of our entire domain were given away in alternate quarter sections to actual settlers. If you grant to each occupant of the soil a quarter section upon condition that he resides upon it for five years, improves and cultivates it for that length of time, I think it may be regarded as a consideration remunerating the United States for the value of the uncultivated wild land when he went upon it. If this is the consideration that is to be given, I think, so far as the Government is concerned, it would be an exorbitant remuneration for the hazards, the inconveniences, and risks which new settlers encounter on the frontier. This, then, would not be a donation, but it would be granting the land in consideration of services rendered to the Government fully equivalent to its value.

It is only intended for persons who will encounter these difficulties, and who will encounter the labor and toil incident to a new settlement in the wilderness. If, however, you were to adopt the amendment of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, there would be no equity or justice in the measure. It is intended to induce the emigration from the overstocked communities of the country of such persons as could be spared from there, where they are in a miserable condition, who would improve their condition by emigrating to a new country, where they would have stimulation to enterprise, and where every advantage would result to them individually; while, at the same time, it would disembarass the great cities which have a surplus populace. In this way, thousands would become industrious and productive citizens, who otherwise would become paupers or miserable dependants, demoralized, and demoralizing society. It would have a tendency thus to relieve society of that surplus population which is unproductive, and set it to work to fell our wilderness, to reduce to cultivation and to improve the public land. Looking at it in its effect on the Government lands which will come into market, it would certainly be a great advantage to the Government.

If, however, you are to issue warrants to all heads of families in the United States, what would be the consequence? Could it possibly produce any revenue to the country? Quite the contrary would be the case. The bill will give the needy an opportunity of possessing the land, who will render in its cultivation a consideration for the five simple of the soil; you will be conferring a benefit on them; and you will be stopping speculators from grasping the whole public domain of this country. If, however, you issue warrants to all heads of families in the United States, the market will be stocked with them; they will fall to five or ten cents an acre. Millions of families in the United States would not think of abandoning their residences and going to the frontier. The warrant would be worthless in their pockets, and they would have to sell it for a merely nominal amount, and thus the public domain would be monopolized by speculators who would grasp the surplus warrants issued to persons who would not go and occupy the soil. The market would be glutted with them, and you could not bring your public domain into market; and why? Because you would get no bidders for it. If warrants were to be got at ten cents an acre, could you sell public lands at $1 25 an acre? Not at all. Under that system the land would pass into the hands of speculators, and you would derive no revenue from it. On the other hand, your revenue is not impaired if you give the domain to those who are not able to purchase it, but who will occupy it, and prevent its falling into the hands of speculators.

I cannot vote for a measure that is calculated to prejudice the revenue directly without benefiting individuals. You will confer no benefit on the head of a family who is independent, by giving him a land warrant. Sir, that is the agrarian system that was established by Rome when provinces were conquered. A portion of a conquered province distributed to the head of every family in Rome. That was agrarianism in Rome. It was not to the occupants it was given, and hence it built up speculators in the city of Rome, and produced such an inequality of wealth, such a love of splendor and affluence, that it demoralized and denationalized Rome, and prepared it for a master; and it got the best that it could have selected from Rome when it got Cæsar, because he was better than Pompey; and Rome was prepared for a master, and she was obliged to have one.

But, sir, we need no Cæsars nor Pompeys here.

Distribute the people upon the frontier; render them agriculturists; attach them to the soil; and then, when liberty might even perish in the center, upon your outskirts you will have men attached to the soil, who derive their living from it, surrounded and sustained by their families reared upon it. You may appeal to them to rally to the center, and, by an outward influence, crush tyranny. It is there, sir, you are to find liberty. Give to the needy, who will become industrious. None others will go to your frontier to occupy your vacant territory. Give not to those who have superabundance, and would not turn a hand to fell a tree, or to dig the soil of the virgin earth of our forests. No, sir, I will not vote for the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not think the Senator from North Carolina has clearly taken in the scope of the amendment he proposes. I thought that, in the few remarks which I made the other day, I demonstrated most conclusively that this bill would be a revenue measure; that, instead of giving away the public property, it would increase the public revenue. The honorable Senator has not attempted to answer my argument on that point, but merely presses his amendment in preference to the bill. When we examine his amendment practically, what is it? It proposes to issue a warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land to each head of a family in the United States. What is the effect of that? There are three million heads of families in the United States; and the enormousness of the proposition can be seen at once by a very simple calculation. Multiply three millions by one hundred and sixty, and you have four hundred and eighty millions. This is a proposition to throw four hundred and eighty million acres of land on the market in the shape of warrants, which will not sell for a cent an acre. The result will be that the warrants will be bought up by land-jobbers and speculators at a mere nominal price, and your public domain will pass into the hands of large proprietors and capitalists; and, in process of time, the men who want homes, and who could even pay a moderate price for them, will not be able to obtain them unless at the exorbitant price which speculators may demand. From the origin of the Government to the present time, the entire amount of receipts into the Treasury from the public lands has been $170,000,000. Estimating the lands at one dollar an acre, we have disposed of one hundred and seventy million acres in sixty-nine years. Here is a proposition to throw at once upon the market four hundred and eighty million acres, though we have only been able to use up one hundred and seventy millions from the origin of the Government to this time. This is an enormous proposition. It is a proposition in fact to waste and squander all the public lands at once; to pass them into the hands of speculators at a single blow. We can readily see the effect that must have upon our land system.

I was in hopes that when the Senator came to consider it seriously, he would not press such an amendment; but he persists in it. Cannot every one see that its adoption will cut off all receipt of revenue from the public lands?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Does this bill confine the settlement to alternate sections?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman's estimate is, that one million heads of families will take the benefit of this bill. That goes upon the supposition that one third of the people will remove from their present homes. Now, I ask him if one third of the people go from their present homes and get land for nothing, will there be anybody else to buy land in the market? Then, does not the bill effectually destroy all revenue from the public lands?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. By our land system, as it now stands, there is no trouble in answering the interrogatory. How many men enter land that do not emigrate to it? The effect of having the alternate sections settled by cultivators, would be to make it more desirable for persons to enter lands adjoining the sections occupied by the cultivators.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Men now enter lands without intending to go and settle on them, but they do it because they intend to sell the land to some man who will settle on it; but if every man has the privilege of taking land without a warrant, will anybody buy a warrant? Surely not; for he will be able to get land without it. Of course, then, the land warrants must be worth nothing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. If the Senator will reflect upon the practical operation of the land system, I think he will perceive that many men will go and enter a quarter section upon the principles of the bill for the express purpose of taking up the next quarter section to it, and paying the Government price for it even if it were increased. When each alternate section shall have been entered, you will find thousands upon thousands who will go and enter the land because it is coming into market, and will be valuable. This bill will increase the receipts; it will increase the amount of land entered instead of diminishing it. How many men will go and settle upon a quarter section for the express purpose of obtaining the next? Thus, in its practical operation, it will increase instead of diminishing the amount of land brought into market.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the gentleman what is to be done with the mechanics? Every country needs mechanics. They are not cultivators of the soil. I think he will admit with me that it would be unjust to say that no man should have this land unless he would shoe a horse. That would benefit the blacksmith, but it would be unfair to everybody else. If you exclude all mechanics whose trades and occupations will not let them take the land, I ask if, at any rate, the Senator ought not to be in favor of an amendment to give every mechanic in the country a warrant?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. If a mechanic is the head of a family, he can go on the lands and build his blacksmith shop, or anything else, and at the end of five years he can get a title to the land.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman does not understand my question. His own State of Tennessee and my State have mechanics, and must have them. Now, if all the blacksmiths, for instance, were to go to these lands, and settle on them, what would become of the community? They must stay; and why should not all men employed as mechanics, in all the States, who have no farms, get a warrant for one hundred and sixty acres each, as I propose?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Is not a mechanic placed in the same position as anybody else, if he emigrates to a quarter section of one hundred and sixty acres, enters upon it, cultivates it, and possesses himself of the soil? The bill covers the precise case. So far as mechanics are concerned throughout the country, their number is always regulated by the demand, and each old community will retain that number of mechanics who will be justified in remaining for the prices they get. As settlements advance in the West, mechanics become necessary, a tailor here, a shoemaker somewhere else; and they will settle down on land under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman says that the mechanic may have land if he will go and settle on it, but he cannot do that consistently with his interest. In the case I put, if it were proposed that every man who can shoe a horse shall have public land, it might be said every man might do it if he chose; but many of us cannot do it. Well, these men have an occupation which they have to abandon if they go into the woods. Why, therefore, put them into these straitened circumstances when they pay money to support the Government, and have as much right as others to the land? So in regard to sailors; is our Navy to be abandoned? Will not the gentleman, at any rate, go for an amendment to give every sailor a land warrant? If you tempt them all off the sea, what is to become of our commerce? So of the soldiers who are fighting the battles of our country. We have given warrants to some, but those who are in the regular Army in time of peace, get none. Will not the Senator at least include these classes?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I am constrained to say that I do not see the solidity and force of the argument of the honorable Senator. A sailor can go if he thinks proper, but if it is to his interest to remain on the ocean and plow the deep, he will do so. If it is his interest to go West and become an agriculturist, he will do so. So far as the old soldiers are concerned, I think it is dealing liberally with them. Notwithstanding they have received their land warrants, they, being heads of families, can still go and emigrate and occupy one hundred and sixty acres of land under this bill. It would be a very great advantage to many of these old men. They are living, many of them, in the old States, and they have no land, although they have had land warrants. Under the limited system of granting bounty land warrants to old soldiers, we have seen them run down to less than a dollar an acre. Many of those old men have scarcely got anything for their land warrants after receiving them under law. Would it not be better for many of them who have families around them, being too old to work themselves, to emigrate with their boys and girls and settle on land, make them a home, lay a foundation for them, instead of relying on a piece of paper which is to be issued, go into the market, and sell for a merely nominal value?

Four hundred and eighty million acres are proposed to be thrown upon the market by the gentleman's amendment. You have only brought into your Treasury since the commencement of the Government $170,000,000 from public lands. He proposes, by a single amendment to the bill, to throw upon the market enough to supply it for the next one hundred years. Can the Senate vote for such a proposition as that? These land warrants would not sell for one cent an acre. Who would get them? Into whose hands would they pass? Can we experiment on a proposition like this? Capitalists and speculators would take charge of the public domain under it, and the Government be deprived of the power to dispose of it in a proper manner.

Mr. REID. I do not desire to discuss this subject at length; but, sir, it does seem to me that the proposition of this bill, in our country, to say the least of it, is a monstrous one. What is the proposition? It is to give one hundred and sixty acres of public land to every head of a family who may settle upon them for the term of five years, whether he be rich or poor. The argument, then, is not to give it alone to the needy, but the wealthiest man in the country may avail himself of this bill, and obtain one hundred and sixty acres of public land. It is maintained that by giving the alternate quarter sections you advance the value of those remaining to the Government; and that thereby the Federal Treasury loses nothing. How stands the fact? This bill does not raise the price of the remaining quarter sections; but they will remain to be entered and sold according to the present price, and thus the Government must lose one half the land, at least. Mark you, sir; the provisions of this bill, as I understand it, are not limited to any particular period of time. It has relation to all time to come. When those who have no land now shall go and avail themselves of it, their children may do so too. Neither do the provisions of this bill confine the selections to alternate quarter sections; for it says that shall be done "as far as practicable." When the alternate quarter sections are all taken up, it will become impracticable, and consequently the remaining sections will be taken. That is the fact, as will be seen by reading the bill. So it will, in effect, be the giving away of the entire public domain.

The argument of some Senators seems to be that the public lands possess no value. I maintain that anything has that value which it will bring in the market. If the public lands are worth nothing, it is bad policy in this Government to be expending hundreds of millions of dollars in their acquisition, and hundreds of millions of dollars in the survey and other expenses which attend the land system. It is true, the public lands have not commanded a high price; and wherefore? For the reason that this Government has always forced into market more lands than the demands of the country required. We are a growing country; let us not dispose of the public land too rapidly. I am in favor of a liberal system in regard to the pioneers who go into the new Territories, and I think the Government has been liberal towards the settler. I think the Government should be liberal. But the public lands have been acquired by the treasure of the whole country; and here is the Senator from Tennessee, who offers to make this appropriation. It is an appropriation of land, it is true, but that land is worth money. I do not know of any peace measure on the face of the earth which my friend from Tennessee would vote for that appropriated a similar amount of the public money; and this is not an equal distribution, but a partial one, giving to persons who desire to avail themselves of particular opportunities that may be offered to them by the Government.

I am willing that the young men or the old men from the older States of the Union may emigrate to the West, or anywhere else where they think they can better their fortunes; but it is not justice to the old States of this Union to hold out inducements, bribes, to entice their population to the newer ones. They possess sufficient advantages already; they have the most fertile lands upon the face of the earth, that may be bought for $1 25 an acre. These are great inducements, giving those States decided advantages over the older ones. Here you propose to give land to every man who will settle in the new States. I say it is not only to give it to those persons who may now avail themselves of it, but it is to give it for all time. What is to be the effect?

If it is desired, in this country, that the Federal Government should provide a tract of public land for every man, you must go further and introduce the feudal system, because he may not occupy it after he has once acquired it. After you have provided him a home, the tendency of things will be that you must perpetuate it to him and his successors, or they might still be without a tract of land. The tendency of things in this Government is too much to look to this capital, the center, the Federal Government. It is swallowing up too much. We see a thirst for office and for claims upon the Federal Government; men desire to live and feed upon this Government; and that tendency is increasing every day. If you take millions and give them to the people of the country in an unjust and unequal distribution of what belongs to the whole, giving to only a part, do you not increase this? If the public lands have no value, then they are of no use to those who may avail themselves of this act. If they have a value, then what you give them is a gratuity, voted from the Federal Government without authority. The framers of the Constitution never contemplated that the Federal Government should furnish homes for the people of the States of this Union. Neither does it bring it within the purview of the Constitution to change it from lands to money, because the lands have been acquired by money, and have a money value.

Mr. President, I think this bill ought not to pass. In the whole history of my experience here, I do not think I have ever seen a measure of more dangerous tendency to the country than this. If you vote homes to those who desire them now, you must continue it as long as the Government lasts. If you give my neighbor a home, if he desires it, perhaps I shall come up and ask for one when I desire it, or say that you have treated me unjustly. Let the system that has been pursued in regard to the public lands be continued—not exactly the system, for I think the old States have lost a good deal under it; but under the system now proposed they are to lose it all. I have heretofore voted with much pleasure to give public lands to those who have taken up arms in defense of their country. I would do so again. By keeping the surplus domain which is not needed, you have an inducement for men, when the rights of their country are involved, and it is necessary for them to take up arms, to fight for the cause of their country. The Government has expended money on these lands. Let us dispose of them according to the wants of the Republic, and keep the remainder for the increase of our population from time to time.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, it seems to me that the only theory of the bill is a very beautiful one; but when you put it into practical operation it will be found to be attended with a great many inconveniences, and liable to a great many objections. The theory of the bill supposes that it is to make all the idle and worthless persons in the community farmers, agriculturists, good citizens. I think it will not have that effect. It may be a donation to some individuals who will make a good use of it, and become good and useful citizens; but they will be found, I think, in practice, to belong to that class who would have no difficulty in making a purchase of the public lands at such prices as we ask for them; and the very fact of their becoming purchasers, and of their having to obtain their land by the payment of the earnings of their labor, would attach them to it and make them use it profitably. But if you take an idle man and thrust him upon a piece of your land, what can you hope for? You cannot change his nature, or the character which former habits have impressed upon him; he will still be the same useless member of society. I think the bill will accomplish much less of good than is anticipated, and it will be attended with much more of evil consequences than its supporters anticipate.

What is the effect of it as to the old States, and all the other States, except where the land which is given so generously is situated? It is a temptation to their people to leave them. Can they feel an interest in that? It may be said to them "you can have no objection that your fellow-citizens should leave their several States if they can thereby benefit themselves and families." They would say to that, "certainly we ought not to oppose that; but is it certain that they will be benefited by it?" It is offering a premium for emigration from all the States of the Union to the particular spot where the land you give is situated. Is that fair and equal? I am aware that there is a notion of general benefit connected with this system; that it is for the benefit of all to improve any particular part; but the particular parts must be allowed to calculate the disadvantage and prejudice they sustain by this sort of withdrawal of their citizens, and the temptations held out to those citizens, and to the cupidities of those living at a distance to overestimate those advantages which are offered, and which look bright in the distance.

The condition that when a man has made his choice he shall live there five years, be imprisoned, as it were, five years, in order to consummate his right, seems to me trammeling up your donation in such a way that the most enterprising and useful part of the poor of this country will hardly subject themselves to it for a home; they will hardly pay that price.

Again, sir, how will those citizens living in that particular country to whom you have sold lands which do not come within the terms of your donation be satisfied, when they have been compelled to enter and pay for their lands, to see another come by their side and get land free of cost, very little different in condition? The one has sold a little piece of land as necessary to his removal, and therefore he cannot accept this donation.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that the bill contains no such restriction as that. It has no reference to owning any other land, or having sold it for that purpose.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The bill, as I read it, does. It provides, in the first place, that he must be landless, and in the next place he must swear that he has not sold any land for the purpose of receiving this gift.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I would call the Senator's attention to the fact that a section was adopted in lieu of the original second section, not embracing that provision at all.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I find that the section as now modified does not contain the idea the original section did, but now, under the provisions of this bill, the richest man in the community may make himself the donee of our land.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I will state what the section means, as I understand it, and what I intended it to mean. The consideration the Government asks for the land under this bill is that a man shall settle upon it, and cultivate it for five years. It says to the rich man or the poor man, or the middle-class man, if you settle upon it, and pay that price, you shall have it. It discriminates between none, but places all on the same footing.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. If I understand it, this bill is to give land—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. It is a grant on condition that the grantee will settle, occupy, and cultivate the land.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The rich man or the poor man is to be equally entitled to the land if he complies with the conditions. Why should that be? That is nothing else but a premium for quitting your habitation, wherever it may be, and going to settle in this favored spot. I have said that it was no advantage to the old States to have their population drawn off in this way. Now, what advantage will it be to the Union? Are not our people going westward and westward to the remotest parts of our extensive territories rapidly enough? Is not the spirit of enterprise, the hope of distant acquisition, enough to make our people emigrate? Was there ever such an emigrating people as ours are? Do we want to add a stimulus to this spirit? Does it contribute to the public strength? Does it contribute to the public wealth to be scattering our people all over our vast dominions faster than natural causes do? I think we shall act most wisely when we leave to natural causes the emigration and scattering of our people. They will go where their real interest, their real comfort, and their real advantage, lead them, without the allurements of legal contributions from the public property to aid or to tempt them. I am for leaving this course of things to natural causes, without this temptation.

Besides, how do we hold the public lands? Do we hold them simply to give them away? No, sir. We hold them for the whole people of the United States. Can any argument persuade the people of the United States that these lands are disposed of for the equal and common benefit of all, by giving them to those who will leave their ancient homesteads, and go and seek another in a place to which they are tempted by your gratuities or largesses? Is that to the equal benefit of all, or is it not to the peculiar local advantage of the spot to which you tempt them to carry their wealth, their labor, and their industry? Would they not be as valuable, as estimable, in every point of view, and as comfortable, remaining in their ancient homesteads, as when you tempt them off, by these allurements, to make settlements upon distant frontiers?

I see no public interest in it; I see no justice in it. It is not even entitled to be regarded as almsgiving, because you give not to those who need, but to the rich as well as to the poor; you give that which belongs to the poor in effect to the rich. The poor of my State, for instance, have as great an interest in the public land as the people where it is located; and there are many of them whose comfort and whose advantages in life would be promoted, if they could realize and have in possession at once, where they live, their share of this great common fund; but you take it from them, and you give it away to the rich. You take from the poor to enrich the rich. That may be its operation.

But, in a more general point of view, what is its effect even in the neighborhood where you would settle persons upon land given without price? One goes there, buys land, and settles; and another, and another; and that is the enterprising and valuable portion of your people. They have shown their virtue and shown their labor; and by their works have made themselves able to own, and worthy to own, a homestead. They go, and how do you treat them?

Here is a worthy man, competent enough to pay the expense of removing himself and family. He goes there, and is a man of sturdy independence. He asks no alms; would accept of no charity. He buys his land; you make him pay for it; and you give land to another man by his side in as good circumstances as he is. Is that equal, unless you mean to give it all away? If you mean that, what then? What is the value of the land in the neighborhood which has been bought and paid for with a price? What effect have these donations upon the price of the lands? Do they not reduce it? If the Government is giving away farm upon farm, section upon section of land, what becomes of the value of the land of the man living adjoining, who has bought and paid for his tract? When land is to be had for the asking of it, what price can you get in money for that which adjoins it? You not only give away that which belongs to the public, but you cheapen; and you cheapen in the hands of the farmer who has bought and paid for his land that very land for which he has paid a price.

Moreover, Mr. President, the lands not only in the vicinity, but the lands in the region all about, are reduced in their market value, because these given lands can be bought cheaper, and after the five years are out will be sold cheaper. There will not be two prices for land; the cheaper lands will fix the maximum value—these lands that have been given. That will be the consequence. How far that will extend I do not know. I know there is a common opinion even in Kentucky, that the price of our lands has been cut down by the low rate at which the public lands sell in the adjoining States, and that Kentucky has lost as much in the reduction of the price of her lands as has been gained by those who have settled in the new countries. Where, then, is the gain? On one side it must be a great gain at somebody's loss. It is at the loss of the old States near which these settlements are made.

I believe, Mr. President, upon the whole, it is best to leave our people free to make their livelihood as they can. Your Government gives them all encouragement. If they want land, you sell it to them at a very moderate price. Under your graduating laws, they may get lands that will not cost them more than twelve and a half cents. Lands that have been in market such a length of time, are reduced in price; for a greater length of time, there is a further reduction. You not only give land by this bill, but you give a preference to the man who has not made himself able to acquire that on which the manhood of an American citizen ought to rest—the ability to maintain himself, and have purchased with his own money, obtained by his own labor, the land over which he is to be lord and master.

By this system you constitute him a sort of beneficiary. He can but feel the enfeebling sentiment that "I am one of the feeble members of society, to whom men more rich than I am contribute to set them up, and set them out, and enable them to earn their own bread." I do not believe that is a proper consideration for American citizens. That is not the spirit of enterprise, the spirit of hardihood, or the proud spirit of the laboring man, who, by the sweat of his brow, and the labor of his hands, can acquire his own fortunes, buy his own farm, build his own house. That is the sort of citizens we want. The little price you now exact is within the competence of every man who deserves to have a farm. I think I recollect to have heard my excellent friend, the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SIMMONS,] say, that before he was twenty-one years of age, he earned money enough to buy himself a freehold and a homestead, and he is now deservedly a Senator of the United States. That is the sort of spirit that will make Senators. That is the sort of spirit that you are, in my judgment, if it should go to any extent, quenching by the eleemosynary foundation on which you propose to grant land.

Besides, Mr. President, we may be as liberal as we please out of our own means, but what right have we thus to give away the public domain? We have granted to railroads; we have, on a thousand pretenses, squandered millions of acres of land which ought to have been preserved as the inheritance for our posterity, so that when they should come into existence, and have their home, and have their way to make in the world, there might be vacant lands still, at a moderate and cheap price for them. This land is their inheritance, but you are hastening now to give it away to railroad companies, to States, and to individuals. On one pretext and on another, you have squandered millions of acres of public lands, but you have always done it on the pretense, as to railroads, that it was to benefit the public.

Now, sir, are the old States benefited by this? The Senator from South Carolina, both the Senators from North Carolina, and every Senator here from an old State—can they find any advantage in it? Can any of them find an advantage in the generous donation which you make of land, thereby reducing the price of land in his country, and drawing off citizens who might want to purchase in his country? Is that an advantage to the public? To what public? To the local public; and to the particular individuals it is a benefit, it is a charity. Sir, this land is vested in us all for the good of the whole people of the United States. Such a disposition of it I cannot see to be for the benefit of the whole people of the United States.

Mr. President, it is an unequal distribution of the public lands. In the present condition of our Treasury, and of our country, it would not be wise for us to obstruct the smallest source of revenue to the public Treasury. I would not propose it. I would not now propose to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the several States. That would be a much more equal distribution of them, and without prejudice to anybody. The new States and Territories go on populating according to the natural inducements held out by their condition and situation, and the fertility of their lands; let nature have its free course, emigration its natural course; let all things go on according to nature. But we are not satisfied with that. We want some artificial stimulant. We want to stimulate emigration. We want to stimulate settlement in a particular place. Is that right? Is it politic? Is it wise? and, in this case, is it just?

A distribution of the proceeds of the land would be much more equal. Distribute them, if you please, for a particular purpose, to be appropriated by the several States to the purposes of education—general education by a system of common schools, that the whole country might have some interest in; but do not give A, B, and C, one hundred and sixty acres of land. I cannot see that there is any public benefit in that. I can see that the individual is benefited, but I cannot see that any public interest of the United States is benefited by it. If it were a choice between this bill and a disposition of the proceeds among the States for some purpose beneficial to all the States, I should certainly prefer a distribution of the proceeds to this partial mode of giving the public lands.

Sir, I did not intend to have occupied this much of your time with any remarks of mine on this subject; but for these reasons I would bear the ills of holding on to the public lands a little longer, particularly in the present condition of the Treasury of the United States, than giving them away, as this bill does.

Mr. DURKEE. Mr. President, there is one aspect of this case that, I think, has not yet been really presented to the Senate; and that is, that all this land has been paid for by the people of the United States, and the poor man has been taxed much more than the rich man, according to his means, for the purchase of the land, and, in many instances, he has exhausted all his means. What is this proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee? It is in substance to say that he may occupy that for which he has already paid.

Now, sir, a word in relation to the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky. He says it will have an unfavorable bearing on the old States. That argument would have been equally good in relation to the acquisition of Louisiana, and the acquisition of territory from Mexico. It seems to me to be self-evident that if it is right to acquire territory, it is good policy to facilitate its settlement, to make it productive. Does it not belong to us as a nation, and as statesmen, to encourage the settlement of the new country, to build up States and Territories? It strikes me that it is the great mission assigned to us. All of us who have a knowledge of the history of settlements in a new country on the frontier, know that hardships and privations of no small extent are encountered by the pioneers, and that they receive very small compensation for their services and triumphs. When they actually pay for the land in their services, and have no means in money to buy it, it certainly appears to me a good policy to give it to them.

I feel, sir, that this bill is the very best measure that has ever been presented to Congress for the disposition of the public lands. It will have a tendency to lessen crime in your cities, to improve the morals and industry of the people. Its tendency will be to contribute to individual and national independence; and these are the great elements we wish to incorporate into our institutions. It looks to me as though it was the mission assigned us to devise ways and means for the settlement of this country; to make the people independent; to build up States, and thus to fulfill the destiny of the American people.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CLAY. I trust—

Mr. MASON. It is Saturday afternoon, and late. I hope that we shall adjourn.

Mr. CLAY. We want an executive session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If Senators on the other side desire an executive session, I will withdraw my motion for that purpose. ["No!" "No!"]

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 24, noes 17; and the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 22, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m.

Mr. CLEMENS raised the question of order that a quorum was not present.

The SPEAKER counted the House, and announced ninety-one members present.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that there be a call of the House, and demanded the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 119; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Avery, Clay, Clemens, John Cochrane, Covode, Cox, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Dowdell, Eustis, Gartrell, Greenwood, Grow, Hawkins, Hughes, George W. Jones, Kelly, Knapp, Landy, Leiter, Letcher, McQueen, Matteson, Mott, Murray, Parker, Potter, Powell, Stephens, Stevenson, and Underwood—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Bingham, Bliss, Branch, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, John B. Clark, Phillips, Cobb, Cockerill, Colfax, Conius, Cragin, James Craig, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Davies, Denn, Dick, Durfee, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goode, Granger, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. So the House refused to order a call.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. FLORENCE stated that if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he should have voted in the negative.

The Journal of yesterday was then read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed the following bills and resolutions of that body, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 388) for the relief of the legal representatives of John Forsyth; and

An act (No. 332) for the relief of Richard B. Alexander.

Also, that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of Representatives of the following titles:

An act (No. 65) for the relief of Thomas Smithers;

An act (No. 307) to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to Ansel Wilkinson," approved August 13, 1856;

An act (No. 209) for the relief of the representatives of William Smith, deceased, late of Louisiana;

An act (No. 211) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Broussard, deceased; and

An act (No. 100) to revive an act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and their legal representatives, of William Conway, deceased."

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Enrolled

Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act to prevent the inconvenient accumulation at the Post Office Department of postmasters' quarterly returns; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means have had under consideration the various amendments of the Senate to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; and I now ask the consent of the House to report back the bill, with the Senate amendments thereto, for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the Senate amendments, ordered to be printed. I will state to the House that the Committee of Ways and Means recommend that the House concur in the second, third, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-second, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, and thirtieth amendments; and that the House non-concur in the first, fourth, fifth, sixth, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, eighteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-seventh amendments of the Senate. If there be no objection, I move that the bill, with the amendments, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

JOHN M'KINNEY.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of John McKinney be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Court of Claims.

NATIONAL MONUMENT SOCIETY.

Mr. DODD, by unanimous consent, reported back, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, Senate bill (No. 152) to incorporate the National Monument Society, with an amendment; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

ROCK ISLAND BRIDGE.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask the consent of the House that House report No. 250 be re-committed to the Committee on Commerce. I make the request by the unanimous instructions of the Committee on Commerce, there having been serious errors made in the report.

A MEMBER. What is the report about?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The bridge across the Mississippi river at Rock Island.

There being no objection, the report was accordingly recommitted.

BROOKLYN POST OFFICE.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I hold in my hand the memorial of the Common Council of the city of Brooklyn, in the State of New York, with the petition of four thousand citizens of the city of Brooklyn, asking for the erection of a post office in that city. I ask that it may be received, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the memorials were accordingly received and referred.

OREGON GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. The gentleman who yesterday objected to the printing of the report of the Committee on Public Lands to accompany the report of Dr. Evans on the Oregon geological survey, I understand now withdraws his objection. I ask that the report may be printed.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed.

WILLETT'S POINT COMMITTEE.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am instructed by the select committee appointed to investigate the purchase by the Government of the site for the fortification at Willett's Point, to offer a resolution. It is modified from the one which I have heretofore asked the House to adopt. We now only ask that two members of the committee shall have authority to proceed to examine the site of the fortification, and at the same time to examine witnesses in the city of New York. If the House will indulge me for a moment—

Mr. BURNETT. It is unnecessary for the gentleman to consume the time of the House by any statement; I shall object to his resolution.

ADMISSION OF THE MINNESOTA MEMBERS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I now call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion of Mr. KELSEY to be excused from voting upon the motion of Mr. MORGAN to be excused from voting on the motion of Mr. GROW to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. GROW. As these reports have been printed now, I withdraw my motion to lay on the table. I suppose that will carry with it the motions to be excused from voting.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to withdraw his motion.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to lay upon the table the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. CLEMENS. I hope all these dilatory motions will be withdrawn.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The question then recurred upon the resolution reported by the majority of the committee.

The majority report and the views of the minority, were as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred "the certificates and credentials of W. W. Phelps and James M. Cavanaugh, claiming seats as members of this House," with instructions "to inquire into and report upon the right of these gentlemen to be admitted and sworn as members of this House," ask leave to report:

The certificate of W. W. Phelps, which forms the credentials presented, certifies "that in a general election, held on the 13th day of October, 1857, under the constitution adopted by the people of Minnesota, preparatory to their admission into the Union as a State, W. W. Phelps received a majority of the votes cast at said election as a member of the United States House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, from the State of Minnesota, and, by an official canvass of said votes, was, on the 17th day of December, 1857, declared duly elected one of its members." The certificate of Mr. Cavanaugh is in the same language. Both are dated on the 18th day of December, 1857, signed by S. Medary, then Governor, and bear the broad seal of Minnesota.

The constitution of Minnesota, under which the State was admitted into the Union, provides in the schedule—"Sec. 21. The returns of said election for and against this constitution, and for all State officers and members of the House of Representatives of the United States, shall be made and certificates issued in the manner now prescribed by law for returning votes given for Delegate to Congress; and the returns for all district officers, judicial, legislative, or otherwise, shall be made to the register of deeds of the senior county in each district in the manner prescribed by law, except as otherwise provided. The returns for all officers elected at large shall be canvassed by the Governor of the Territory, assisted by Joseph R. Brown and Thomas J. Galbraith, at the time designated by law for canvassing the vote for Delegate to Congress."

The fourth section of the "Act to establish the Territory of Minnesota," provides that a "Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States may be elected," &c., and "the person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the Governor to be duly elected, and a certificate thereof shall be given accordingly."

It will be seen, by these provisions, that the certificates of election referred to the committee are in due form, certified according to law, and that there can be no question justly raised as to their regularity and force.

An objection is urged to the right of the claimants to their seats on the ground that their election was prior to the admission of the State into the Union. In the opinion of the committee, if it be admitted that there is no force in numerous precedents scattered through the Journals of Congress, and extending back to the earliest times of the Republic, sanctioning this course, it should be considered that Congress, by the enabling act authorizing the formation of a constitution and State government, thereby fully empowered the people of Minnesota to prepare themselves to assume, upon their admission, all the rights, powers, and attributes of a sovereign State in the Union. One of these rights is that of being represented in Congress; and were elections held prior to admission for members of the House of Representatives held void, States must remain unrepresented after their admission, and until elections can be subsequently held, presenting the anomalous spectacle of States in the Union, without representation or voice in the national councils. The act of admission into the Union, upon being consummated, relates back to and legalizes every act of the territorial authorities, exercised in pursuance of the original authority conferred. As the election of members to this House looks directly to the end in view contemplated by the enabling act of Congress, the committee think it entirely within the scope of action conferred upon the people of the Territory, and should be respected by Congress.

Another objection urged against the admission of the members who claim seats in the House of Representatives from Minnesota is, because of their election by general ticket in stead of districts. The schedule of the Minnesota constitution provides—

"Sec. 9. For the purposes of the first election, the State shall constitute one district, and shall elect three members to the House of Representatives of the United States."

The election was held throughout the State, as one district, in conformity with the foregoing provision.

This, it is contended, is in contravention of the second section of the act of June 25, 1842, and the election is therefore void. That section is as follows:

"That in every case when a State is entitled to more than one Representative, the number to which each State shall be entitled under this apportionment shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory, equal in number to the number of Representatives to which said State may be entitled, no one district electing more than one Representative."

It will be observed that, by the terms of this law, it was to apply only to "this apportionment," to wit, that of 1842; but should it be held otherwise, it is conceived that its effect has been already settled. The obligation of this act was brought in question by the next Congress after it was passed, in a contest of the seats and the members returned from the States of New Hampshire, Georgia, Mississippi, and Missouri; and the Committee of Elections, to whom the subject was referred, reported a resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, That the section of 'An act for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to the sixth census,' approved June 25, 1842, is not a law made in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, and valid, operative, and binding upon the States."

Upon the question of the admission of the members of the States named, which had so elected their Representatives by general ticket, and not in accordance with the law, it was decided in the affirmative by—ayes 127, noes 57. This disposition of the question has never been disturbed, although members elected under the general ticket system have been upon this floor (with the exception, it is believed, of three Congresses) ever since, and without objection. It seems now too late to reopen the question.

There seems to be but one question of any importance remaining, and this grows out of the fact that the constitution of Minnesota provides for the election of three members to the House of Representatives, while, by the act for the admission of the State, it is entitled to but two. The right of Minnesota to hold an election prior to the admission of the State has already been considered, and its legality, upon the admission of the State, has been shown. Does the act of Congress cutting down the number proposed in the constitution of Minnesota from three to two render the election previously held altogether void? If void, then the gentlemen presenting credentials are not entitled to be sworn, and admitted to seats in the House of Representatives; if voidable only, the House will not, of its own motion, so declare it until some citizen of the State of Minnesota shall call it in question. It will not volunteer to search for causes to reject those who claim to be elected its members, and who bring credentials which are regular upon their face, and entitle them to admission.

The provision of the constitution of Minnesota for the election of members to the House of Representatives was approved by the act of admission, but the number was restricted to two. The committee have before them no evidence that more than two ever were elected, notwithstanding the provision of the constitution of the State. The committee have seen no other credentials than those referred to them, nor are they aware of any proclamation of the Governor, or other canvassers, declaring any persons elected besides those now claiming seats. If, therefore, the question of election was presented to the committee, (which it is not,) there is nothing before them to justify the rejection of their claims. The committee are only instructed to "inquire into and report upon the right of these gentlemen to be admitted and sworn as members of this House." The committee construe this as a direction to inquire into the prima facie rights of Messrs. Phelps and Cavanaugh to be admitted and sworn. The credentials they present, in the opinion of the committee, clearly entitle them to their rights.

It was so settled in 1793, in the case of Benjamin Edwards, and has been uniformly sustained by the House, and, since the celebrated New Jersey case, it would seem, cannot be properly questioned. These credentials, being regular upon their face, the number of those claiming seats is the number fixed by law to which the State is entitled.

No others are known to be claiming seats; no others are known to the committee to have been elected, or as claiming to have been elected. The committee are, therefore, of opinion that the gentlemen presenting their credentials are entitled prima facie to be sworn and admitted to seats; but they do not propose that such admission shall preclude any contest as to the rights of these gentlemen which may at any time hereafter be properly instituted. They submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That W. W. Phelps and James M. Cavanaugh, claiming seats as members of this House from the State of Minnesota, be admitted and sworn as such: Provided, That such admission and qualification shall not be considered as precluding any contest of their right to seats which may be hereafter instituted by any person having the right so to do.

Views of a minority of said committee.

The undersigned members of the Committee of Elections, to whom the question of the right of W. W. Phelps, as a Representative of the State of Minnesota on this floor, was referred, respectfully submit:

That the said W. W. Phelps is not duly elected a member of this House.

This is apparent on the slightest consideration of the plainest and most notorious facts, and the simplest principles of law. His claim to his seat rests on the following certificate:

"I, Samuel Medary, Governor of Minnesota, hereby certify that at a general election held on the 13th day of October, 1857, under the constitution adopted by the people of Minnesota preparatory to their admission into the Union as a State, W. W. Phelps received a majority of the votes cast at said election as one of the members of the United States House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fifth Congress from the State of Minnesota; and, by the official canvass of said votes, was, on the 17th day of December, 1857, declared duly elected one of said members."

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the great seal of Minnesota, [L. s.] at the city of St. Paul, this 18th day of December, 1857. S. MEDARY."

The claimant is forbidden to take his seat under that certificate—

1. By a great constitutional principle; and
2. By a plain rule of election law.

The Territory of Minnesota was organized in 1849, and in 1857 the people were authorized to form a constitution preparatory to admission into the Union, and it was declared they should be entitled to one Representative, and as many more as their population might show them entitled to according to the present ratio.

The certificate shows the election to have been held on the 13th of October, 1857.

No census had then been taken and returned; but one had been partially taken and returned, showing a population of about one hundred and thirty-four thousand.

On the 13th of October—the same day the people of Minnesota voted on and adopted their constitution—there was no law of the United States assigning to Minnesota any number of Representatives; on that day there was no State of Minnesota in existence known to the laws; the people of the Territory were then engaged in voting, under a law of Congress, for the government of the Territory, on a constitution which that law declared to be, in terms, preparatory to admission into the Union. The United States marshal still kept the peace of the Territory, and still executed the process of the Territory. The courts of the Territory still administered the laws of the United States in the Territory; the Governor appointed by the President still held the only executive power recognized in the Territory; the Legislature of Minnesota still was the only legal Legislature. These things so continued until the 11th day of May, 1858, when, by law of that date, Minnesota became a State.

The Supreme Court have aided our reasoning by their rulings, and they have resolved that under the Constitution the territorial laws and authorities continue exclusively in force in the Territory until the passage of the act of admission, and then cease—(McMillen vs. Bailey, 10 Howard, 77.)

It is therefore clear that the certificate is decisive against the claim of W. W. Phelps; for it shows the claim to rest on an election in a Territory of the United States, which was an act of usurpation, in its nature punishable, and absolutely void. It was, and could be, by no law of the State, for it was before the State existed at all. It could not be valid by a territorial law, for a Territory cannot elect members of Congress. It is unwise to talk of ratification by the subsequent admission of the State, for, till admission, the State was nothing. It was created at the moment of admission; and it is a universal principle that, if an election be without legal authority when made, it is absolutely void, and cannot be made valid by any subsequent law; for that is equivalent to naming the people's representatives by law, without an election at all.

In the absence of law, the claimant has no right, and the electors have parted with some of their rights.

If one or two supposed precedents be cited, it is sufficient to say that precedents for such a flagrant usurpation as the naming the Representatives of a State by a vote of the House of Representatives is fit only to be reversed and expunged. It could only exist in high party times, when the necessity of votes invaded the rights of the people, and a dominant majority defied not less the rules of law and the Constitution than the plainest and most substantial rights of the people.

But it is respectfully submitted that there is no case at all analogous to this.

There is no case where the people of a Territory have presumed to elect, by the same ballots which determined whether they should adopt the constitution preparatory to admission, Representatives to Congress; still less when on that day they elected more Representatives than the act under which they were proceeding said they should have when admitted as a State.

The people of Minnesota did not even wait till they had expressed their opinion on the constitution; they did not wait till they had even resolved to ask Congress to admit them with it as their constitution; but while it was a mere proposal before them whether they should propose it to Congress, they go through the form of electing Representatives under a constitution which they had not yet adopted themselves—which had no legal existence, even, as a petition of the people—to represent the people of a State which not only did not exist, but which had not even resolved to ask to be allowed to exist; not only so, but the law of Congress saying they should be entitled only to one Representative, and so many as the census might show them entitled to, in addition, they elected three Representatives for a population shown by the census, so far as it appears, to be entitled only to one; for the ratio of ninety-three thousand and four hundred and twenty, gives only one Representative for one hundred and thirty-six thousand four hundred and fourteen. To be entitled to two Representatives under the act of Congress, there must be one hundred and eighty-five thousand eight hundred and forty; and for three, there must have been two hundred and eighty-one thousand three hundred and sixty.

This claim is, therefore, at war with the plainest principles of the Constitution, and beyond the shelter of the bad precedents set in high party times by parties pressed for votes.

3. But suppose the State of Minnesota to have been capable of electing Representatives before she existed, to represent her nonentity, the election and certificate is void by the law of elections.

For we must assume, in this view of the case, that the constitution was operative on the 13th of October, 1857, as if Minnesota were a State and admitted into the Union, having all the laws of the United States then existing in force, but not anticipating laws not then existing.

This is supposed to be the most favorable view of the case. In that event, under the enabling act, Minnesota was entitled to elect one member only. But concede the question of population to entitle her to two, she should be entitled to elect only two; and no one pretends population enough for three.

Now, the ninth section of the schedule says: "For the purpose of the first election, the State shall constitute one district, and shall elect three members to the House of Representatives."

This is the only law of the supposed State for holding any election. The United States have a right to pass laws regulating elections, but they have not done so. No laws exist but State laws. No law is pretended to exist in Minnesota for the election of Representatives to Congress but this clause. Every election which does not conform to this clause is, therefore, without law, and therefore void.

If, therefore, the State law requires three Representatives to be elected, and the State is entitled to only two, it is impossible to make under that law a valid election. The law makes it the duty of every citizen to vote for three persons. The returning officers are bound to return three persons. If the people voted for three, and if three be returned, there is no possible way of ascertaining for which two of the three the people voted; and the ballots are void; the return is void for repugnancy; and there is no one elected.

If, on the other hand, the people, by some singular accident, voted for only two on each ballot, there must be three returned by law. The law of the State, which is the only election law we can look at, declares the three highest persons elected; and the returns to this House must conform to that fact, and certify the election of three persons; and the same would be the case if each voter named only one person on each ticket. Still, the three highest would be declared elected, and equally elected—in fact, equally entitled to claim a return, and equally entitled to a seat in this House.

There is no mode or law by which this House can elect, out of the three certified to us, two, who should be the Representatives. To suppose that, is to suppose a law of election different from the only one actually existing. Congress, in judging of elections, is not a legislative but a judicial functionary; deciding, not what ought to be law, but whether either of the claimants before her is entitled to a seat under the State laws. What those laws say must be read alone in them. If they conflict with paramount laws, they are void; but the fact that the only law of a State is void because in conflict with a paramount law, does not create another law in conformity with the paramount law. The law remains simply void, and as if it had never existed. So that if the only law of a State for an election be absolutely in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, or a law of Congress constitutionally binding on a State, it is as if there were no law of the State at all on the subject; and if it be the only election law of the State, then there is no election law, and no election is possible till one shall be passed. The mere declaring by Congress that the State shall be entitled to two Representatives, is not an election law, but defining the number which the State may elect. It confers on Congress no power to elect for the State, between several persons equally elected by the State laws, any more than it gives the power to Congress to say which of two persons having an equal number of votes shall be the Representative.

Nor can the difficulty be avoided by assuming a particular case, when there may happen to be two candidates having a majority, and the highest number of votes, and the third having the next highest, and solving the difficulty by taking the two highest and leaving out the third.

For if all three have a clear majority of the whole vote, it is clear that a majority of the whole people have sent all three; and the minority, who gave a greater vote to two over the one, have no right awarded to them to elect their favorite to the exclusion of the third person having also a majority of the whole vote cast. And if only two have a majority of the whole vote, and the third stand next highest, the case is not altered; for the law equally declares all elected. A majority elects only because the law says so. The law may require two thirds, or it may declare the highest vote, though a minority, sufficient; but in either event it is not the mere fact that a majority or a mere plurality of votes are cast for the three persons which elects them, but the fact that the law declares that the three having such number of votes shall be declared elected, which elects them. The one is as much elected as the other. The highest is no more elected than the lowest of the three. And the fact that two of the three have higher numbers than the third can be no ground for Congress to select between the three persons elected by the State law, to make a Congressman out of two, and repudiate the third. That is for Congress to elect instead of the people. If the State law might say, whoever gets ten thousand votes shall be declared elected, it is plain any surplus over ten thousand would give no one any advantage over one having only ten thousand.

In a word, any supposed right of Congress to select two out of three, by reason of two out of three declared elected by the State law happening to have more votes than the third, assumes that it is not the law, but the number absolutely, irrespective of the law, which elects; and this is plainly not so, when the law expressly declares that three shall be declared elected, and draws no distinction between the validity of the election of the third by reason of any difference in the number of their respective vote between themselves.

Votes may not follow the ratio of number merely, and we must always look to the law to see the value assigned to the number. When the House of Representatives elect a President, the votes cast are not counted, except as members constituting a State vote; a majority of all must concur to elect, and they cannot elect unless two thirds of the States be present. This sufficiently shows how fallacious and arbitrary a test mere numbers are. It is the law alone which prescribes the value to the number; and if it say a smaller number shall elect equally with a larger number, provided the smaller number bear any assigned relation to the whole number, then the person getting such smaller number is equally elected with the other under the only law declaring who shall be returned as elected.

In a word, the law of Minnesota is void, because in direct conflict with a paramount law; and she can have no representation till she has changed her law and made it conform to the law of Congress.

Here is not the case of an election law providing for the election of two when three are returned. But the fact is apparent that two have a greater number than the third; for the law itself declares the two elected, and the third is rejected as mere surplusage.

But it is the case of a law self contradictory and repugnant, the law of Congress declaring that two only shall be elected, and there stopping; the law of the State requiring that three shall be elected, and declaring the three having a certain proportion of votes to be elected. It seems plain the law is wholly incapable of being executed, and is void. It is equally clear that the declaration by Congress, after the actual election under the constitution, that the State shall be entitled to only two, cannot better the case. If the number allowed and elected had happened to agree, the after law might, with some plausibility, be treated as a ratification; but when the whole election was done, and some three were elected under the State law, the subsequent declaration that only two could be admitted, could by no possibility avoid what was valid according to the State law before, nor elect and discriminate between equal titles under the same law, by an arbitrary rule not prescribed by the law, drawn from the irrelevant question of which two got most votes, when all had enough under the law electing them.

3. But in the particular case, we are not driven to such legal discussions.

In point of fact, it is uncontroverted—it is notorious—that the election was for three members, on the same day, at the same polls, by the same ballots which were cast for or against the constitution, and that three persons by the canvassers were declared elected. The constitution required the people so to do; the certificate of W. W. Phelps states that the election was held under the constitution, and that W. W. Phelps received a majority of the votes cast at said election, as one of the members of the House from the State of Minnesota. If these things be so, then it is the plain case of three persons voted for and elected at the same election, on the same day, and at the same time and places, when only two could be validly chosen; and that case has been ruled a void election, as to all, by the highest authority. (See 7 Cong. Globe, 135; Cushing's Parl. Law, 104; Glavinville Cases, 11 and 21.)

It is impossible for the House to say which of the three the people preferred. They have not expressed their will between them, but only between them and others. If we accept two and reject one, or elect him and assign a meaning to the ballots for him which the people casting them did not assign to them, this House is bound to notice the election laws of the States and the proceedings of officers under them. We may have to inquire, by evidence, into the details of numbers of votes and the qualification of voters, where a contest arises on the question of a majority; but we are entitled to take legal notice, without proof, of the proceedings of the canvassers, and what they do, and who they are, just as W. W. Phelps supposes us to recognize Mr. Medary as the officer of the Territory mentioned in the constitution; just as judges notice the seal of the United States, or of a State, without proof. So that we are bound, in point of law, to notice the fact that three persons were declared elected by the canvassers, and that their certificate before us is only certifying one of them equally elected at the same time and places, under the same law, and that all are equally void.

It is erroneously supposed that the question referred to the committee concerns merely the right of Mr. Phelps to take his seat provisionally as holding the certificate.

We regard the question presented as going to his right to the seat at all, whether provisionally or finally; and if the evidence and law show that he can in no event be entitled to the seat, we are bound now to say so, and to exclude him from a position to which he can have no claim at any time.

In the present case, it is impossible to separate the two questions of a right to take the seat till a better title is shown, and an absolute right to the seat, for no one can claim the seat provisionally who is not prima facie entitled to hold it absolutely. It is not any certificate which entitles the holder to claim the seat. The certificate itself must be a legal certificate; it must purport to be from or by an officer authorized to give a certificate; it must purport to represent the result of a possible election according to the law; and it must show that under such an election the holder is elected prima facie.

But this certificate is a mere nullity, and so appears on the simplest inspection of it. The certificate does not purport to be from any officer of the State of Minnesota, nor by any officer authorized by any law of that State to make the certificate. It does not purport to be in pursuance of any law of the State, but is dated before the existence of the State, and certifies an election before the people had even voted on the constitution. It certifies Mr. Phelps to have been elected before Congress had assigned any Representative to the State of Minnesota; before the office of Representative for that State had any legal existence, and it purports to give the result of an election held under a law by which no valid election of the number of Representatives since authorized could possibly have been elected.

The certificate is, therefore, on its face, not a prima facie title, but a prima facie refutation of title, and effectually precludes all right, provisional or final, to a seat.

The facts in the case of James M. Cavanaugh being the same, we are of the same opinion as to his right to qualify as a member of this House.

We therefore offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That W. W. Phelps and James M. Cavanaugh have no right to qualify and take their seats.

EZRA CLARK, Jr.,
JAMES WILSON,
JOHN A. GILMER.

May 19, 1858.

The undersigned, a member of the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of Messrs. Phelps and Cavanaugh, with instructions to report on their right to be admitted and sworn as Representatives in this House for the Thirty-Fifth Congress, from the State of Minnesota, dissenting from the conclusions of the majority, asks leave to submit the following minority report:

On the 25th day of February, 1857, Congress passed an act entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States." The fourth section of this act provides for the taking of a census of the people of Minnesota with the view of a certifying the number of Representatives to which she would be entitled in the Congress of the United States; and it is declared that "said State shall be entitled to one Representative, and such additional Representatives as the population of the State shall, according to the census, show it would be entitled to according to the present ratio of representation."

Under the authority of this act, a constitution was prepared, and submitted to the people of Minnesota, and by them approved on the 13th day of October, 1857. The ninth section of article sixteen of this constitution is as follows:

"For the purposes of the first election, the State shall constitute one district, and shall elect three members to the House of Representatives of the United States."

Section sixteen of the same article provides that, "upon the second Tuesday, the 13th day of October, 1857, an election shall be held for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, Governor, lieutenant governor, supreme and district judges, members of the Legislature, and all other officers designated in this constitution, and also the submission of this constitution to the people for their adoption or rejection."

In pursuance of these provisions of the constitution, and on the very day upon which the people of Minnesota were to decide whether it should be adopted or rejected, an election was held for three Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

The returns of the votes for these officers were afterwards, on the 17th day of December, 1857, canvassed by the proper officers, and the following gentlemen, namely, W. W. Phelps, J. M. Cavanaugh, and G. L. Becker, declared to be duly elected.

On the 18th day of December, 1857, certificates of election were made out and delivered (signed by "S. Medary, Governor" of the Territory of Minnesota) to said Phelps and Cavanaugh, and, as the undersigned is informed and believes, and as he understands to be the admitted fact, to said Becker, of each of which the following, with the exception of the name of the person elected, is a true copy:

"I, Samuel Medary, Governor of Minnesota, hereby certify, that at a general election held on the 13th day of October, 1857, under the constitution adopted by the people of Minnesota, preparatory to their admission into the Union as a State, W. W. Phelps received a majority of the votes cast at said election as one of the members of the United States House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, from the State of Minnesota, and, by an official canvass of said votes, was, on the 17th day of December, 1857, declared duly elected one of said members."

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand [L. S.] and caused to be affixed the seal of Minnesota, at the city of St. Paul, this 18th day of December, 1857."

"S. MEDARY."

An act for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union was passed the 11th day of May, 1858. By this act the number of Representatives to which the new State is entitled in the Congress of the United States is fixed at two. The language is as follows: "That said State shall be entitled to two Representatives in Congress until the next apportionment of Representatives amongst the several States."

On the 13th day of May instant, Messrs. Phelps and Cavanaugh caused their credentials to be presented, and asked to be sworn as members of this House; whereupon the House passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the certificates and credentials of W. W. Phelps and James M. Cavanaugh, claiming seats as members of this House from the State of Minnesota, be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to inquire into and report upon the right of these gentlemen to be admitted and sworn as members of this House."

In the preliminary inquiry which the committee were directed to make, the undersigned did not deem it material to investigate several questions suggested by the facts, admitted or alleged to exist in the case, bearing upon the general question of the election of the claimants, rather than upon their prima facie right to be sworn; and which questions are not understood to have been acted upon by the committee, but have been left to the future action of the House. He acknowledges the great inconvenience that would result if, in the ordinary cases of election contests, the question of the right to seats was to be raised, discussed, and decided, upon the presentation of the credentials of persons whose rights are disputed. But he cannot doubt the strict propriety of raising the question of right, in the first instance, whenever the papers in possession of the House, and the laws, which it is presumed to know, show that there cannot have been a legal election. The question now presented, is not so much whether there has been a legal election of Representatives in Congress from the State of Minnesota, as whether the papers presented to the House, the laws of Congress, and the constitution of Minnesota, contain anything fatally inconsistent with that hypothesis.

In the judgment of the undersigned, they do. He believes that, under the law of Congress and the constitution of Minnesota, there has been, there could have been, no legal election. The facts necessary to be known for the final action of the House are such as it is bound to take cognizance of. The credentials of the claimants are in its possession; the law admitting Minnesota as a State was passed at the present session, and therefore its members must be supposed to be actually as well as constructively acquainted with its provisions; the constitution of Minnesota was not only referred to in this act, but it was upon that instrument that the act is founded; and, besides, it is so recited in the certificates of the territorial Governor as to make it a part thereof.

When these gentlemen presented themselves to be sworn in as Representatives from Minnesota, the House was presumed to know, and it did know, that that State was entitled to two, and only two, Representatives; and further, that the election at which they allege they were chosen was an election for three and not for two Representatives. Of these facts the House had perfect and complete knowledge—knowledge, actual and constructive, at the time of the reference to the Committee of Elections. They can never be disputed or varied, and they can prove conclusively that there has been no election that this House can recognize for a moment. The objection is vital and insurmountable. That it is so, is apparent upon the first view of the case. There cannot have been an election of which this House can take notice, unless it was held under the provisions of a law of Minnesota. There can have been no law of Minnesota inconsistent with a constitutional law of Congress upon the same subject. The law of Congress, of whose validity no doubt can be raised, declares that Minnesota shall have only two Representatives in this House. The law of Minnesota, (her constitution), under which the election took place, declares that she shall have and "elect" three Representatives. Under this law, for she had no other, her people voted for and elected three Representatives. If the law is valid and effective, the three are elected, one as much as another; if not valid, none are elected; for there can be no election which was not held under the provisions of law; any other election is but the choice or designation of unauthorized assemblies of the people. If the law of Minnesota has sufficient force and vigor to entitle these gentlemen to be "sworn and admitted," it has enough to retain them in their seats. If their case is prima facie a good one, it is a perfect one, so far as this question is concerned; for all that can be shown hereafter, bearing upon it, is shown and understood now. From what already appears, the House is informed by an irresistible logic that these gentlemen have not been elected under any law of Minnesota.

It is said that Messrs. Phelps and Cavanaugh have received a larger number of votes than any other candidates for the office of Representative. Conceding this to be true—concerning which, however, there is no evidence, except what may be implied from the fact that certificates were made out and delivered to them—and that no inference of the kind is deducible from this circumstance, is obvious from the fact that a similar certificate was issued to another gentleman, (Mr. Becker,) who has not seen fit to present it here—and their case is not improved, for it still remains that they were not elected under any regulation of the State of Minnesota having the vigor of law. Three Representatives were elected, if any were; there was no law for any other number. Had there been a law for two, in conformity with the act of Congress, non constat Messrs. Phelps and Cavanaugh, or either of them, would have received a larger number of votes than Mr. Becker, or some other candidate; the people voted for three Representatives; if the election had been for two, we have no right to assume that voters who preferred Mr. Phelps or Mr. Cavanaugh to the opposition candidates, would have preferred either of them to Mr. Becker. To permit the candidates to decide among themselves who shall be admitted to seats and who shall retire, would be to transfer the election from the people of the State to the candidates. But it is confidently submitted that the House has no right to admit members who do not appear to have been elected by the people of a State under the laws thereof. In the opinion of the undersigned, it would not be within the authority, or comport with the dignity, of this House, to receive members who were not elected under a law of the State which they claim to represent, or of Congress; or, where a larger number are returned than the State is entitled to elect, to authorize them to decide among themselves who shall be its Representatives.

The State of Delaware is entitled to one Representative. Suppose she should provide by law for the election of two, will it be contended that such a law would be of any force or validity? And will it be said that if, under such law, she should elect two Representatives and send them here, it would not be competent for the House to reject them both upon their presenting themselves to be sworn in as members? And if both might be properly rejected, either might be; otherwise it might be an election by the House, and not by the people of Delaware. By what legal and safe rule can the House proceed to determine which of the two persons, designated and returned under the provisions of such a law, should be admitted as the properly-elected Representative of the State? It is believed there is none.

If, in this case, Mr. Becker had presented his credentials, and asked to be sworn as a Representative from Minnesota, by what rule or upon what principle could the House have decided that the application of Messrs. Phelps and Cavanaugh should be preferred to his? The fact that he does not appear can add no strength to their position. It is the right of the people of Minnesota with which the House has to do, and no arrangements between these parties, no negligence or dereliction on the part of either of them, can be permitted to affect this right.

In the case of Reed vs. Coaden, (Contested Elections, p. 353,) it was decided "where two candidates had an equal number of votes, the Governor and Council; assuming to act under a State law, proceeded to decide between them which should be chosen Representative, and gave their certificate of election to Jeremiah Coaden, who became the sitting member. This proceeding, being illegal and unwarranted by the Constitution, was not admitted as evidence of his right to a seat in the House."

The committee, in their report, say:

"The Constitution of the United States, article one, section two, provides that 'the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature.' Section five of the same article provides that 'each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualification of its own members.'"

"On the first Monday of October, 1820, in conformity with the law of Maryland, an election was held by the qualified electors of the sixth congressional district. On that day they either did or did not elect a member of Congress. None could be elected unless he received a greater number of votes than were given for any other candidate."

"The term 'election' must mean the act of choosing, performed by the qualified electors, in conformity with the requisitions of the Constitution and laws regulating the manner in which the choice shall be made. If, therefore, the legal electors, on the day appointed, should fail to make a choice, it is confidently believed that no other authority of the State can, at any other time, make good this defect. Let it be supposed that the electors should fail to attend an election; that, subsequently, no election is held, would it then be contended that the executive authority could, by lot or otherwise, appoint a Representative for such district in the Congress of the United States?"

"This is a power which it is presumed none will contend does exist. Yet it is believed to be nothing more than that which has been exercised by the Governor and Council of Maryland in the case under consideration."

"In this case the electors assemble, they proceed to elect, they make no choice; they come to no constitutional result. It is asked, what is the difference between the two cases? The one would be an appointment, because no election had been held; the other because no choice had been made. The committee, being of opinion that the power thus virtually exercised by the Governor and Council of Maryland, in appointing a Representative to the Congress of the United States, being contrary to the express provisions of the Constitution, and one which this House cannot sanction, have no hesitation in rejecting the official statement of the proceedings in the case, as evidence of the right of the sitting member to a seat in this House."

In the case cited, it appears to have been decided that it is not competent for the House to admit as a Representative one who has not been elected by the "people" of the district or State which he claims to represent, and that there can be no valid election unless it was held under the provisions of a law of the State, consistent with the Constitution of the United States. This authority would seem to be decisive of the question referred to the committee.

The highest considerations of policy, and a proper regard for the authority of Congress, should caution us against the establishment of a precedent so unsound and pernicious in principle as this would be, and which, if respected hereafter, must lead to manifold inconveniences and abuses.

The undersigned recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Messrs. W. W. Phelps and J. M. Cavanaugh are not entitled to be admitted and sworn as members of this House.

I. WASHBURN, Jr.

The question recurred upon the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That W. W. Phelps and James M. Cavanaugh, claiming seats as members of this House from the State of Minnesota, be admitted and sworn as such: Provided, That such admission and qualification shall not be considered as precluding any contest of their right to seats which may be hereafter instituted by any person having the right so to do.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask that the resolution, which is appended to the minority report, signed by myself, may be considered as before the House by way of amendment. I do not know but it would be so considered by the Chair. If not, I desire to offer it as such. The resolution is in the following words:

Resolved, That Messrs. W. W. Phelps and J. M. Cavanaugh are not entitled to be admitted and sworn as members of this House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope that, by general consent, a vote will be allowed upon that resolution, as an amendment to the original resolution.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. There is no objection to that.

No objection being made, the amendment was received.

Mr. STANTON. Since the adjournment of the House yesterday, it has been ascertained that there is another certificate of election of members of Congress from Minnesota. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to allow it to be read.

Mr. HUGHES. I object to it unless the resignation of the third member is also read.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The committee having been informed this morning that there was another paper upon the files of the House having some relevancy to this question perhaps, the committee have directed me to present it, and have it read. Before I make any remarks upon the subject, I will send it to the Clerk, and have it read.

The certificate was read, and is as follows:

I, Samuel Medary, Governor of Minnesota, hereby certify that, at a general election held on the 13th day of October, 1857, under the constitution adopted by the people of Minnesota, preparatory to their admission into the Union as a State, W. W. Phelps, James M. Cavanaugh, and George L. Becker received a majority of the votes cast at said election for the three members of the United States House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fifth Congress from the State of Minnesota, provided for in the constitution of said State; and, by the official canvass of said votes, were, on the 17th day of December, 1857, declared duly elected as such members.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and affixed the great seal of Minnesota, this 18th [1857] day of December, A. D. 1857. S. MEDARY.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I knew nothing of that paper, nor am I aware that any member of the Committee of Elections knew of its existence until last evening after the adjournment of the House. The paper was brought to me; and I took it and compared it with the credentials which were presented to the House. The paper bears no file mark. I do not know where it came from, or for what purpose it was issued, nor anything about it, except that it was brought and placed in my hands. It was first brought to me by my colleague upon the Committee of Elections, [Mr. GILMER.] Whence he obtained it, I do not know.

Mr. GILMER. I desire to state that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] asked me why we had not that certificate before us. I was ignorant of its existence. He went, as he informed me, to the Clerk of the House and obtained it from the files.

Mr. STANTON. I called upon the Clerk and told him I desired to see the papers certifying the Minnesota constitution. Mr. Buck brought me this certificate, and I took a certified copy of it.

Mr. GILMER. As my friend from Illinois has an hour in which to conclude this discussion, I would request him to allow me five or ten minutes, that I may read to the House the authorities upon which the minority base their report.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I am willing to grant ten minutes, to the gentleman, as I do not propose to occupy more than that myself. But, before I yield, I desire to make a remark in relation to this paper which has been read. I suppose it is the practice—indeed, I am informed, that it is the practice—for the Executive or the Secretary of State of each State, to transmit to the Clerk of this House, as soon as the votes for members of Congress from each respective State are canvassed, a certified statement, under the laws of the State, as to who are elected and returned as members of Congress from those States respectively. This is done in order that the Clerk of the House may be enabled to make up the roll of members prior to the assembling of Congress. I suppose that this paper may have been got up for that purpose, but I do not know. That supposition, at any rate, would account for the paper being in the hands of the Clerk. In connection with that paper, I send another one to the Clerk, which I was instructed by the committee to present and have read for the information of the House, in connection with the pending question. The paper is signed by Governor Medary and Joseph R. Brown, who was with him upon the board of canvassers. It will be remembered that the constitution of Minnesota provided that the votes should be canvassed by a board consisting of Joseph R. Brown, (who, I believe, was a Democrat,) Thomas J. Galbraith, (a Republican,) and the Governor. Some question having been raised as to the canvass, those two gentlemen sent the letter to the claimants, giving their version of the number of votes cast. Although it is not an official document, I ask that it may be read in this connection as a part of my remarks.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It is understood that that paper is read merely as part of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, and not as a portion of the evidence.

The SPEAKER. It is read as part of the gentleman's remarks.

The letter was read, as follows.

WASHINGTON, March 13, 1858.

GENTLEMEN: In answer to your request of this day that we would furnish you with a statement of the vote canvassed by us, "as members of the board of canvassers created under the provisions of the constitution of Minnesota for members of Congress from that State," we would reply that we have no means at hand of ascertaining the exact vote polled in the State of Minnesota and canvassed by us as members of the board of canvassers; other than publications containing what purports to be the result of that vote as shown by the official canvass.

We can say, however, that according to the report of the board of canvassers, W. W. Phelps received the highest number of votes, and J. M. Cavanaugh the next highest number of votes for members of Congress, and were declared duly elected to represent the State of Minnesota in the House of Representatives of the United States for two years.

We believe the vote for members of Congress in Minnesota is correctly exhibited, to the best of our recollection, in the published table of the result of the late election in the Tribune Almanac for 1858.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

S. MEDARY.

JOSEPH R. BROWN.

Hon. W. W. PHELPS and J. M. CAVANAUGH.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. This statement is corroborated by all the information which the committee has been able to obtain. The statement, as published in the Tribune Almanac, gives, to Mr. Phelps eighteen thousand two hundred and eighteen votes, to Mr. Cavanaugh eighteen thousand and sixty-four votes, and to Mr. Becker eighteen thousand and nineteen votes; thus corroborating the statement made by the gentlemen whose names are signed to that communication. I have compared these papers, and suppose it is true that they both originated in the executive office of Minnesota. They are both drawn on precisely similar paper, drawn in the same handwriting, and bear manifest evidence of both being genuine.

But for my own part, I suppose that the presentation of this paper does not alter the position of the question. The understanding of the committee in making the report which they have made is, that they do not pass upon the validity of the election, because that is not called in question; and the only matter presented to the committee by the resolution of instructions passed by the House, was to inquire into their right to be admitted and sworn as members. It is simply a question of prima facie right to take their seats. It was so looked upon and considered by the committee; and that there might be notice to the world, to every person being disposed to contest their right to seats, the committee have attached a proviso to the resolution which they introduced. The right of persons to contest their seats subsequently would have existed just as distinctly had that proviso not been attached to the resolution; but the Committee of Elections desired that it might be distinctly declared that the right of any person who desired to contest the legality of their election was reserved. The committee did not attempt to decide on the question of the legality of the election, leaving that to any person disposed hereafter to bring it in question.

Now, there was but one question apparent in the estimation of the committee which was entitled to serious consideration; and that was, was the election that was held in Minnesota absolutely void or not? If that election was void, then these parties have no right to take their seats, even prima facie; but if not absolutely void, then they have a right to be admitted and sworn, subject to the rights of other parties as reserved in the resolution introduced.

It will be seen by the enabling act, which was passed last Congress, that it was provided that the State should be admitted with one member of the House of Representatives, and as many more Representatives as their census would show them entitled to, under the Federal ratio. That, of course, could not be ascertained at the time, because it was provided that the census should be taken subsequently to the election of delegates to the convention. That convention having assembled in pursuance of the enabling act passed by Congress, proceeded to frame a constitution, in which, as in all constitutions heretofore framed, they provided for representation in Congress—not knowing precisely what that representation would be—but supposing that they would be entitled to three members in this House, they provided in the constitution for the election of that number.

Up to this time there can be no question that the proceedings of the convention were strictly regular. If three members were elected, as would seem to be intimated by the paper read at the desk, the question is, to what extent does that operate on the validity of the election? Congress, when it admitted the State of Minnesota under the constitution sent here, has recognized the validity of the acts of that convention. That constitution provided for three members to represent the State on this floor. But Congress only recognized the constitution sub modo, subject to conditions and limitations as to its representation here. The act of Congress admitting Minnesota into the Union limits it to two members; and the question is, does this act of admission, cutting down the representation to two members, nullify absolutely the election previously held, and held regularly?

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he holds that the act of admission is retrospective in its operation, and authorized the people of Minnesota, contrary to the general act of Congress, to elect two Representatives on the 13th of last October; or whether the act of admission was only prospective?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I suppose, sir, that the act of admission operates back to the original election of delegates to the convention; that it relates back to, confirms, sanctions, and approves, all the steps that have been taken by the people of Minnesota, in pursuance of the enabling act, to prepare themselves for admission into the Union; and so recognizing, so approving, so indorsing, it makes good all their acts, except to the extent to which they may have been subsequently modified by the act of admission.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would like to know whether there is anything in the papers to alter the legal effect of what is to flow from the face of the certificate, except the letter of Mr. Sam Medary indorsing Greeley's Almanac?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. There is this much to alter the effect which may legally flow from the paper beside the certificate and Greeley's Almanac, and that is the act by which the State was admitted into the Union. That limits the representation of Minnesota on this floor to two members; and that is a very important limitation.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The point at which my mind enters is, how are we to tell which two of the three are best entitled to seats? I ask, therefore, if there is any other authority than that which has been quoted to show which two I am to take?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I know not what authority would be satisfactory to the gentleman. I have read the statement that these gentlemen received the highest vote, and no other gentleman has presented credentials here. The paper which has been read this morning, and which has found its way into the hands of the Clerk, has never been presented as the credentials of any member in this House. It ought not to stand in that light, and ought not so to be considered. The House is confining itself, and ought to confine itself, to the question whether these gentlemen whose credentials are presented are prima facie entitled to be sworn in as members. I look upon the other paper as entirely outside the controversy. The committee have expressed no opinion upon the validity of the election. That question was not before them. They have merely decided that these gentlemen have, from the credentials they present to the House, a prima facie right to be sworn in. Whether any other member subsequently claiming his seat has the right to contest the election, is, it seems to me, a matter which need not occupy the House for a moment. That was not a question which was referred to the committee, and they have not considered it.

Mr. GILMER. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will give way to the gentleman from North Carolina, who is a member of the committee.

Mr. GILMER. I will only occupy the time of the House for a moment, simply to read the authorities upon which the opinions expressed by the minority of the committee in their report are based. Before I proceed, however, I wish to ask the Speaker whether my memory serves me correctly, that when this paper, which was read this morning, was presented some time ago in the House some exception was taken to it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair never heard of the certificate to which the gentleman from North Carolina refers until after the meeting of the House this morning, when his attention was called to it by the Journal clerk. It has never been before the House in any way.

Mr. GILMER. I thought I recollected something of the sort, and I merely wished to know whether I was correct in my recollection. The position taken by the minority of the committee is that this election is utterly void for three reasons:

First, that our Constitution allows States, and States only, to elect members of this House; and that the Territory of Minnesota remained a Territory until the passage of the act admitting the State into the Union.

The second point is, that the Constitution of the United States gives to Congress the power to require the States to elect by single districts, and Congress having exercised that right, requiring all elections of members to this House to be by districts, this election of the people of the Territory of Minnesota is in direct conflict with that law, a constitutional law, and, therefore, the election is entirely void.

The third reason is, that supposing the first two points not to be well sustained, and supposing the act of admission to go back to the 13th of October, when the election was held, the people of Minnesota had not the rightful power to elect three members of Congress, and this House make such an election valid as to two. I will now read the authorities upon which the minority of the committee have based their opinions.

I read, in the first place, from 10th Howard, page 77. It is very short:

"The citation is signed the 20th of November, 1847. The case has been submitted by counsel on written arguments under the fortieth and fifty-sixth rules of the court. The first question presented is, whether or not this court has jurisdiction to review the judgment below. "The Territory of Wisconsin was admitted into the Union as a State, on the 29th of May, 1848. (9 Stat. at Large, 233.)

"An act had been previously passed, on the 2d of March, 1847, assenting to the admission on certain terms and conditions to be first complied with; and providing that upon a compliance with them, and on the proclamation of the President announcing the fact, the admission should be considered complete. The admission did not take place under this act, and no proclamation was issued by the President in pursuance of it.

"The people of the Territory again assembled, by a convention of delegates, and formed their constitution, on the 1st of February, 1848, as is recited in the preamble of the act of Congress, passed 29th May, 1848, by the first section of which the State is declared to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. The date of the admission, therefore, is the 29th of May, 1848.

"The writ of error having been issued on the 20th of November, 1847, was, therefore, regularly issued during the existence of the territorial government, and the case was pending in this court at the time when that government ceased, and with it the jurisdiction and power of the territorial courts. (Benner v. Porter, 9 Howard, 235.)"

I present that, Mr. Speaker, as authority express, that there is no State in the Union, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, until the act passed admitting her into the Union. I know that there are precedents to the contrary; but in a Congress like this, where there is a decided majority in favor of one of the political parties, there is no necessity for resorting to any such shift; and I hope, in this case, the question will be decided in conformity to the law of the country.

In respect to the other point, that the elections must be by districts, I admit that there are precedents overruling it. But, sir, the power of Congress to require that these elections shall be by districts is settled by constitutional law; and that there may be no difficulty, I will read the clause from the Constitution of the United States:

"Sec. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I made a statement the other day that the party elected from Minnesota, who has not applied for admission, was the party who had received the highest number of votes. My colleague has read a statement of votes, from the Tribune Almanac, by which he makes it appear that Messrs. Phelps and Cavanaugh received the highest number of votes. I read from another Tribune, which gives the precise vote, and shows Becker to have received twenty thousand five hundred and eighty-six votes, Phelps twenty thousand four hundred and ninety, and Cavanaugh twenty thousand one hundred and ninety-one. That is the actual vote; but, by throwing out certain counties, Mr. Becker's vote was made to appear the smallest, and the canvassers returned the other two as having the highest number of votes.

Mr. GILMER. Upon the point that the vote is void as to the issue, for the reason before intimated, that three were elected, when, in no possible view, can it be insisted that they were authorized to elect more than two, I refer to the authority of this House. I read from the seventh volume of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, third session of the Twenty-Fifth Congress, 1838-39, page 135. The House proceeded to elect two members of a committee; some ballots were thrown in for three; and the question arose whether those ballots should be counted at all. I will read what appears in the Globe:

"The House thereupon proceeded to ballot for two members, to fill the remaining vacancies on the committee.

"Mr. GARLAND reported the result; which was, that the total number of votes cast had been 201; necessary to a choice 101; of which

Mr. Foster had received	101
Mr. Owens	103
Mr. Hamer	90
Mr. Thomas	84

and many other members smaller numbers. He also stated that on one ballot there had been three names. As the tellers had no means of ascertaining which two of the three to count, they had considered the ballot as blank.

"The CHAIR quoted the rule in relation to blank ballots, and pronounced their decision to be, in the opinion of the Chair, correct.

"No objection was made to it in the House. "The SPEAKER thereupon declared Mr. Foster, of New York, and Mr. Owens, of Georgia, to be duly elected."

I hold in my hand Glanville's Reports of cases adjudged by Parliament, and in it I find a case where two members were elected to Parliament while the law authorized the election of only one; and the election was held void, ab initio, and Parliament decided that neither party was entitled to his seat. I will read only one paragraph:

"Thirdly. If the return be absolutely and irreconcilably repugnant, then the same is utterly void; as if the same parties, by several indentures of the same date, do return two several persons to be burgesses, in one and the same manner, and for one and the same place, to the sheriff, and he, in the like manner, do equally, and without distinction, return them over to the court; in such case, neither of the parties so returned, are to be admitted into the House till the return be amended."

I will not consume any more time of the gentleman from Illinois, and, thanking him for his courtesy, I yield him the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, resumed the floor.

Mr. KEITT. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois, who is chairman of the Committee of Elections, whether or not the gentlemen who are to be sworn in under the resolution, have not certificates from the proper legal authorities in Minnesota?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I understand they have, and I will explain it more fully as I proceed.

Mr. KEITT. And I want to know whether anybody contests their seats?—in other words, whether these two men have the proper returns? for we are to judge of the returns and qualifications, and contestants can come forward hereafter.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GILMER] predicates his whole argument upon the ground that we are here to try the election of these two gentlemen—a point entirely disclaimed by the committee. The question of their election is not in controversy. The only question is, whether they present themselves in such attitude, and with such papers or credentials, as to entitle them, no one appearing to contest their right, to be admitted and sworn in. That is the question, and the only question.

I will, before I reply more fully to the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina, respond to the inquiries of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KEITT.] By the twenty-first section of the schedule adopted by the Minnesota convention, which framed the constitution of Minnesota, it is provided that—

"The returns of said election, for and against this constitution, and for all State officers and members of the House of Representatives of the United States, shall be made and certificates issued in the manner now prescribed by law for returning votes given for Delegate to Congress; and the returns for all district officers, judicial, legislative, or otherwise, shall be made to the register of deeds of the senior county in each district, in the manner prescribed by law, except as otherwise provided. The returns for all officers elected at large shall be canvassed by the Governor of the Territory, assisted by Joseph R. Brown and Thomas J. Galbraith, at the time designated by law for canvassing the vote for Delegate to Congress."

It will be observed, then, that the constitution designates a board of commissioners, composed of the Governor, J. R. Brown, (who, with the Governor, signed the paper which was read a short time since at the Clerk's desk,) and Thomas J. Galbraith, and that the certificates have been issued in the manner then prescribed by law for returning votes given for Delegate to Congress. By turning to the organic act, it will be found that it provides that the Governor of the Territory shall issue his certificate precisely in the form in which it has been issued in this case. The constitution referred back to that law, and follows that law in its direction, and a certificate is given not only in conformity with the organic law referred to in the constitution, but in conformity with the constitution itself.

I am, then, prepared to answer the question of the gentleman from South Carolina, that these certificates are precisely in the form contemplated by the organic law of the Territory, which is adopted for the purposes of this election, and made a part of the organic law of the State, and that there can be no question, in my judgment, as to their legality, and their right to be received here in full faith and credit.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The position which I take in that respect is, that the constitution does provide that the Governor of the Territory may issue a certificate of election. Without that permission, the Governor of the Territory would have no more right to give certificates than any other person, and it would have no effect whatever. When, then, we are referred to the constitution to obtain this authority, we see in that same instrument that Minnesota is entitled to three Representatives, that she is entitled to elect three, and we find by credentials sent to the Clerk of this House that she has, in fact, elected three. We have also judicial knowledge, if I may so speak, of the fact that the State is entitled by law of Congress to but two Representatives; and, therefore, I hold that the objection is vital, and cannot be got over. The credentials themselves, and the facts referred to in them, and of which we have knowledge, actual and legal, show that there has not been, and that there could by no possibility have been, a legal election. Therefore, the credentials themselves show, in connection with the laws of which we have knowledge, that there is not even a prima facie case; but they negative that presumption absolutely and without remedy; and it is impossible for the House, at any future time, to come to a different result, for it is now in possession of all the facts bearing upon this point.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I yielded to the gentleman for a question, not for a speech. The gentleman is playing on the same instrument that is played upon here all the time. He is discussing the question of election, which was entirely ignored by the committee. We are not discussing that question, and do not propose to do it. We are discussing the right of members to be sworn and admitted to their seats here on the credentials which they present. When the question of election comes up we will decide that; but, until it is presented by some person claiming a better right than they have, we do not propose to decide that question.

Now, sir, as to the remarks made by the gentleman from North Carolina. He says that none but "States" can elect members to Congress. Now, Minnesota, at the time she elected these members to the House, was a State, subject only to the act of admission by Congress. She had a constitution framed in pursuance of an act of Congress—a solemn legislative act, fully authorizing her to prepare herself to become a State. She acted under that authority in the formation of her constitution. The recognition by Congress of that constitution operated back, and made valid all the steps that had been taken by the people of Minnesota to become a State. It is one of the attributes of a sovereign State of the Union that she shall have a representative in each House of Congress. She has a right to take all necessary steps to be represented in the Senate and in the House, immediately on her admission. If not, how long is she to be deprived of that right? Are we to allow States to come into the Union without representation in either of its legislative branches; and if so, what conditions are you to put upon them? How long are they to be so deprived?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Does the gentleman desire an answer to that question?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Not only have they the right, apparent and open to the observation, comprehension and approbation of every one, to prepare themselves for representation upon admission, but it has been the uniform practice since the organization of the Government, where States had elected Representatives and members before the act of admission, to allow them to take their seats when the act of admission is consummated. This is the first time I have ever known any objection to any member so elected, except, possibly, in the case of the State of California; but there it was not on this question, but on the question of their being elected by general ticket. Gentlemen, therefore, on the other side of this question, have not only the theory of the Government to combat, but also the whole practice of both Houses of Congress, from its commencement down.

But the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GILMER] makes another objection. He says that the act of 1842 requires that members shall be elected by districts. Now, one word on that point. The second section of the act of June 25, 1842, provided that, "in every case where a State is entitled to more than one Representative, the number to which each State shall be entitled under this apportionment shall be elected by districts," composed of contiguous territory, &c. It was intended by that act to limit its operation to that apportionment alone. The subsequent act of 1851 did not reenact that provision; and it expired by its own limitation. If it were not so, the Twenty-Eighth Congress, meeting the year after that act was passed, rejected and repudiated it by a vote of more than two to one, as being an act not passed in conformity with the Constitution, and being void; and members from four States of the Union, New Hampshire, Georgia, Mississippi, and Missouri, were admitted to seats on the floor of this House, against the provisions of the law. It never has been recognized; and I believe that, with the exception of two Congresses, from the day it passed, down, members have held their places here who were elected by general ticket.

I take it that these are the only points really involved in this case. As to the statement made by my colleague, [Mr. WASHBURN,] that the returns as they were originally made, gave Mr. Becker, of whom I know nothing, more votes than either of the other members. He says that that is the statement of another Tribune. I know not which of the Tribunes have the most weight with my colleagues. I claim that which is referred to by the parties, and on which they are willing to rely. I understand, however, that these are the facts in regard to these returns: that before any returns were opened by the board of canvassers named in the constitution, Governor Medary and Mr. Galbraith (who was the Republican member of the board) agreed on certain rules which should govern them in the reception or rejection of returns or votes. In that agreement Mr. Brown did not concur; but one Republican and one Democrat did agree that in deciding on the legality and admissibility of the returns, they would be governed by certain rules. They supposed that without such agreement there might be serious difficulties in regard to votes. When the votes were opened and counted, according to the agreement which they had made in good faith, many returns which were informal and illegal were rejected; and that may have affected Mr. Becker's vote. I do not know that such is the fact. The legality of the returns was a matter which the canvassing officers had a right to decide; and the returns which they made are binding on us until they are questioned, controverted, and set aside by the House; so that if it be, as stated by my colleague, that the votes cast gave a different complexion to the majorities of the different members, it is a matter of no consequence here, because the canvassing officers were the proper persons to decide on the validity of the returns.

Mr. STANTON. Would the gentleman from Illinois hold that these gentlemen were entitled to be sworn in if they presented a joint certificate?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will reply to the gentleman as the Chair does sometimes—that I will decide that point when it arises; and I say to him further, that I am not deciding the question of election, and do not propose to do so.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Would the gentleman have them sworn in on that kind of a return?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. This paper is not given as a return. The members came here with certain papers which they say are the credentials which accredit them to this House. That paper has not been in the possession of the House. We are trying the case by the record before us. I do not know that there is any legal mode by which this paper got into the hands of the Clerk. I do not suppose there was. It was a volunteer document sent to the Clerk, not to be placed before the House, and it never has been until this morning, and in this informal way. It bears no file-mark, and is entitled to no consideration by the House.

Mr. STANTON. I ask if that is not the ordinary evidence returned by the Executive of a Territory or State on which members are sworn in in the first instance?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I understand that there is a practice in some of the States of making a return to the Clerk, for what purpose I do not know, and I do not care. If there were others here contesting the right of these gentlemen, and claiming their seats, I maintain that even then these members would be still entitled to be sworn in, and the whole subject referred to the Committee of Elections, through which it may subsequently come up in the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire to inquire of my friend from Illinois, whether the member presenting a certificate, authenticates the certificate and the seal it bears, or whether the seal does not authenticate the right of the member?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The certificate with its broad seal, gives the holders a prima facie right to their seats, and we have to determine it upon their credentials alone—nothing else; and the Committee of Elections have confined their inquiries to the questions referred to them in the resolution of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois—

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I cannot yield the floor further.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Does the gentleman from Illinois refuse to allow me to ask a question?

Mr. DAVIDSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois expressly stated that he would not again yield the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will permit the gentleman from Maine to ask his question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. My question is, whether, if these credentials are sufficient now to admit these gentlemen to seats upon this floor, they are not also sufficient to entitle them to retain their seats, and to prevent any one from contesting their seats?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Certainly not. If no one comes forward to claim their seats, of course they will retain them. If their seats are contested, of course the question will be referred to the Committee of Elections, and be passed upon by the House. In the case of the California election, objection was made immediately on the presentation of the credentials of the members. But, notwithstanding, they were sworn in, and allowed to take their seats. And so it has been in every case.

But sir, I do not propose to detain the House further in this matter. I hope the vote will be taken; and I shall be satisfied with the decision of the House, whatever it may be.

Mr. HILL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be put. I do it for the purpose of making a suggestion or motion which I hope will place this matter in a position which will be satisfactory to all parties in this controversy. I send up a proposition which I propose to offer if the House reconsiders the vote by which the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. HUGHES. I object to the reading of any paper that is not in order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Did the gentleman from Georgia vote with the majority on ordering the main question?

Mr. HILL. I did not vote at all.

The SPEAKER. Then it is not competent for the gentleman to make the motion.

Mr. MAYNARD. For the purpose of enabling the gentleman from Georgia to submit his proposition, I submit the motion to reconsider.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Did the gentleman from Tennessee vote with the majority?

The SPEAKER. He did.

Mr. HILL. I now ask that my proposition may be reported.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I object.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman from Georgia cannot have his proposition read, I will withdraw my motion to reconsider.

Mr. HILL. Cannot my proposition be read?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I object.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. [Cries of "Object!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the proposition of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. HUGHES. How did the proposition of the gentleman from Maine come before the House?

The SPEAKER. It was admitted by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Maine proposes to amend the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting the following:

"That Messrs. W. W. Phelps and J. M. Cavanaugh are not entitled to be admitted and sworn as members of this House."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 125; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Buffington, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Coffax, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Fenton, Foster, Gilmer, Gooch, Granger, Grow, J. Morrison Harris, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Milson, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Caldwell, C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Admin, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bliss, Biscoe, Boyce, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Comins, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dawes, Dewar, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leiter, Fletcher, MacLay, McKibbin, McQuay, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Moore, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Quinan, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—125.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. RUFFIN stated that Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina, had paired off with Mr. GOODWIN.

Mr. LOVEJOY stated that Mr. FARNSWORTH had paired off with Mr. BOWIE.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE stated that Mr. HATCH had paired off with Mr. FENTON.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, stated that Mr. WOOP had paired off with some gentleman on the other side of the House, he did not know whom.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia, stated that he had paired off with Mr. OLIN.

Mr. PHILLIPS stated that Mr. LEIDY had paired off with some gentleman on the other side of the House, he did not recollect whom.

Mr. PALMER stated that Mr. SEARING had paired off with Mr. SHERMAN, of New York, until two o'clock to-day.

Mr. COVODE stated that Mr. BENNETT had paired off with Mr. BOWIE.

The question recurring upon the resolution of the majority of the committee,

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Admin, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bliss, Biscoe, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Campbell, Caruthers, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dawes, Dewar, Dimmick, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leiter, Fletcher, MacLay, McKibbin, McQuay, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Moore, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Quinan, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—135.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Buffington, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Coffax, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Fenton, Foster, Gilmer, Gooch, Granger, Grow, Hill, Horton, Howard, Kelsey, Knapp, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Milson, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Potter, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, John Sherman, Stanton, William Stewart, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Caldwell, C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—63.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Pending the call,

Mr. FOLEY stated that Mr. SANDIDGE had paired off with Mr. GILMAN.

Mr. MILES stated that Mr. BONHAM was still detained from the House by sickness in his family, and had paired off with Mr. WALDRON.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

In pursuance of an order of the House, the usual oath to support the Constitution of the United States was then administered to Messrs. W. W. Phelps and J. M. Cavanaugh as members from the State of Minnesota.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. GROW. I ask that all private bills upon the Speaker's table, to which no objection shall be made, be taken up, and referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. SEWARD. Before that is done, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Naval Affairs a bill for the relief of the widow of Lieutenant Herndon, in order that it may be referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I desire to call up another privileged question, that it may be disposed of.

Mr. GROW. I appeal to the House to allow these private bills to be sent to the appropriate committees to be acted on.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If no one else objects to it, I shall not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SEWARD. I have a bill in my hand that I desire to report—

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I did not give way for reports to be made. I understood that the gentleman from Pennsylvania desired to have some bills upon the Speaker's table referred to appropriate committees.

The following Senate bills and resolutions upon the Speaker's table were then taken up, read a first and second time, and referred as indicated below:

An act (No. 103) for the relief of Simon de Visser and José Villarrubia, of New Orleans. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act (No. 294) for the relief of Lemuel Worsster. Referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

An act (No. 222) for the relief of Jeremiah Moors. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act (No. 46) to grant the right of preemption in certain lands to the Indiana Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled, bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act for the relief of the representatives of William Smith, deceased, late of Louisiana;

An act for the relief of Isaac Drew and others, settlers upon the public lands in the State of Wisconsin;

Joint resolution for paying the compensation of stenographers employed by committees of the House of Representatives;

An act for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of William Conway, deceased;

An act for the relief of Pierre Broussard, deceased;

An act for the relief of Marie Malines;

An act for the relief of Regis Loisel, or his legal representatives;

An act for the relief of Brevet Major H. L. Kendrick;

An act for the relief of Isaac Carpenter;

An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to Ansel Wilkinson," approved August 13, 1856;

An act for the relief of Pierre Gagnon, of Natchitoches, Louisiana;

An act to increase the pension of John Richmond; and

An act for the relief of Thomas Smithers.

OHIO CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I now call up the Ohio contested-election case.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I rise to what I suppose to be a privileged question. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I prefer that this case shall be taken up and decided to-day.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to give way to enable me to report from the Committee on Naval Affairs a bill of the Senate, granting a pension to the widow of Lieutenant Herndon, for the purpose of having it referred to a Committee of the Whole House; so that it may come up when the House goes into committee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. There are several gentlemen who are appealing to me to give way for them, and if I yield for one I must for another.

Mr. SEWARD. But this is a peculiar case. It will not take two minutes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I desire very much to oblige the gentleman from Georgia, and I believe his case is a very meritorious one, but there are four or five gentlemen who are appealing to me to yield; and if I yield to one I must to another. I decline to give way.

Mr. WINSLOW. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I cannot. I now call up the case of Clement L. Vallandigham, contesting the seat of Lewis D. Campbell in this House. The Committee of Elections did not agree in their views of the case. It so happened that I was not able to concur with any of my colleagues on the committee. I send the following resolution to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a vacancy exists in the representation in the House of Representatives of the United States from the third congressional district of the State of Ohio, and that the Speaker be directed to notify the Governor of that State thereof.

Mr. KELSEY. I rise to a question of order. I submit that there has been no report in this case from the Committee of Elections. There is simply a statement by the committee, stating that they were unable to agree in any report in the case. I make, therefore, the point of order, that this question is not properly before the House for its action, inasmuch as the minority of the Committee of Elections could not submit a report. In that position I believe I am sustained by the decision of the Chair during the present session.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York apprehends the facts correctly, the point is properly taken by him; but the Chair understands that the report which was submitted, although there is no recommendation in it in the shape of a resolution, did meet with the approbation of a majority of the committee.

Mr. KELSEY. I believe that fact does not appear from the report itself. I know it was so stated by the gentleman from Illinois at the time; but I understand there are three distinct reports presented by that committee upon the question submitted to its consideration. If I am right in that fact, then I think I am right in the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The different reports made from the committee were made a part of the report of the committee.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a point of order. I submit that debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order on a point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It was stated in the report of the committee that each report made a part of the report of the committee.

Mr. GILMER. I ask my friend from Illinois to yield me the floor for a moment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to explain the report of the committee?

Mr. GILMER. I believe the report is a report of the majority on this one point, and this point only; that a minority believed that Mr. Vallandigham was not elected; that another minority of three believed that Mr. Campbell is not entitled to the seat; that another minority of the committee was of opinion that the case should be sent back to the people. They reported those facts.

The SPEAKER. The report submitted by the gentleman from Illinois purports to be the views or opinions or sentiments of a majority of the committee. The report reads as follows:

"The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Clement L. Vallandigham, contesting the right of the Hon. Lewis D. Campbell to a seat in the House of Representatives as a member of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, from the third congressional district of the State of Ohio, have had the same under consideration and have directed me to report," &c.

And, in conclusion, the report says:

"The committee ask that the views of their minorities, respectively, accompanying this report, may be received by the House."

The only irregularity connected with the report is that the committee have not accompanied their report with a recommendation in the shape of a resolution. It is, however, unquestionably such a report from the Committee of Elections as the House can predicate action upon.

Mr. LAMAR. I propose the following substitute for the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Illinois:

Resolved, That Lewis D. Campbell is not entitled to a seat in the Thirty-Fifth Congress as the Representative from the third congressional district of Ohio.

Resolved, That Clement L. Vallandigham is entitled to a seat in the Thirty-Fifth Congress as Representative from the third congressional district of Ohio.

Mr. GILMER. I move to amend the substitute by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and to insert the following:

That the Hon. Lewis D. Campbell is entitled to retain his seat as member from the third congressional district in the State of Ohio to this Congress.

Mr. KELSEY. I desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair upon the question of order I raised. And I wish to read from a report submitted by the committee of this House, to show that I am correct.

Mr. BURNETT. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that he appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. KELSEY. The report says:

"But, from the points involved and the character of the testimony adduced, neither the committee nor a majority of their number have been able to agree upon any proposition for the action of the House."

I submit that the committee have directly told the House that they were unable to agree, and in conclusion they ask that the several minorities may submit their views. Therefore there is no report of the committee here.

Mr. KEITT. Can an appeal be taken now, business having intervened between the decision of the question and the appeal now taken?

Mr. KELSEY. I withdraw my appeal. I wanted to put the facts before the House for their consideration.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I suppose this is the proper time for the House to determine whether they will now consider this subject, and therefore I desire that that question may be put to the House, under the 5th rule, I believe.

The SPEAKER. Does not the gentleman from Maryland perceive that the House has already proceeded to the consideration of it?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not. I suppose that when my friend from Illinois rose and called the attention of the House to it, it was necessary that we should understand what the proposition was, before the question arises whether the House will consider it or not. And now it is for the House to say whether they will or will not proceed to the consideration of the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois at this time. The fact that it is a question of privilege only gives my friend from Illinois the right to propose the motion to the House, and it is for the House afterwards to determine whether they will now consider it, or at some future time. I therefore ask that there shall be a vote of the House as to whether they will consider it now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls the attention of the Chair to the 5th rule.

Mr. SEWARD. Do I understand that the amendments have been introduced.

The SPEAKER. They have been.

Mr. SEWARD. I would like to know how they got in while the gentleman from Illinois had the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois yielded for that purpose.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, I object to gentlemen being allowed to yield to gentlemen to introduce amendments. When I desired to make a motion the Chair decided that I could not do it; that I was out of order. Now I desire to know whether any gentleman upon this floor has privileges above me in making motions? I desire to have a proper understanding between the Speaker and myself, and to know whether I am to be proscribed?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Is the point of order debatable? If the gentleman makes a point of order, I hope the Chair will decide it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has entertained the amendment submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER.]

Mr. SEWARD. And yet the Chair declined to entertain my proposition.

The SPEAKER. Because it was objected to by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, my objection to the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina would be quite as effective as another gentleman's objection to mine.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me for a moment.

The SPEAKER. There is a question of order already pending which must be decided.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not rise to a question of order.

Mr. GROW. Could not any member on the floor rise to a question of privilege as to the seat of any member? Is it necessary that it should come from a committee at all?

The SPEAKER. It would be competent, of course. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from Maryland rises too late to ask that the proposition be submitted to the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. At what point could I have risen earlier?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could have risen whenever the gentleman from Illinois indicated the particulars of his proposition—certainly when he sent up his resolution. The gentleman from Maryland allowed the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to propose an amendment, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GILMER] was allowed to submit another proposition. The amendments certainly could not be before the House unless the subject-matter had been taken up. The very fact of entertaining the amendments was a declaration that the House was proceeding to the consideration of the subject-matter.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair. I supposed that, until the gentleman from Illinois had read the statement of what he called on the House to consider, there was no opportunity of interfering.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Maryland had then risen, and required that the 5th rule should be enforced, the Chair would have considered it as in time; but the gentleman from Maryland permitted two amendments to be offered to the proposition. The amendments certainly could not be entertained if the subject was not before the House for consideration.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. TRIPE. Has not the gentleman from Illinois yielded the floor?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois stated distinctly that he yielded to the gentleman on his right and the gentleman on his left, [Messrs. GILMER and LAMAR,] to enable them to offer amendments.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois—

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. I insist that the gentleman who has the floor shall maintain it, or yield it entirely. I object to its being yielded to any gentleman, except for an explanation or to ask a question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I suppose the gentleman from Kentucky and the Speaker will act just exactly as we have acted heretofore. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me, for the purpose of making a motion which would be cut off by the previous question?

Mr. BURNETT. I object. The gentleman has no right to yield the floor under the rules, except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. If objection be made, the gentleman from Illinois cannot yield the floor to the gentleman from Kentucky, for the purpose of making a motion.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I merely want to know what the fashion of the times is, that we may all practice it.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; and I say to my colleague that he has refused to yield me the floor under similar circumstances.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. There is very little, Mr. Speaker, that I desire to say in connection with the question before the House. My views are briefly represented to the House in the shape of a report, and I do not desire to occupy the time of the House in the discussion of these views now. The contestant desires to be heard, and has heretofore had the leave of the House for that purpose. I state here now that I do not intend to call the previous question till there has been fair room for debate, and I hope that this day will be devoted to it, and that gentlemen leaving the Hall shall not hereafter claim that they have not had an opportunity to discuss it here. But I desire that the debate shall be closed to-day, and that the vote may be taken to-day, or Monday morning—I am not particular which.

Mr. GILMER. I propose that the vote be postponed till Tuesday, at one o'clock. Members may, in the mean time, examine the reports carefully for themselves.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. As I stated, the gentleman from Ohio, who is contesting Mr. Campbell's right to the seat, desires to be heard, and heard in the opening of the discussion, and I yield the floor to him that he may now be heard.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to the floor being yielded unless it be surrendered entirely.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is so surrendered.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I now ask leave to offer my motion to recommit.

Mr. BURNETT. Who is entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Who has the floor?

The SPEAKER. The contestant.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Before we enter on the merits of the proposition, I suppose that I, as a member of the House, making a motion which is regular and in its ordinary proceedings, have a right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] has the floor.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. Mr. Speaker, unused to this presence, and limited by your rules to one hour, I beg, as a special indulgence from members of this House, the liberty to proceed without those interruptions which custom seems to approve in ordinary debate. When the time allotted me shall have expired, I will readily and with pleasure reply to such interrogatories as, in that same spirit of courtesy and candor which has generally been extended to me here throughout this investigation, may consistently with your rules be propounded by any member of this House.

I appear in this forum to-day, Mr. Speaker, as the Representative of nearly ten thousand of the qualified electors of the third congressional district of Ohio, and not in my own right. I propose to speak in their name and in their behalf alone; and I trust that, without suspicion of affectation, but solely for convenience and to avoid continual personal allusion, I may be permitted to refer to myself in the third person and as the contestant in this controversy, and to speak as one having no individual interest in it.

Within the time limited it is not possible to discuss, in a manner satisfactory to any one, either the facts or the question involved in this controverted election. The facts, indeed, I do not propose to consider at all. They have been found fully in the report of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] If any member of the House be not satisfied with that finding, it is, his right, as it is also his duty, to investigate them for himself; but, till called in question, I shall assume them precisely as found in that report.

Resolved, Mr. Speaker, to confine myself wholly to those matters which appear in the papers, testimony, and reports in this case, and which are essential to its just decision, and to avoid all allusion to whatever lies outside of these limits, and is not pertinent to the issue in the cause, I propose, briefly, and imperfectly of course, within the time allowed, to speak to two points mainly, which are presented to the judgment of the House. And I select these because, upon the face of the adverse reports, if either of them be resolved in favor of the contestant, he is entitled to the seat here in controversy.

The first of these points relates to the admissibility of testimony affecting a number of votes, sufficient, even upon the showing of those reports, not only to turn the scale against the returned member, but to elect the contestant. I refer to the DECLARATIONS or admissions by voters as to their qualifications, and as to the candidate for whom they voted. Many of the votes here controverted, some upon both sides, depend in whole or in part upon testimony of this character. In a large majority of cases indeed where it is offered, there is other and corroborating proof. But twelve votes on the part of the contestant depend solely upon this sort of testimony; and of these nine only are allowed in the report of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER,] which report finds also a majority in favor of the contestant, without these nine, and upon what is regarded as clear and satisfactory proof. The adverse reports reject all these twelve votes, as also many others—in all to the number of more than thirty—where these declarations are offered along with direct or circumstantial proof. But upon the face of these reports, if this evidence be admissible, the contestant is entitled to the seat.

It is the misfortune, Mr. Speaker, of all American legislative assemblies, composed, as they are, almost wholly of lawyers, that every question, even the gravest problems of Government and public policy, is argued as upon special demurrer, and tried by the narrow rules of a common law jurisdiction. Certainly, sir, the skill and discipline of the bar are available in every department of life, and nowhere more valuable than in legislation; but they ought to be here used as the discipline and skill of the athlete when he is transferred to military warfare; his strength, and courage, and powers of endurance are all just as valuable as in the campus, but the weapons, the strategy, and the tactics are totally changed. A controverted election resembles, indeed, a trial at law, far more than ordinary legislation; nevertheless, there is a wide difference as I shall attempt, by-and-by, to establish; and a more liberal rule is to be adopted in its investigation. But the first and natural impulse of every lawyer here, fresh from the dust and toil of forensic courts, is to test every question, especially of evidence, by the mere technical rules of the common-law jurisdiction, with which he has, every day, been accustomed to deal.

And thus, too, a civilian would in like manner try every question by the principles of the Code and the Pandects, and the practitioner at Doctors' Commons by the Gregorian Institute and the Clementine constitutions, and finding no "case in point," each would pronounce judgment accordingly. Sir, this is one of the "idols of the cave," against which the greatest of philosophers has warned us. No case like this ever has arisen, or ever can arise, in a forensic court, in the exercise of its ordinary or common-law jurisdiction. Yet I venture to affirm that it would not be difficult, in just such a case, and before just such a tribunal, to establish the admissibility of this evidence. Very true, sir—if, indeed, these declarations could be regarded as hearsay at all—hearsay evidence is said not to be admitted. Certainly this is the general rule; but the exceptions are as numerous as the variety and the exigencies of litigation; and every day for centuries has brought forth some modification of the rule, or some new application of the multiplied exceptions; and it is a significant fact, that one hundred and seventy-eight pages of the first volume of Greenleaf upon Evidence are devoted to these exceptions alone. It is no new thing, therefore, that hearsay or declarations should be received.

It is the every-day practice of your courts to receive and act upon just such evidence in the most important trials, not of property or liberty only, but of life also. In actions for malicious prosecutions, in cases of agency and trusts, in criminal conversation, in questions of sanity, sickness, pedigree, birth, marriage, death, boundary, in matters of public interest, though pertaining only to a district, parish, or neighborhood, it is regularly received. Inscriptions on family portraits and funeral monuments; entries by third persons; dying declarations; declarations by bankrupts; declarations in settlement cases, in questions of residence, or as a part of the res geste; declarations by privies in law, in blood, in estate; declarations against interest; and, of course, admissions and confessions, are all equally admissible, and whole volumes of reports and treatises are filled with them.

So, also, upon the principle of necessity, evidence otherwise inadmissible has been received. Thus, besides much of the hearsay to which I have referred, the testimony of the wife is, in certain cases, admitted against the husband; and the owner of a trunk, and in some States the wife of the owner, is received as a witness to prove the contents in an action against a common carrier. So, too, in many other cases; parties to the record, parties in interest, and others, excluded by the general rules of evidence, are yet admitted to testify.

Apply the principle here, and the declarations of a voter, both as to his qualifications and his vote, are clearly admissible. I say as to both; because the largest class of voters challenged in contests from States where, as in Ohio, there is no property qualification of any kind—a class which, in this very case, embraces one half the whole number controverted—consists of non-residents of the State or county, sojourners for a day, or "pipe-layers," if you please, colonized for the purposes of the election, and who, as soon as their mission is performed, leave the county for parts unknown, or beyond the jurisdiction of the officer appointed to take the testimony. But, more than all this, neither these sojourners, nor any other voters, whose rights are called in question, even if forced to attend, can be compelled to testify, either as to their votes, since they are by ballot, or their qualifications, because they might thereby subject themselves to a criminal prosecution. Both these exemptions are high constitutional rights in Ohio, which no tribunal is permitted to disregard. The former, if not as ancient is yet just as sacred and binding as the latter; since the very object of the secret ballot, that ungentlemanly mode of election, not founded certainly on the highest notions of human virtue and independence, and tending still less to foster and develop them, is to enable the elector to conceal what he ought never to be ashamed or afraid to avow. Nevertheless, that such is his right has been repeatedly adjudged. Add now to this the protection against self-crimination, by any compulsory admission or confession, and it is palpable that, without just such evidence as is here offered, there must, for the most part, be an utter failure of justice, and the right to purge the ballot-box by a scrutiny be rendered a delusion and a snare. And I beg to repeat here to the House, what I stated to the committee, that so far as the testimony of the voters themselves was procured—and no small part of the evidence in the case consists of it—it was upon a tacit or express pledge or understanding, not binding, certainly, but volunteered, nevertheless, that no prosecutions should be instituted.

Examples such as I have referred to, might be multiplied without number, and the proposition clearly established, that every instance where, in a given class of cases, a failure of justice would otherwise probably occur, courts of even common law, both in England and America, have uniformly departed from the rule—itsself, indeed, but an exception—which excludes hearsay; and thus the oath and cross-examination been obliged to yield to other tests of veracity, where justice and the public interest demand it. It is not enough to say that this common law excludes hearsay evidence. It once excluded all who had an interest in the suit. It shut out the parties to the record; and in other respects it was hemmed in and circumscribed. But one by one, all these limitations have been abrogated, and the whole tendency of courts and Legislatures now is to admit all evidence, and to allow the court or jury to judge of its credibility and its sufficiency, in view of all the surrounding circumstances of each particular case. But in an argument submitted to the committee and printed with the reports, I have discussed this part of the question at full length, and sustained the proposition by numerous citations from the highest authorities; and to that argument I respectfully refer the House.

Such, then, Mr. Speaker, are the rules, decisions, and course of reasoning from them, upon which, even in a court of common law, the admissibility of the declaration here objected to might be maintained. But I propose to ascend now to higher principles; to a more liberal tribunal and more enlarged jurisdiction; to a forum where public rights are investigated, and where the parties are the people. The House, in respect to contested elections, is, as one of the earliest writers upon the subject has observed, "as well a council of State, and court of equity and discretion, as a court of law and justice;" and applies, therefore, the legal rules of evidence rather by analogy and according to their spirit, than with the technical strictness of the ordinary judicial tribunals. Very early in the history of the Government—in 1793—Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, an able lawyer and sound statesman, said, in a contested election, that—"The House had been told that hearsay testimony was unworthy of attention, but he wished to remind them that they were not, like a court of law, restricted to proceed upon regular proof, and not go beyond the letter of it; they were entitled to hear and weigh everything advanced, and to form their opinion from the general conviction arising upon the whole circumstances."—Cont. Elections, 80.

And in a controverted election tried in Philadelphia in 1851, under a special statute of Pennsylvania, the learned judge who heard the case said:

"This is a great public inquiry in which the community are most deeply interested, bearing upon and affecting rights and the exercise of them that lie at the basis of our whole Government." * * * "It is not a suit, but a public investigation."

And upon that ground, his colleague concurring, he set aside the common-law rule upon the subject, and admitted the parties to the record to testify. And this same distinction was recognized by the court of Queen's Bench as far back as the reign of Queen Anne. Such a tribunal, then, is not to be circumscribed by the narrow technicalities of the common law. It has its own cursus curiæ, its practice and its precedents; and where these are silent, it ascends up to the principles of human nature and the springs of human conduct; to that law which is "the collected wisdom of ages, combining the principles of original justice with the boundless variety of human affairs."

And who, Mr. Speaker, are the parties before this august tribunal? Not the returned member and myself. No; we are but the John Doe and Richard Roe of the record. We claim on demise by the people. Every election and every citizen, nay, each inhabitant of the district, certainly every voter at the election of 1856, is a party. They are the constituency who are here demanding representation in this Hall. It is not the paltry salary, the "provoking gold," nor yet the honor, high though it may be, of a seat upon this floor, to one or the other of us, that gives value and moment to this controversy. It is because the rights of a hundred thousand people are concerned. We are but their agents and attorneys; neither of us is the only or the real party in interest; but every voter and all the voters at the election here controverted are the true parties before your tribunal. And applying now even the ordinary principles of the common law to this testimony, every voluntary admission or confession, whether as to qualification or as to vote, by any one having voted at that election, is receivable in evidence. The proposition is too clear for argument.

Upon what principle, then, is this testimony to be rejected? Because it is said to be hearsay, and to come without the sanction of oath and cross-examination. Sir, however valuable or necessary these tests may be in mere private judicial investigations, if they were to be required in the ordinary affairs of life, neither the political, social, nor business relations of the world, nor even individual existence, could be maintained for a single day. From the first breath we draw in infancy to the last moments of our lives, we are dependent for all, except what lies within the narrow circle of our own vision or experience, upon this self-same hearsay testimony. The whole history of the world, from the creation down to the events of yesterday, is founded upon it. Most of our knowledge of the arts, sciences, geography, astronomy, is derived from it. From the highest and most momentous transactions of the Government down through successive gradations to the most trivial concerns of human life and conduct, we are accustomed to act upon it.

Do you tell me that great empires and States—Persia, Greece, Rome—rose, flourished, and fell hundreds of years ago? That historians, philosophers, statesmen, artists, potent monarchs, and famous poets, lived and died centuries since? How do you know it? Do you believe in the Copernican system of astronomy, and teach your child that the earth turns upon its axis, and revolves round the sun? How do you know that? Do you tell me that many thousand miles off beyond the ocean there lies a vast empire called China, with more than a hundred millions of people? Have you seen it? Did you hear it sworn to? How do you know that Washington lived, or that the Declaration of Independence was adopted by the Continental Congress, or that the siege of Yorktown occurred? Has some old man of a hundred years told you? and did you stop to administer the oath and subject him to a cross-examination? Are you sure to-day that Napoleon is Emperor of France? or Victoria Queen of England? Do you believe that rebellion exists in India? or that the Palmerston Ministry fell the other day from power? Sir, in all these things, as in that which pertains to the world to come, we walk by faith and not by sight; and to discard and cast aside whatsoever does not come to us under the ordinary sanctions of judicial investigation, is to banish all books, to dry up all the fountains of knowledge, to arrest all progress, to subvert all civilization, and to degrade mankind, and each particular man, to the lowest depths of ignorance and scepticism.

Why, sir, the very existence of that rule of the common law which excludes hearsay is proved or known only by that same kind of evidence itself. It is found in books not written or published under the usual sanctions of forensic courts. It is traditionary—lex non scripta—and, like a custom, it is of the very essence of its validity that, in theory at least, it should have existed from a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. But I pursue this inquiry no further. My purpose has been solely to meet and repel the notion that this testimony is to be treated only with contempt.

I proceed now, Mr. Speaker, to what will, no doubt, be regarded by the lawyers in the House as of much more importance—I mean the parliamentary and congressional precedents upon this subject. Sir, this is no longer an open question in England. It was settled one hundred and fifty years ago, just as I claim it. It was the ancient practice—it is the modern practice. On a single shelf in your library are twenty-six volumes of reports and treatises on election cases decided in the Parliament of Great Britain during that long period, from 1699 to 1853, presenting an almost unbroken array of authorities in favor of the admissibility of this evidence. By resolution of the House of Commons in the great Grimaby case, in the former year, it was admitted; and again in the Bedfordshire case in 1715, by a vote of ninety-eight to sixty-six; and yet again in the Yorkshire case in 1735, by a vote of one hundred and eighty-one to one hundred and fifty-two, the petitioner was allowed to give in evidence of what a voter confessed of his having no freehold, who, at the election, had sworn that he had. Subsequent to these decisions a new mode of conducting contested elections was instituted by the Grenville act of 1772—a mode continued substantially till to-day. By that act, election committees are made a sort of judicial tribunal, acting under special oath, and deciding the case in secret and by ballot; but before whom counsel, and oftentimes the ablest lawyers of the realm, are heard. Forty-nine members are selected by lot; and from this list, thus chosen, each party strikes a name alternately till thirteen remain. These constitute the committee, and a separate committee is selected in each case. Regular reports, as in courts of common law, have been preserved of the decisions of these committees. I select cases from the earliest, the middle, and the latest of these reports. From the Worcester case, decided in 1776, I read the following:

"The counsel for the sitting members objected, in the beginning of the cause, to the admission of evidence to prove the declarations of voters that they had been bribed, and, therefore, under the bribery act, forfeited the right of suffrage.

"The committee, however, admitted such evidence as against the voters themselves, so as to annul their votes, but not as against the sitting members so as to disqualify them."—3 Doug. Elec. Cases, 276.

Again, from the Leominster case, in 1796, I read the following:

"Francis Weaver was objected to by the sitting member for having received parish relief within the year, and thus, as being a pauper, not qualified to vote; and John Gethin was called to prove a confession of Weaver made after the election, that his wife had been relieved by the parish. This was objected to as being subsequent to the election; it being thus implicitly conceded that if made before, it would be admissible. But the committee resolved, 'that the declaration of a voter which tends to destroy his vote, is admissible, whether made before or after the election, unless that declaration goes to affect the voter with penal consequences.'"—2 Peckw. Elec. Cases, 296.

But as will presently appear, the distinction here taken by the committee has since been overruled.

Again: from the Ipswich borough case, in 1835, I read the following:

"In this case (Brown's vote) the voter was objected to by the petitioners, on the ground of bribery, and in the course of the investigation, a question was put to the witness who came to prove the declarations of the voter as to his being bribed, what was the purport of the certain conversations he had with the voter relative to a bill. The question having been objected to, and counsel heard on both sides, the committee resolved, 'that evidence of declarations of voters in the admission of bribery, whether before, during, or after the election, is admissible.' The vote was ultimately struck off the poll."—Knapp & Ombl. Election Cases, pages 387, 388.

And the same decision was made upon another vote in the same case. And yet again: from the county of Carlow contested election, in 1837, I read the following:

"Mr. Maule objected that declarations of John Nowlan were not evidence against the sitting member. * * *

"Mr. Thesiger, [recently elevated to the Lord High Chancellorship of England,] in reply, said: 'In the Southampton case, it was held that evidence may be given of the declaration of a person even after voting, though it may tend to affect him with penal consequences; the dividing point was there made at the time of striking the ballot. In the Ripon case, the voter had stated to two persons in the months of June and July, 1832, that he had no vote, and that his aunt was tenant of the house; the election took place in the beginning of 1833, and the declarations were held admissible. A voter who has voted for the sitting member, is always considered as a party, and it is on that ground that his declarations are admissible. The question is always considered to be between the voter and the party questioning his vote, and not merely between the sitting member and the petitioner.' The committee resolved that the evidence be received."—Falc. & Fitzh. Election Cases, page 72.

And the same ruling was adopted in two cases in 1842, in 1843, in two cases in 1848, and finally in the St. Alban's case in 1851. And between the first of these decisions in 1699, and the last, seven years ago, I find and refer to the following additional cases also:

[Mr. Vallandigham here read a list of cases which, with the others above cited, and the references, will be found in the appendix to this speech.]

Here then, sir, are thirty-six cases in all, running through a period of one hundred and fifty years, presenting thus an array of authorities scarce ever found on any subject in any court. And besides all these, in the treatises upon this subject by Simeon, Chambers, Male, Rogers, Montague and Neale, Clerk, and Samuel Warren—the last as late as 1853—this evidence is recognized by all as admissible in every case of scrutiny of the poll, or election contested because of illegal votes; and one of the latest of these writers expressly says, that in such cases "the statements of voters are not open to objection as hearsay, as they are looked upon then as parties to the suit."

And so they all say. I find also the same doctrine—though founded upon but a very small part of the authorities to which I have referred, and they the earlier—laid down in a note by the learned reporter, in 3 McCord's South Carolina Reports, 230-233:

"The following heads may be made when declarations (or hearsay) may be given in evidence, namely: "22. The declarations of a voter may be given in evidence to set aside the election; as to diminish the poll by taking an incompetent vote off, or to prove bribery, &c.; but they are not admissible on a charge against the candidate for bribery, &c. They are admitted to annul votes, but not to set aside the election by disqualifying the member on account of his bribery, &c."

Finally, sir, it is recognized and adopted as sound law—though founded again upon but a small part of the authorities I have cited, and they again the earlier, and confined here to but a single class among those cases where it is admitted—in that standard practical treatise upon evidence by Phillips, with Cowen & Hill's notes, more weighty and valuable even than the text. From the third volume, page 322, I read the following:

"7. Another exception to the rule that hearsay is not evidence, has been adopted in summary inquiries into the validity of elections to the Legislature, on complaint that votes were obtained by bribery. The declarations of voters may be received as evidence of the bribery. This is, however, only to annul votes, but not to sustain a charge of bribery against the candidate, with a view to disqualify or affect him, otherwise than by vacating his election."

I trust now, Mr. Speaker, that this long series of adjudications by the Parliament of Great Britain, the high character of the committees, the great men—some of them of historic renown—who have composed these committees, the yet greater lawyers who have practiced before them, and the high authorities by which their rulings have been recognized, are enough, in the judgment of the House, not only to rescue this evidence from the contempt with which it has sometimes been treated, but to establish, beyond all doubt, that it is the right and the duty of the House to receive and act upon it.

I pass now, sir, to the American precedents; and here a new or additional application, in part, of the rule is, in some cases, presented. In England, as in several of the States of this Union, elections are now, as they always have been, viva voce. Proof of the declarations of voters as to how they voted can, in such cases, rarely become necessary, and hence the decisions and authorities there, of course, do not often present this application of the rule. But, in every instance where the question has arisen, as in the Windsor case, in 1807, where, by mistake, the poll-lists failed to show for whom the voter challenged had voted, the evidence has been received just as in any other case. And, besides, the nature of the evidence is precisely the same. It is equally hearsay, if at all. But the voters being parties to the proceeding, any declarations or admissions made by them, pertinent to the issue, are equally admissible; and accordingly the distinction does not appear ever to have been set up.

I have already quoted from the speech of Smith of South Carolina, in 1793, upon this question: I refer also, in brief, to the cases of Kelly and Harris, in 1813; Easton and Scott, in 1816; Reed and Cosden, in 1821; Letcher and Moore, in 1834; in all of which this question was considered, and the evidence, with or without qualification, received; and I find no case where, as to either qualification or vote, it has been wholly rejected, except Newland and Graham, in 1835. But subsequent to this came up the great New Jersey "Broad-Seal case" of 1840, when the direct question, especially as to the vote, was considered, and solemnly decided unanimously by the committee. I read from the report of the majority, as follows:

"Although in numerous instances the voter being examined as a witness, voluntarily disclosed the character of his vote, yet in many cases he either did not appear, or appearing chose to avail himself of his legal right to refuse an answer on that point. In such cases the proof of general representation as to the political character of the voter, and as to the party to which he belonged at the time of the election, has been considered sufficiently demonstrative of the complexion of his vote. Where no such proof was adduced on either side, proof of the declarations of the voter has been received, the date and all the circumstances of such declarations being considered as connecting themselves with the questions of credibility and sufficiency. In every instance where the proofs under all the circumstances were not sufficient to prove conviction, the vote has been left unappropriated."—House Reports, 1839-40, No. 541, page 399.

From the report of the minority, page 749, I read the following:

"If an unlawful vote be cast, how are we to ascertain who had the benefit of such vote? It is obvious that in many cases it will be impracticable to obtain positive proof. In some cases the voter may be willing to appear and disclose the fact under oath; in other cases it may be in the power of the party to produce a witness who can swear to the character of the vote given; but in many more no evidence of that description can be obtained to ascertain the fact in controversy. It seems to the undersigned to be indispensable to receive secondary evidence—('substitutionary' they should have said, for it is not secondary in a technical sense, being the confession or admission of a party)—to this point, such as the declaration of the voter, either at the election or soon after, and also proof of his political character, which, when well defined, will be a sufficient guide to the truth. But we ought to be very careful not to receive and act upon evidence of an equivocal character, which may have been created or manufactured for the occasion."

Such, Mr. Speaker, was the solemn and deliberate decision, unanimously, of the ablest and perhaps the most partisan election committee ever appointed—a committee which agreed in scarce anything else—and certainly in the most bitterly contested partisan election case ever brought into the Halls of Congress—a committee numbering among its members John Campbell of South Carolina, Truman Smith of Connecticut, Governor Medill of Ohio, John M. Botts of Virginia, Aaron V. Brown of Tennessee, and Millard Fillmore of New York. And the precedent thus established by them—I say established, for if ever a congressional precedent can be regarded as authority, this is the highest—has been generally approved and acquiesced in ever since. It has never been overruled by either a committee or the House; and never but once—in the last Congress—has a contrary doctrine been suggested, and that in a minority report, and in a case where but one vote was involved; where the question was not discussed; where no authorities, not one, appear to have been examined; and where also, as to that single vote, there was hearsay upon hearsay offered as proof. But, upon the other hand, this New Jersey precedent was distinctly approved by the minority of the committee, in Farlee and Runk in 1846, and Munroe and Jackson in 1848; and in neither case questioned by the majority.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the second point which I proposed to discuss. Sixteen "mulattoes and persons of color" are proved to have voted at the election here controverted. The report of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] finds that fifteen of these persons (one being left unappropriated) voted for the returned member, and deducts them from his poll. The separate report of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] upon the ground of alleged want of evidence as to the others, deducts only one; while the other adverse report, by the member from North Carolina, silently refuses to deduct any of these sixteen. It ignores the whole question of colored voters, assigning no reason for the refusal to deduct them from the poll of the returned member. But the argument submitted in his behalf before the committee, and printed with and expressly made a part of that report, places it partly upon the ground that these persons of color were qualified electors of Ohio, and partly because of the alleged insufficiency and incompetency of the evidence. The proof as to one of these mulattoes is direct: as to four others it consists of their declarations or admissions; as to all, it is circumstantial, also. The evidence is summed up in the report which I have first referred to, and is there shown to be just such as is recognized by all the precedents and authorities, and has been repeatedly received and acted on by committees and the House. I shall not discuss it. If, after having duly considered all the several facts and circumstances thus summed up in that report, any member of the House can conscientiously say in his heart that he is not satisfied that these mulattoes and persons of color voted for the returned member, let him vote accordingly. One circumstance only I will allude to—a fact disclosed in the testimony. In the third ward of Dayton there was carried to the polls, and placed upon the table where the ballots were being received, an old man of ninety—an imbecile, slaving in idiocy, the wreck of a once intelligent and most respectable citizen, with eyes wandering in vacancy, without power of mind, without power of limb—almost without power of speech—with more than the weakness every way of earliest infancy, he is not able to recognize even the friends whom he has known for twenty years—he sees nothing, hears nothing, knows nothing; but he was one of the old liberty guard, an original Free-Soiler. And he is at last asked: Do not you want to vote against slavery? Do not you want to vote an anti-slavery ticket? A dim and shadowy recollection of the past stirs his brain, a glimmer of light breaks in upon the silent and deserted chambers of his mind. He answers "yes;" and a Republican ticket, with the name of the returned member upon it, is placed in his palsied hand, and the arm moved towards the judge of election, who receives and puts the ballot in the box, exclaiming just afterwards: "I ought not to have taken that vote." Such, sir, was the spirit of the canvass of 1856. And what was the slavery against which he was asked to vote? The enslavement of the African race, which we of the North, who profess the Democratic faith, are continually charged with seeking to extend. And yet, am I now to be told, and by those, too, in defense of whose just constitutional rights, the political highways of the North are this day strewn every furlong with the victims of fanaticism, that those of the African race who voted at that same election are not sufficiently proved to have voted for the candidate of the Republican party, whose professed mission is perpetual warfare against those "twin relics of barbarism, polygamy and slavery."

Were these mulattoes and persons of color, qualified electors of Ohio? That, sir, depends upon the constitution and laws of the State. I do not purpose now to discuss the question whether a State can confer the right of suffrage as to elections to this House, upon any but citizens of the United States. Fourteen years ago, a committee of elections unanimously decided, and were by a unanimous vote of this House sustained in it, that the naturalization laws of Virginia could not, or did not, confer that right. But it is enough to know that Ohio has chosen to make citizenship of the United States a qualification for her electors. The language of the constitution of 1851, is: "Every white male citizen of the United States." Two qualifications are here prescribed—color and citizenship of the United States. Were these mulattoes and persons of color "white," within the meaning of the constitution? That, sir, is a term which has an established signification in constitutional language. It needs no gloss; it has no synonym; it admits of no definition. It means white—pure white; and not any shade or any variety of shades between white and black. Such it is in philology and in the arts. White and black are the two between which there is a large variety of colors. No artist ever confounds these terms; no man in ordinary conversation confounds them. He may speak of a dark blue, or a light brown, or of a bright yellow; but never of a dark white, or a light black.

But the term "white," in constitutions, is a designation of race rather than color; and it is used in this country to distinguish primarily between the African race and all others—between a servile race and races which are free. Strictly, indeed, it may refer to the several varieties of the Caucasian race. But in constitutions, and in popular language in the United States, it is a word of exclusion against the whole negro race in every degree. Whoever has a distinct and visible admixture of the blood of that race, is not white; and it is an utter confusion of language to call him white. Sir, it is a question of vision, of autopsy, it is to be resolved upon actual view and by personal inspection rather than by pedigree. And the Almighty has marked the distinguishing characteristics of the race so strong, he has furrowed them so deep, that they are not eradicated in several generations. The constitution of North Carolina has fixed the degree at the sixteenth; and this corresponds, in fact, with the rule adopted generally by courts, North and South, that a distinct and visible admixture of negro blood, without reference to the exact proportions, degrades to the class of persons of color. I am aware, sir, that in Ohio a different rule was once declared: a mere predominance of white blood was held to make a man white. Sir, it would be easy to prove, as indeed in the unanswerable argument by the counsel for the contestant, it was proved before the committee, that this decision was never regarded as binding authority, even in Ohio: that it was absurd in terms and contrary to the whole course of legislation and adjudication in the United States and the several States; and above all, that no court of Ohio, or any other State, can bind this House by an interpretation of the term "white," a word of ancient and continual use in the constitutions, laws, and judicial decisions of nearly every State, and in the legislative and executive acts of the Federal Government, for a long series of years, down even down to the last month. But it is enough, and more than enough for my purpose, that since that decision a new constitution has been adopted in Ohio, prescribing citizenship of the United States, as a new and additional qualification for her electors, and that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that men of the African race are not citizens of the United States.

Sir, as a State-rights man, I do not affirm that that decision is absolutely conclusive upon this House, or upon Executives, outside of the ordinary judicial proceedings, or upon the country. I was taught to deny that the Supreme Court is the final and absolute interpreter of the Constitution. Nevertheless, that tribunal, and the judges who compose it, are entitled to the highest respect; and their decisions upon any subject are very persuasive evidence of what the Constitution means, and what the law of the land is in any court, and before every department of the Government. And in this particular case, so far, at least, as the question now before the House is involved, they have but affirmed the almost universal understanding of every one—lawyer, judge, statesman, and layman—from the beginning of the Government. In the constitutions and legislation of the States, and the judicial decisions and executive acts of the States; in the legislative and executive acts of the Federal Government, the African has, from the first, been treated and dealt with, every way, as an inferior, degraded, and outcast race. No man dreamed that he had any part or lot in the Government; and that, too, even where there were no words of direct exclusion.

Fifty years after this Government was organized, the supreme court of Pennsylvania resolved that persons of color were not qualified electors of that Commonwealth, although her constitution did not, in express terms, confine the right of suffrage to those who were white. And about the same time Connecticut, through her highest tribunal, anticipated the Dred Scott decision by a quarter of a century.

But I will not reargue the case. It stands today the law of the land; and, so far at least as the question now before the House is concerned, it enunciates the sentiment of a vast majority of the people of this country.

But it has been said that the judgment of the Supreme Court denying citizenship to Africans and their descendants is not applicable here, because those of that race who voted at the election were nearer white than black, and therefore not within the Dred Scott decision.

To this I might well answer that there is no proof, except as to one, of the shade of color or proportion of blood; that they are all described by every witness as "mulattoes and persons of color"—men "of mixed negro blood," with a "distinct and visible admixture of negro blood," and so admitted to be by the judges of election; and that, if there be any such distinction or exception, the testimony must show affirmatively that they are within it. But I take broader ground. I deny that any such absurd distinction is recognized, or even intimated, in the letter or the spirit of the decision. In the judgment of the court, and in the several opinions of the judges, McLean and Curtis included, the whole race is spoken of interchangeably throughout, and described as "negroes," "mulattoes," "persons of color," "Africans and their descendants"—men "of African descent," without once, anywhere, in any single line or syllable, so much as an allusion to any such distinction. The entire race is continually put in contrast with the white race named in the Articles of Confederation, in the naturalization laws, in the constitution and laws of nearly all the States of the Union. The court followed but the legislation, the jurisprudence, and the common understanding of the whole country. Sir, when Massachusetts—I mean antediluvian Massachusetts—Massachusetts in the egg—in 1705 enacted a law "for the better preventing of a spurious and mixed issue," providing, among other things, that if any "negro or mulatto should presume to smite or strike any person of the English or other Christian nations," such presuming African should be "severely whipped" at the discretion of the justice before whom convicted, did it ever occur to any of the Dogberrys of that age that the spurious and mixed quadroon and mustee, Ethiopian visibly all over, was yet not included in the act because nearer white than black? No, sir; that refinement in constitutional jurisprudence was reserved to their descendants a hundred years later in northern Ohio.

Again, the several naturalization laws of the United States provide only for the admission of white aliens to citizenship. I ask now, may your courts under those laws naturalize the quadroons mustees, the bright mulattoes of Hayti? Sir, some of you "Americans" think it quite enough to naturalize the Irish and German emigrants who land upon our shores; and are you prepared now to extend the rights of American citizenship, by a liberal interpretation of the word "white," to the "spurious and mixed" subjects of Faustin Solouque, and send them to fill up your Territories under new and improved emigrant aid societies in New England?

Again, the several acts of Congress abolishing the slave trade forbid the traffic in "negroes, mulattoes, and persons of color." Are the Representatives of New England willing that the mixed and spurious colored population, slave or free, of Brazil, shall be made the subject of the "traffic in human flesh," under the pretext that they are nearer white than black? Would a northern judge, or a southern judge, or any judge, discharge a prisoner indicted under these acts upon this miserable subterfuge? Again, is this same spurious and mongrel population to gain admission under this pretense, from any quarter, into these States of the Northwest, whose constitutions forbid residence to persons of color within their limits? Or do your Masonic lodges, in refusing membership to men of the African race in that ancient and accepted brotherhood, recognize a distinction or exception in favor of those of that race who are "more than half white?" Then why, I ask, shall it be set up or tolerated only at the BALLOT-BOX, that peculiar institution of the FREE WHITE MEN of this country? Sir, even Ohio has begun to retrace her policy; she has changed her constitution, and two years ago passed a law defining the term "persons of color" to mean those who, "in whole or in part," are of the African blood.

Finally, sir, if these sixteen mulattoes and persons of color are white male citizens of the United States, because they are nearer white than black, then they are eligible to membership of this House, and to sit upon this floor as your peers. Sir, the time may yet come when they shall meet you here at the threshold clad in "the shadowed livery of the burnished sun," but without so much as the modesty of "mislike me not for my com-

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, MAY 24, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 146.

plexion," without even the offer of the Prince of Morocco to "make incision for these seats, to prove whose blood is reddest;" but with rude boldness dash in, demanding their rights in this Hall. Are you prepared for that? Sir, you have already been threatened with Fred Douglas, whiter than the lightest of these sixteen; and in his person, in a little while longer, you may have to meet this question again.

But it has been said that the decision of the Supreme Court applies only to those persons of color whose ancestors were imported into this country and sold as slaves; and that it is not made to appear affirmatively in the testimony that these mulattoes and persons of color who voted were descended from such ancestry. Very true, sir; the plea in abatement upon which the issue was made up averred that Dred Scott was descended of African ancestors thus imported and sold; and the letter of the decision, of course, conforms to it. But, in absence of proof to the contrary, the court might well have assumed the fact as a part of the public history of the country, and of the world, which needed not to be proved. But be that as it may, this House, in a matter pertaining to its own peculiar jurisdiction, and in the exercise of its high powers as a part of this Government, has a right, and is bound to take notice of the great public facts in its history. Now, does not every man know, as a part of that history, that no African of the negro race ever came to America by voluntary emigration? So said the Supreme Court. I quote from the opinion by the Chief Justice, page 411:

"No one of that race had ever migrated to the United States voluntarily; all of them had been brought here as articles of merchandise.

"And even since the abolition of the slave trade, none have ever come of their own accord or as freemen."

England and France indeed, have both pretended to open up facilities for a free emigration from Africa. And with what result? At the bar of public opinion in each country—before the great forum of the world, they stand condemned as restorers of the slave trade in disguise. The miserable juggle has been exposed. On the 11th of December last Lord Clarendon said in debate on this subject, that "there could be no such thing as a free emigration from Africa, and that the plan had utterly and entirely failed." And the Earl of Derby, now Prime Minister, in the same debate denounced the scheme as identical in substance, if not in form, with the slave trade itself; and in this sentiment Earl Grey concurred. And later still, on the 16th of March last, Lord Brougham and the Earl of Malmesbury, both declared in debate that it was impossible to regard the scheme of a free emigration of negroes in any other light than as an indirect revival of the slave trade.

But, apart from all this, the reason of the rule applies equally to all of the African race, no matter when they may have come to our shores. No negro emigrant could be naturalized. It is not alone his descent from slaves in this country that degrades him in the scale of social and political being. It is his color and his blood. It is because he is the descendant of a servile and degraded race almost from the beginning of time. The curse of Ham pursues him in every age, and all over the globe. Bayard Taylor—no apologist for slavery—speaks but the testimony of history when he writes from Nubia, in Upper Egypt, that—

"The only negro features represented in Egyptian sculpture are those of slaves and captives taken in Ethiopian wars of the Pharaohs; and that the temples and pyramids throughout Nubia, as far as Dares and Abyssinia, all bear the hieroglyphy of monarchs; and that there is no evidence in all the valley of the Nile, that the negro race ever attained a higher degree of civilization than is at present exhibited in Congo and Ashantee."

Sir, no wise people will ever in any manner encourage the attempt to elevate such a race to social or political equality. And if the question of law were here doubtful, I might well demand that, upon these high motives of public policy, the doubt should be resolved against the race. Above all I would urge these great considerations now and in future, against this same spurious mongrel issue, in whose behalf a relaxation of this policy is demanded. Look to Spanish America. Look at Mexico. The blood of the conquerors was lost in the veins of inferior and outcast races, and Mexico has no people to-day. With no tyrant strong enough to bind her down, and no yeomanry fit for free government, she is the sport of faction, and the prey of anarchy and bloodshed; and today the spirit of the murdered Guatemozin, wandering three centuries through the halls of the Montezumas, gluts itself with revenge.

Sir, it is this same spurious and mongrel race who constitute your "free negroes," North and South. They will not be slaves, and they are not fit for freemen. And when this Government shall have been broken up, and the fanaticism of the age shall have culminated in the North in Red Republicanism and negro equality, and the South shall have driven out her free negroes upon you, and you shall have stolen away her slaves, then your troubles with this race, which already has plagued America for a century, will but have begun. They are your petty thieves now; they rob your larders and your sheep-cotes; they do fill up your penitentiaries, and they would fill up your hospitals and your almshouses, if you would let them. Then they will be your highwaymen; your banditti; they will make up your mobs. With just enough of intelligence, derived from a white ancestry, to know, and enough of brutishness, inherited from the old African stock, to avenge, in any form, the ignominy and degradation of four thousand years; with fetish ideas of religion and fanatic notions of politics, they are the sans culottes, who, led on by the worst of white men, will make your revolutions and overturn your governments. Such things have already occurred in history. They are not the baseless fabrics of a vision. No wonder the States of the Northwest have begun to erect constitutional barriers stronger than ever against a negro population. In all this there is eminent wisdom and a statesmanlike foresight.

But I have no time to pursue this subject further. I thank the House now for the courtesy and attention with which they have heard me throughout, and regret only that I have been obliged to appear, for the first time in this Hall, in the character of a contestant.

[APPENDIX.]

The following is a list of the English cases cited by Mr. Vallandigham, in support of the admissibility of the declarations or admissions of voters in evidence. Some are confined to cases of scrutiny, where all the authorities, without exception, concede that they are to be received; other cases go further still; a few of the cases limit the rule to admissions before or at the election; but this distinction is generally denied, and the weight of authority is strongly against it. Some of the cases treat the evidence as exceptional hearsay; but, in a large majority of them, its admissibility is put upon the ground that the voters are parties to the proceeding, and that therefore the evidence is original and not secondary; and, also, not hearsay at all. But whether put upon the one ground or the other, it has never been deemed necessary to first call the voters themselves as witnesses.

In the Seaford case, 1785, 3 Luder's, 112, and the Shaftsbury case, 1781, there cited, the declarations were rejected where the voters had taken the bribery-oath at the polls; but this distinction is against principle, and has not been recognized in any of the treatises upon the subject, and the direct contrary has been decided in every other case where the point has been made. (See Shaftsbury, 2 Dougl., page 308; Ilchester, 1803, 1 Peck., page 304; and Rogers, page 127.)

The following extracts, from the treatises cited, are added:

"Committees consider the voters as a party in the cause to all intents, while his own vote is under discussion; and, upon this principle, if he has possession of a writing which the party challenging desires to inspect, notice to produce must be served on him."—See Rogers on the Law and Practice of Election Committees, page 99.

"Notwithstanding some decisions to the contrary, it seems to be the better opinion that what a voter says of his own right to vote is an exception to this rule, (as to hearsay,) if being considered as an admission by a party in the cause; for though not a party to the record, yet, when his own vote is in issue, he is considered substantially interested."

"The modern cases have uniformly decided that the declarations of a voter against his own vote are to be received, considering them as the admissions of a party to the record; and, indeed, in a scrutiny, each case is to be considered as a separate cause, in which the party supporting the vote, and the voter whose vote is under discussion, are the parties on the one side, and the opposers of the vote on the other."—Ibid., pages 126, 128.

The foregoing is adopted almost verbatim in Montague and Neale on the Laws and Practice of Parliamentary Elections, page 188.

"The statements of voters, in cases of scrutiny, are not open to objection as being hearsay, as they are looked upon then as parties to the suit."—Clark on the Law and Practice of Election Committees, page 250.

"In point of fact, a scrutiny is, as it has been regarded almost uniformly by committees, as to each vote, a cause, in which the supporters of the vote and the voter are the 'parties' on the one side, and the opposers of the vote are the 'parties' on the other. On this principle it was that the voter's own testimony was held inadmissible in support of his vote, while it was, and is, evidence against it, as an admission against his interest."—Warren on Election Committees, 586, citing Taylor on Evid. sec. 536.

Two things are to be borne in mind in considering the English cases and authorities upon this subject: First, the admissibility of the declarations of voters is not confined to cases of bribery, but extends to every other disqualification; and in a majority of the thirty-six cases above cited, other disqualifications were alleged, concerning which the declarations were received. Second, the evidence is not properly hearsay at all—being the admission or confession of a party to the proceedings.]

Mr. WILSON. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is the wish of the chairman of the Committee of Elections that the debate in this contested-election case shall close to-day. I will not detain the House for any great length of time, but will simply state the reasons which induced me to cast my vote in committee, and will induce me to cast my vote in the House, in favor of retaining the sitting member in his seat. The contestant, who has just addressed the House, (Mr. Vallandigham,) stated at the outset of his remarks that he should not deal with the facts in the case. Mr. Speaker, I shall not imitate the gentleman. I intend to deal with the facts and the law, and govern myself accordingly.

The election in the third congressional district of Ohio was an exciting one—as much so, perhaps, as any election that ever occurred in the Union. The contestant had warm, zealous, active friends, and, no doubt, deserved them. So, also, had the sitting member. The election closed. The vote was announced, and Mr. Campbell was declared elected by a majority of nineteen. Shortly after the election was determined, Mr. Campbell, as a member of Congress, was required to leave home to attend to his duties here in this House. He came, and discharged the onerous and responsible duties of chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I believe even to the satisfaction of the party opposed to him, leaving his competitor, the contestant, unopposed for at least four months to go through the three counties composing the third congressional district for the purpose of producing a long chain of evidence that could affect the election. So the case stood until the assembling of the present Congress.

When Congress assembled, an application was presented by the sitting member, on account of reasons which were satisfactory, at least, to a minority of the committee, for additional time to take evidence in his case. That application was presented to the House. By a decided vote, it was refused. By that vote the Committee of Elections were instructed that they should determine the case as between the parties to the contest upon the evidence taken within sixty days, under the law of 1851. I thought at the time that that decision was wrong and oppressive. I think so still; but I do not intend to discuss that question now. It is sufficient for us to know that the House, by its vote, said to the Committee of Elections, "you must determine the facts as between these parties upon the evidence taken within sixty days, under the law of 1851." Shortly afterwards, at one of the first meetings of the committee, a resolution was introduced, carrying out the decision of the House in regard to testimony and additional time. The committee considered that they were restricted as to the evidence. The House had refused to allow the sitting member to return to Ohio, and take additional testimony. The committee, therefore, were to determine the case upon that already taken. At this meeting to which I have referred, the following resolution was unanimously adopted. If I am wrong, I can be corrected:

"Whereas the House has declined to give the parties leave to take further testimony—

Resolved, That the committee proceed to make up the result of the election on the testimony filed, regularly taken within the sixty days, except where the parties agreed that testimony otherwise taken may be read."

Here then, all agree, the Committee of Elections agree, all political parties agree, that the case should be decided upon the evidence taken within sixty days, under the law of 1851, and that all other evidence should be excluded from consideration. This course was followed by the committee in the adoption of the resolution just read. The contestant had his evidence before the committee. The sitting member had his evidence only partially before the committee, and we were to make out our decisions upon that evidence as presented, and none other.

But, sir, when the committee came to make up that decision, there was not a single particle of evidence; and there is not now, in all the evidence, one witness who testifies as to any majority of the sitting member. There is no evidence on the part of the contestant showing what the vote was on either side. There is no evidence as to the majority of the sitting member. It is said that Campbell's majority was nineteen. Where is the evidence of the fact? There was none before the committee; there is none before this House; and I have just as much right to assume that the majority was nineteen hundred as the contestant or his friends have to assume that it was nineteen. Here is the evidence of perhaps one hundred witnesses, and not one has testified as to the vote given either for Mr. Campbell or Mr. Vallandigham in the third congressional district of Ohio. Not one witness testifies as to what the majority of the sitting member was, or whether he had a majority of thousands.

Early in the month of December last, an abstract was brought into this House, and referred to the Committee of Elections, which purports to be an abstract of the votes returned in the third congressional district to the Secretary of State of Ohio. It has been offered in evidence in this case. But is it evidence, either under the law of 1851, or the resolution of the committee? When was it filed? Was it filed within the sixty days? Is it a part of the testimony of Mr. Vallandigham? Is it a part of the testimony of Mr. Campbell? By no means—of neither; for how can this be considered as evidence proper in the case, when it was received and filed, as is the fact, more than one hundred days after the time required by the vote of this House and the resolution of the Committee of Elections, under the law of 1851, and more than nine months after the election took place? I ask you, again, how that assumed abstract came here? Who brought it? By what right is it here to-day? By what authority was it filed with the Clerk of the House? What legal officer sent it here? None whatever. No legal officer ever presented any abstract to this House of that character, or filed any such with the Clerk. Who, then, ordered it to be sent to the Committee of Elections? Who has made that a paper which shall govern and determine this case? There is no legal mode by which such testimony, in such form, could have been brought before the Committee of Elections. I say the legal mode has not been adopted in this case.

Now, sir, twenty days after the assembling of Congress, and nine months after the election had been held, this manufacture for evidence was presented, upon which we are called to determine which party is entitled to sit in this House as the Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Ohio, notwithstanding the imperative rule, which was deliberately adopted, that all testimony produced after sixty days should be rejected. Now, if you are prepared to make this rule, as a procrustean bed to be extended or contracted, let it so be understood, and then it will be known that laws and resolutions here made may be enforced or disregarded, as shall best subserve party ends and party purposes.

But it is said that this is not the character of testimony which was intended to be excluded by the rule and the law of 1851; and that, therefore, the contestant had a right to produce it. Why is it not? It is an official act. It is an official paper. It is evidence, and must be produced precisely as any other evidence in this case. Am I right or wrong? There was a proper way by which to have got this assumed abstract before the Committee of Elections. Let us see how. Section eight, of the law of 1837, prescribes as follows:

"Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said magistrate shall have power to require the production of papers; and on the refusal or neglect of any person to produce and deliver up any paper or papers in his possession, pertaining to said election, or to produce and deliver up certified or sworn copies of the same, in case they may be official papers, he shall be liable to all the penalties prescribed in the fifth section of this act; and all papers thus produced, and all certified or sworn copies of official papers, shall be transmitted by said magistrate, with the testimony of witnesses, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives."

Here is the manner in which official papers can be produced. Their production can be compelled. The Secretary of State of Ohio could be compelled to produce them. What then? They must be transmitted—by whom? By the contestant? By any individual of the third congressional district of Ohio? No! but by the magistrate or other sworn officer, with the testimony of the witnesses to the Clerk of the House of Representatives. And when is that testimony to be forwarded? Immediately. Not nine months after the election. But this assumed abstract did not come here with the testimony of witnesses. It did not come here by the act of a magistrate. It came here as a vagrant. It comes here by itself. It is a waif, without owner or indorser; and still we are called upon to regard it as legitimate after nine months have elapsed, and to decide this case upon it, unauthorized and legally worthless as it is.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I deny wholly that this assumed abstract, even if it were authorized and came here legitimately, would be the best evidence of what was the vote cast in the third congressional district of Ohio. The best evidence would be the poll books. That would be the best evidence, and this other would be and could be regarded only as secondary evidence, viewed in the very best light. Therefore, I say at this point, here is a difficulty insurmountable by the contestant. So much, then, for that point.

I wish now to call the attention of the House to another point, and that is as to the notice and the grounds of the contest in this case. I wish to call the attention of the members of the opposite side of the House to the fact that, with the exception of two specifications, the whole notice of contest on the part of the contestant is vague, indefinite, and uncertain, and does not even require an answer on the part of the sitting member. In regard to that, I am not confined to my own statement. I will bring testimony which should be recognized at least on the other side of the House. I refer to the case of Archer and Allen, in the last Congress.

The contestant said in reference to that case that the minority did not seem to look at the authorities. That, at least, was not complimentary to the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] and the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] and those who were of that minority. Let us look at the notice. Here are nineteen specifications. I say that each and every one of them, except two, is vague, indefinite, and uncertain. I will read one or two of them:

"2. That, in counting out, sundry ballots were counted by the judges of election for you which should have been rejected."

"3. That sundry persons were permitted to vote for you in townships and wards of which they were not legal residents."

What persons? "Sundry" persons. Where do they live? Have they "a local habitation and a name?" Are they John Doe and Richard Roe? Who are these parties—these sundry persons? From what townships in the third congressional district of Ohio do they hail? Was it in Montgomery, Butler, or Preble, that they voted? You will see that the law of 1851 provides as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act, whenever any person shall intend to contest an election of any member of the House of Representatives of the United States, he shall, within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the officer or board of canvassers authorized by law to determine the same, give notice, in writing, to the member whose seat he designs to contest, of his intention to contest the same, and, in such notice, shall specify, particularly, the grounds upon which he relies in the contest."

Now, sir, permit me, for one moment, to read the statement made by the minority of the committee, in the case of Archer and Allen referred to, which is directly in point. Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, says:

"It is true that a notice that the sitting member's seat would be contested was served upon him within the time required by law; but it is equally true that the notice did not contain any of the specifications which the law requires. It is also true that the contestant, when he gave that notice, did not know how he was to contest it, or upon what particular grounds; or, if he did, he was guilty of disingenuousness in not specifying them, as the law, as every sense of fairness, required him to do. But, from the testimony, we are left without a doubt that when he gave the notice he did not know how, or upon what points, he was to make the contest. In his notice, therefore, he dealt only in generalities. He constructed a drag-net notice, by which he could include everything which chance or circumstances might reveal."

Here is another drag-net, identical with that in the case of Archer and Allen. I have here, also, what was said by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] and I would like to know from him, now and here, whether he will stand by his own report, made in that case of Archer and Allen, or not?

Mr. TRIPPE. The point the gentleman makes is, that the notice made no specification of fraudulent votes. I will ask him whether the ten days' notice of witnesses gave any such specification of fraudulent votes?

Mr. WILSON. It did not. Here are nineteen specifications, and, except two, all are of the same character. Mark another of them. It is as follows:

"That sundry persons, not legal residents or electors of Montgomery county, were permitted to vote for you in said county, while sundry others, legal residents and electors thereof, who offered to vote for me, were illegally rejected."

What are the names of those persons, and where did they live? In which one of these three counties did these alleged illegal electors live? Did they live within the State, even? How could the sitting member know who were to be brought forward and examined? Had he not a right to know the names of the persons whose votes were to be contested? Most certainly he had. Yet nowhere, except in the sixteenth and eleventh specifications, are there any names mentioned at all.

In Ohio, as in Indiana, I presume, there are about eleven townships in each county. The voter is required to vote in his county and in the township in which he resides. In what township in Montgomery county did those persons reside? This indefiniteness runs all through these seventeen of the nineteen specifications. I hold that the honorable gentlemen who made the report in the case of Archer vs. Allen, and gave their opinion then in regard to the particularity with which names should be set forth, should apply the same rule in this case. If that was good law, good reason, and justice then, it is not less so now. I ask that they shall govern their action by the same reasons now, and by the same kind of evidence in this case; and I feel satisfied that some of them will.

It is not necessary that I should read from that case further. I simply read from the report in that case, in order to show what should be set forth in the notice of the contestant. But this is not the only authority.

In the points of the sitting member submitted to the committee, further and particular reference is made to the case of Joseph B. Varnum, in the Fourth Congress. In that case the Committee of Elections—

"Prayed the instructions of the House as to the kind of specification that shall be demanded of the petitioners;" and the House, after full discussion, "resolved that the allegation [that five votes were received and certified by the presiding officers which were given by persons by law not qualified to vote at said meeting] is not sufficiently certain, and that the names of the persons objected to for want of sufficient qualifications ought to be set forth prior to the taking of the testimony."

So in these specifications the names ought to be set forth in each one; but in no specification of the contestant, except in the eleventh and sixteenth, are any names set forth at all.

But again I refer the House to the case of Easton vs. Scott, Contested Election Cases, page 272, where it was decided:

"That if voters were objected to on account of the want of legal qualifications the party excepting to them should, before taking, give notice to his adversary of the particular qualifications in which they are deficient, and that a general averment in the notice that the voters are illegal is not sufficient, and the names of persons excepted to must also be stated."

Apply these rulings to the present case, and the sitting member has nothing to fear, because they would sweep away every single specification except two; and I shall now direct the attention of the House to those two. First as to the eleventh:

"That, in the second ward of the city of Dayton, John B. Chapman, one of the councilmen of said city for said ward, declined to serve as a judge of said election, and of his own authority, and without any choice, visa voce or otherwise, by the electors present, appointed Stith M. Sullivan to act as judge of election in his place; objection to his (said Chapman's) right to appoint being at the time made by electors present."

The objection of the contestant is this: that the judge of the election in the second ward of the city of Dayton was improperly appointed; that he was not selected by the electors present; and that objection was made as to the manner of the appointment by the persons present at the polls. But is that the case? Not at all. On the contrary the evidence of Thomas H. Phillips and Stith M. Sullivan proves conclusively that Sullivan was the choice of all present for judge of the election; that no objection was made to the mode of his appointment; that the contestant himself was present, and acquiesced in the whole proceeding; that the election was fairly conducted; that no voter was prevented from voting; that all parties went to the polls and voted; and that all the requirements of the law were fulfilled. In proof of this I will read from the evidence of Phillips and Sullivan:

"Examination of Thomas H. Phillips.

"Question 27. Was there any one among the bystanders who objected to Sullivan as judge of the election on that day?"

"Answer. No objection made.

"Question 28. Was Clement L. Vallandigham there when Sullivan arrived, or at any other time during the morning before Sullivan arrived?"

"Answer. I think he was there all the time.

"Question 29. Did he seem to desire that Sullivan should serve as judge on that day?"

"Answer. He made no objection to me. I paused to see if any objection would be made, and then swore Sullivan in."

"Examination of S. M. Sullivan.

"Question 9. What occurred on the morning of the 14th day of October last, on your arrival at the polls in the second ward? State fully.

"Answer. When I arrived at the polls several voices cried out, 'Here he comes; swear him in, so that the polls may be opened!' There was not to exceed ten persons present, and I thought all desired me to act as judge.

"Question 10. Was any objection made to you by any of the bystanders?"

"Answer. None whatever.

"Question 12. Was the outcry, of which you speak, made by those who were waiting at the polls to vote; and if so, did they generally join in the outcry of, 'Here he comes; swear him in,' &c?"

"Answer. It was from the bystanders; and it was general from all present.

"Question 13. Were the duties of the judges and clerks of the election then and there discharged faithfully and impartially?"

"Answer. They were."

Now apply the rule of law to this evidence, and I think that no member of this House can for a moment doubt the legality of the election in the second ward of Dayton. First, I refer the House to the case of the People vs. Cook, 14th Barb. R., page 245:

"It becomes important, in this case, to determine whether the objections, which are taken to the inspectors of elections in the several cases presented in this bill of exceptions, are of that character which should be held to invalidate the canvass in these several localities. These objections are of a twofold character, extending to the regularity or legality of their appointments, and of their omission to qualify, by taking the proper oath of office. I will not stop to inquire whether these inspectors, in these several cases, were inspectors de jure or not. It is sufficient that they were inspectors de facto. They came into office by color of title, and that is sufficient to constitute them officers de facto. The rule is well settled, by a long series of adjudications, both in England and this country, that acts done by those who are officers de facto, are good and valid, as regards the public and third persons who have an interest in their acts, and the rule has been applied to acts judicial, as well as ministerial, in their character. This doctrine has been held and applied to almost every conceivable case. It cannot be profitable to enter into any extended discussion of the cases. The principle has become endless in which the rule has been applied."

And so here the law will not stop to inquire whether Sullivan was judge de jure. If he had color of title, and was judge de facto, it is sufficient. But again:

"In the case of the Mohawk and Hudson Railroad Company, (19 Wend., 143,) it was held that the statute requiring inspectors of corporate elections to take an oath is merely directory; and, as there is no nullifying clause on account of the omission, that the election is not invalidated by such omission to comply with the statute.

"The Legislature, in these enactments, undoubtedly intended to impose upon these officers having charge of conducting the election and canvassing the votes a faithful observance of these provisions, as well to secure the public interests as the rights of electors; but I cannot think they intended that an omission to comply in the particulars where they were departed from in this instance, whether the same occurred through the ignorance or inadvertence of the inspectors, should have the effect to deprive a whole district of their suffrage. This would be punishing the innocent for the sins of the guilty."

And again, in 7 Wend., 264, 1 John, 500, it was held as follows:

"The fact that a part of the time there were four inspectors at the poll, and that the returns were signed by four, cannot affect the election. This was undoubtedly an irregularity, but cannot invalidate the election.

"I cannot but think, however, that, to hold the omission of these officers, through negligence, mistake, or inadvertence to comply with all these directions of the statute, should have the effect to disfranchise the electors, would be unjust in the extreme, and indeed subversive of the fundamental principles of our Government."

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to produce additional authorities. Case after case might be cited of irregularity in the appointment of judges and inspectors, and the manner of conducting elections; but in no case has a mere irregularity ever disfranchised the electors or invalidated an election. This is the whole of the case as to the second ward of the city of Dayton; and I say, as the judge went into office under color of title, and as that election was fairly conducted, the returns deserve to be received and considered by this House.

I come now to the sixteenth specification:

"That Alfred J. Anderson, John M. Mitchell, James Robbins, Reuben Redman, Thomas Tester, John D. Robbins, Alexander Proctor, Cyrus H. Cowen, Robert Goings, W. Griffith, and twenty-two others, mulattoes and persons of color, not qualified electors of Ohio under the constitution and laws thereof, were permitted to vote for you."

These are the negro votes about which so much has been said, and so little proved. The specification charges that thirty-two "mulattoes and persons of color" were permitted to vote; but, if I understood the contestant clearly in his argument, he only claimed that sixteen negro votes were cast in the district, and for the sitting member. Is this so? No, sir. The evidence will not sustain the assertion of the contestant; he cannot produce any evidence that will warrant such conclusion. But, even if it were true, as the contestant stated, I ask by what right does he, of all others, seek to oust the sitting member from his seat by the testimony of a negro, who is not a citizen of the United States? For the contestant is compelled to take the testimony of Alfred J. Anderson, a negro, not a citizen of the United States, so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, as he alleges. He is required to take his testimony, to determine that any negro votes were cast for Lewis D. Campbell. Now, if negroes are so objectionable, I deny his right to have negro testimony to decide this case. He must go to white testimony; he must confine himself to white testimony, and not fall back on negro testimony. And yet here is evidence taken on the part of Mr. Vallandigham—the testimony of a negro; and he brings it to Congress for the purpose of ousting the member from the third congressional district of Ohio from his seat.

But, sir, I deny that there is even proved to have been more than one negro vote cast for Mr. Campbell. Nor am I alone in this declaration. The chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. HARRIS,] in his report, gives but one negro vote to Mr. Campbell, and that vote on the evidence of the negro himself.

Mr. ADRAIN. Is the negro, by the laws of Ohio, permitted to give evidence?

Mr. WILSON. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the laws of Ohio to answer the question.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I answer, that he is.

Mr. WILSON. By the same law he is allowed to vote in the State of Ohio. But, sir, the question is, shall his testimony be received here for the purpose of ousting the sitting member from his seat? Mark, you! he is not a citizen of the United States, so the contestant urges. If this be so, his testimony should not be received here, no matter how it might be in Ohio; and yet, if his testimony be set aside, there is no evidence whatever to show that there was one single negro vote cast for the sitting member. See the extremity to which the contestant is driven. With all of his seeming dislike of the negro race, he is still compelled to resort to that race for evidence to support his case. He flies to Anderson to sustain him, and here is the only color of title we find him able to produce; and that color, upon the basis of his own argument, vitiates the title. I bid him welcome to the evidence. Here it is:

"Question 133. State whether you voted for congressman at the election held October 14, 1856, at the election held in the second ward of Hamilton; and if so, for whom did you vote?"

"Answer. I did vote at that time and place, and for L. D. Campbell for Congress.

"Question 134. State whether you are acquainted with John M. Mitchell; and if so, state whether you know the place where he voted at that election, and for whom he voted for Congress?"

"Answer. I am acquainted with John M. Mitchell. He voted at the polls in the second ward of Hamilton, and I believe he voted for L. D. Campbell for Congress; I do not know that he told me that he so voted, but the matter was so understood between us.

"Question 135. State whether you know Reuben Redman; and if so, whether you know where and for whom he voted at that election?"

"Answer. I know Reuben Redman. He worked for me; and I believe he also voted for L. D. Campbell for Congress at the second ward polls, in the city of Hamilton. He told me before the election that he was going to vote for Campbell.

"Cross-examination:

"Question 133. State how long you have resided here, and who your parents are.

"Answer. I have resided here from 1839 to 1844, and from 1852 to the present time. My father was James Shannon, reputed to be a white man, and my mother was Mary T. Anderson, now wife of Robert G. H. Anderson, who, from her statement, I presume had one fourth part of African blood in her veins. Her father was a white man, and her mother was Indian and African. James Shannon is brother of Wilson Shannon, late Governor of Kansas. About the other persons, called colored, I know nothing save from appearances.

"Re-examination:

"Question 137. Is there any visible admixture of African blood in Reuben Redman?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; there is.

"Question 138. Is there any visible admixture of African blood in John M. Mitchell?"

"Answer. In my opinion there is none.

"Question 139. Does he associate with white or colored persons?"

"Answer. With both. He goes on the river, and in his business relations he passes as a white man, and in his domestic relations he associates with colored people.

"Question 140. Do you know, from conversations with him, as to the proportion of African blood in his veins?"

"Answer. He has always disclaimed having any."

"ALF. J. ANDERSON."

This evidence is plain, is explicit, is full, is to the point. Alfred Anderson, a colored man, living in the city of Hamilton, swears positively that he did vote for Lewis D. Campbell, for Congress; but are you to take this testimony from a man who you say is not a citizen of the United States, and on it expel the sitting member? You may examine this record of testimony from the first to the last page, and there is no other evidence showing that any other negro vote, or supposed negro vote, was cast for the sitting member.

But what of John M. Mitchell, referred to by Anderson? Is he a negro? Not by the evidence. If there be any proof at all, it is that he is a white man, for by his own statement he has no negro blood in his veins; and if a portion of his statement is taken in reference to his vote, we are bound also to take the whole statement. It cannot be divided. If the statement be taken that he said he was going to vote for Campbell, you are also bound to take the statement that there is not one particle of African blood in his veins. The whole testimony proves he is not a negro, but a white man.

So much as to the alleged negro voters in the city of Hamilton; and now I call your attention to the evidence in regard to the alleged negro votes in Oxford township, in Butler county. The contestant has stated that there were sixteen negro votes cast for Mr. Campbell. I have shown you that only one negro swears that he voted for him, and that he gives his opinion only as to others. But that proves no fact. Facts are what we want. Facts are what we must determine this case upon. We must determine it on evidence—on legal evidence—not loose, disjointed evidence, but such evidence as would determine any man's rights in a court of law. Now to the Oxford township.

William J. Mollyneaux seems to swear quite positively at the outset, but when you come to look at his whole testimony, it amounts to nothing. Let me read it:

"MARCH 7, 1857, seven o'clock, a. m.

"Question 167. State whether you were present at the congressional election held in Oxford township, Butler county, Ohio, on the 14th day of October last, and have examined the poll books of said election?

"Answer. I was present at that election, and have examined the said books.

"Question 168. State whether John D. Robbins, Alexander Proctor, Thomas Tester, Ephraim S. Jones, Evan Huffman, Arthur Huffman, Cyrus H. Gowen, Robert Goings, W. Griffith, William Lawrence, W. Huffman, and Alfred Huffman, voted at that election.

"Answer. There were three persons by the name of Huffman, mulattoes, who voted at that election, two of whom I saw vote. The other Huffman I know, from the poll books, voted at that election. John D. Robbins told me he voted. The other persons named in the interrogatory I know, by the poll books, voted also. Upon reflection, Robbins did not tell me in words that he voted, but gave me to understand so. I am satisfied that he voted.

"Question 169. State whether the persons named in interrogatory No. 168 are mulattoes and persons of color.

"Answer. They are.

"Question 170. By whom were these persons brought up to vote? What party insisted upon their voting, and what party opposed it?

"Answer. Those of them that I saw vote came up themselves. Those persons known as Democrats bitterly opposed their voting. The Opposition, the Republicans, favored their voting.

"Question 171. Did the friends of Lewis D. Campbell oppose or favor their voting?

"Answer. So far as I know, they favored it.

"Question 172. State, if you can, how many political friends Mr. Campbell had in that board of judges.

"Answer. I don't know. My impression is that two out of the three were.

"Cross examination:

"Question 173. What facts do you know that create the impression that two of the judges were for Campbell?

"Answer. Two of them were Whigs, and always had been as long as I have known them.

"Question 174. Did all those who had been Whigs support Mr. Campbell?

"Answer. No; I think not.

"Question 175. Were the votes of the mulattoes you have mentioned challenged; and, if so, by whom and on what ground?

"Answer. I did not see any of them challenged.

"Question 176. How do you know, then, that Democrats bitterly opposed their voting if they were not challenged?

"Answer. I heard a man say that he did challenge their votes, and, notwithstanding, they were admitted.

"Question 177. Do you know anything as to the opposition made to their voting, except what has been told you by others?

"Answer. I have opposed it myself, outside, in conversation, and heard others oppose it in conversation.

"Question 178. Do you know anything as to the challenging of the votes above mentioned, except what has been told you?

"Answer. I do not.

"Question 179. You say in your examination in chief, 'those of them that I saw vote came up themselves.' Now, if you saw them vote, can you not tell, from personal knowledge, whether they were challenged?

"Answer. Those that I saw came up by themselves, stuck their tickets in, and there was a delay about receiving them, but they were finally received; I suppose they were being challenged by persons inside, but did not see it personally.

W. J. MOLLYNEAUX."

Such is the evidence produced to prove that twelve negro votes were cast for the sitting member in Oxford township. Such is the evidence on which we are called to decide the rights of one hundred thousand people. It is mere hearsay; it is no evidence. He does not state, of his own knowledge, any fact, or what means he had of knowing. He simply retails the loose statements of bitter partisans.

Mollyneaux, it is true, states that the Democrats opposed their voting; but he does not state that their votes were challenged, nor is there any admissible evidence that they voted for Mr. Campbell; and I have as much right to assume that they voted for Mr. Vallandigham as others have to presume that they voted for Mr. Campbell; and that the opposition of the Democrats was simply a ruse to relieve Mr. Vallandigham from the odium of being voted for by negroes. I am speaking upon the evidence before us; and I ask gentlemen sitting as judges in this case, can you say, upon your oaths and upon your consciences, upon that evidence, that one negro vote was cast for Lewis D. Campbell in Oxford township?

There is no proof whatever of any such fact; and when you look this entire evidence over you find not one word to show that Democrats or others challenged these votes. And if those negroes ever voted, there is no proof to show whether they voted for the Democratic candidate or the Republican candidate—it is all left to mere surmise; and if you wish to decide this question upon that you can do so; but if you are to decide it upon legal evidence, it cannot be shown that twelve negro votes, or any negro votes, were cast at Oxford for the sitting member.

Mr. Speaker, it is unnecessary, perhaps, for me to go further into this case. I might go on to show what the contestant admits—that his case is made up almost exclusively of hearsay evidence. The testimony of at least fifty witnesses is to this point. Look at the deposition of Ensey, the deposition of Neas, the deposition of Black, the deposition of Deane, the deposition of Kelley, the deposition of Davidson—in fact, all the depositions. They are insufficient. They are not legal. They should be rejected. One testifies that a certain person voted for the sitting member. Why? Because he generally talked in favor of Republican principles. Is this the kind of evidence to decide a grave and important question? I think not. Another testifies that he considered a certain other voter as a Republican; that he voted; that Campbell was a Republican, and that therefore he voted for Campbell. This is all. No proof is offered as to how or for whom the person voted; and yet the contestant asks that such testimony shall be received to prove illegal votes against the sitting member.

Another witness testifies in regard to a voter, that the father of the voter was a Republican; that the family were Republican; that the son voted; and of course it followed that his vote was cast for the sitting member. Is this satisfactory evidence to the legal gentlemen on the other side of the House? Is it evidence at all? Most certainly not.

Again: another witness testifies that the voter told him that he had voted, and voted for the sitting member. But this is not admissible evidence. It is only the recollection of a conversation not made under oath. The witness may have understood the party correctly, or may have been mistaken. Nay, more; the admission itself may have been made, and falsely made, to affect this very contest. But, Mr. Speaker, why are we compelled to take this hearsay evidence? Why has the contestant rested his case upon the testimony of third persons? Why are not the voters themselves brought forward? The contestant offers no excuse for his want of diligence. He gives no reason why they could not be examined. He does not say that they had left the district or State. He does not show that they refused to appear, or, appearing, refused to testify. Sir, they never were even summoned. This is the truth. The contestant admits it; and I hold him to the full effect of the admission.

Mr. Speaker, all of this testimony should be excluded. By every principle of justice and every rule of law it should be disregarded. This House has repeatedly so decided, and in no case more explicitly and fully than in that of Archer and Allen. What was the course of the House in that case? What said the minority, of which the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] was one, in their views presented to the House? Here is their language:

"There is some testimony that certain persons said that they had heard another man say that he had voted for Mr. Allen, when he had no right to vote. But are we to disfranchise a congressional district of a hundred thousand inhabitants on hearsay testimony that would not be received in a magistrate's court when a shilling was in controversy?"

—App. to Cong. Globe, 1st sess. 34th Congress, vol. 33, p. 929.

And again, in the same report:

"Next, as to Alfred Cowdef, the only evidence is that he was heard to say that he had voted at the election; that he had voted for Allen; that his vote had elected him, &c.; and that he was not of age at the time. This evidence, the undersigned are clearly of opinion, is hearsay evidence of the worst sort. It is no evidence at all. It would not be received as evidence in any court, and it never should be received in cases of contested elections before this House; for, by the admissibility of such evidence, it would be the easiest matter in the world to set aside any close election, and defeat the will of the majority, by getting persons to say that they had voted illegally for the man whom, perhaps, they had used their greatest efforts to defeat. Falshoods, where there is no solemnity of an oath, are often resorted to in elections in canvassing before the people against a candidate before an election, as all of us, perhaps, well know; and who that would tell a lie before an election, would not do the same thing after it, if he could thereby effect the same object?"

I agree, Mr. Speaker, with these views. They are correct; they are legal, and they are fatal to the case of the contestant.

Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois,] who has presented his views to the House, has no doubt fully and thoroughly examined the testimony, and his views are entitled to much weight and respect; but I have not been able to see how he has arrived at the conclusions which he has expressed. Either the sitting member or the contestant is elected, and the one hundred thousand people of the district have the right to be represented in this House. The sitting member comes here with the certificate from the Governor of that State, that he has received a majority of the votes cast in his district.

The people of the third congressional district of Ohio have the right to that seat for their Representative, no matter by how small a majority he may have been elected. He has been sworn in, and I believe that a full examination of the testimony, commencing with the first witness and going through the whole list, will establish, incontestably the right of the sitting member to the seat. I believe that Lewis D. Campbell was legally elected to the Thirty-Fifth Congress from the third congressional district of Ohio. This House may think otherwise. It may decide otherwise. It may trample the rights of the sitting member under foot. It may overthrow law, justice, and legal evidence, to accomplish a party purpose. Nay, more. It may again, as once before, violate the great principle of popular sovereignty—the right of the people to govern themselves and elect their own Representatives. But I predict now, and here, that if such be the decision of this House, it will, when the ides of November shall come, meet with a stern rebuke from the people of Ohio; and although the sitting member may for a time be crushed by party dictation, he will be lifted up by a generous constituency and triumphantly sustained.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, here entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which Dr. Evans's geological survey of Oregon was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to state further, that it is alleged that three idiots voted for the sitting member. By the report made by the friend of the contestant, [Mr. LAMAR,] as a member of that committee, it appears that three persons of unsound minds, three idiots, voted for the contestant, and three idiots voted for Mr. Campbell. So that if there was anything wrong in that, it was a wrong equally committed on both sides. I regret that the contestant has seen proper to refer to that unfortunate class of individuals.

Mr. GILMER. I was about to say that I take it for granted that the sitting member has a prima facie right to continue in his seat until it is shown, by legal, admissible, competent testimony, that he is not entitled to it. I think that, in a very few words, I can satisfy every lawyer in this House that the contestant has not, by legal, competent, and admissible evidence, shown that the sitting member was not duly elected; and if I do that, the case ends there. But, before I proceed to discuss that legal point, I desire to call the attention of the House to this simple view of the case. Here is a heated and excited election in the third congressional district. The number of votes polled is somewhere near twenty thousand.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment? There are several gentlemen who are anxious to know what course is to be taken upon this question. As many gentlemen desire to leave the Hall, I will simply indicate to them the course I propose to pursue; which is, to call the previous question before the House adjourns to-day, and, if there is no objection, to have the vote taken on Tuesday, at one o'clock.

Many MEMBERS. Say Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that there is a special order for Tuesday.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. But, by general consent, the vote can be taken at that time. It will consume but a few minutes.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Take it on Monday.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It makes no difference with me. I desire to consult the wishes and convenience of the House.

Mr. SEWARD. I want it understood that I object to any arrangement.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will simply state, then, that I shall call the previous question, before the House adjourns, and let the question go over.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would intimate to the gentleman from Illinois, without, however, deciding the point, as he has not had an opportunity to look into it, if the previous question is seconded, and the main question ordered, the subject will come up on Monday morning. The Chair learns from the Clerk that such has been the practice. It may be, however, that the special order may preclude the question from coming up until Wednesday morning.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The Fort Snelling case is postponed until Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. But it is not a special order. Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I would ask, then, if it is agreeable to the House, to take the vote on Wednesday?

Mr. STANTON. Let us take it on Monday.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Is there a special order for Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I do not care when the vote is taken. I desire to accommodate the House.

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

Mr. MAYNARD. With the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GILMER] I wish to submit a motion to postpone this motion until the second Wednesday of December next. I do not propose to consume any time in stating the reasons for the motion.

Mr. GILMER. Do I lose my right to the floor by yielding to that motion?

The SPEAKER. If the motion is made the gentleman from North Carolina must confine his remarks to the question of postponement.

Mr. GILMER. I cannot yield, then. I was proceeding to call the attention of my friends to the fact that, when you look at the whole evidence in this case, and take into consideration the number of votes cast at the election, and also take into consideration the fact that the sitting member was confined by his duties in Congress, from and after a few days after the election until within eight or ten days before the time for taking the testimony closed, and that the contestant had an ex parte searching after illegal votes, the case will not appear very surprising. Eighteen or twenty thousand votes were polled in that election, and the contestant, after devoting his time since the commencement of this Congress to analyzing and sifting the testimony taken under such favorable circumstances to himself, cannot make himself out elected by more than twelve or fourteen votes, when the official returns were only nineteen against him.

Now, I ask gentlemen if he has made out a reasonable case for himself? I venture to say that there is not an election in any portion of the Union where, if an opportunity were given to canvass the votes, there would not be found five times as many illegal votes. I have taken that view of it to show that this cannot be a case going beyond that represented by the chairman of the committee

—a case of doubt. I have said that I desired to discuss this question in a legal point of view first. I have said that I take it for granted that every lawyer in this House is already satisfied that the contestant has to overcome the prima facie case with which the sitting member took his seat. Has he done it? The sitting member not having an opportunity to attend the taking of testimony within the sixty days allowed by the law, asked leave of the House for further time to take testimony. He proposed to the contestant, in the spring of 1857, to waive all irregularities and let the testimony be taken. The contestant declined to comply with that proposition, and the sitting member came to this House, at the earliest moment he could, and asked further time. The House, by refusing further time, declared, in substance, that the committee were to make up their entire report on the legal testimony taken, and at the next session of the committee the following resolution was passed:

"Whereas, the House has declined to grant the parties leave to take further testimony,
"Resolved, That the committee proceed to make up the result of the election on the testimony filed, regularly taken within sixty days, except where the parties have agreed that the testimony otherwise taken might be read."

The parties agreed on no other testimony. At that time there was no testimony taken and filed which showed what number of votes Vallandigham got, or what number of votes Campbell got. And if there be not legal testimony, admissible in this case, to show how many votes these several parties received, how, in the name of common sense, can this House decide that the contestant has made out a case to the satisfaction of this House, that Campbell was not elected?

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I believe the objection to my proposition to take a vote on this case on Wednesday at one o'clock is withdrawn. I beg leave to renew it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The contestant prefers Tuesday at one o'clock; it will take but a few minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Then I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Whatever business may be up at that time may be suspended. There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. GILMER. After the action of the House, and after the passage of that resolution, it was discovered that in this case there was a deficiency of testimony, and the contestant undertook to supply it by filing a statement or certificate from the Secretary of State of Ohio taken after the case had been referred to the committee. The argument on the other side is, that the act of Congress did not contemplate this official paper as a portion of the evidence necessary to be taken and filed within the sixty days. Now I desire the serious attention of gentlemen on this floor to this question. I think that any gentleman who examines it will find that it is entirely satisfactory that this certificate is one of the very official papers provided for expressly in the act of Congress to be taken and sent to the Clerk of the House within sixty days. I call the attention of gentlemen to the eighth section of the act, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said magistrate shall have power to require the production of papers; and on the refusal or neglect of any person to produce and deliver up any paper or papers, in his possession, pertaining to said election, or to produce and deliver up certified or sworn copies of the same, in case they may be official papers, he shall be liable to all the penalties prescribed in the fifth section of this act; and all papers thus produced, and all certified or sworn copies of official papers, shall be transmitted by said magistrate, with the testimony of witnesses, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives."

Now, sir, was that not such a paper as should be produced here in evidence by a certified or sworn copy? The very fact that a contestant could get it at any time shows that he could have got it within the sixty days. Suppose that the contestant, finding out that there was a mistake in the summing up by the clerks, by which his majority proved to be, not nineteen, but two hundred and nineteen, could he, after that resolution was passed by the House, have asked the House to act upon that discovery? I presume no man will say for a moment he could, because that is an official paper. That is a paper which could be proved by a sworn and certified copy. The act of Congress requires that all such should be taken and sent here within sixty days. Mr. Campbell could have taken this evidence within the sixty days. So could the contestant. Neither did it. And when the contestant found that he was bound up by that resolution, then this make-shift was resorted to, to make out a case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me place this in another point of view. I understand the point to be presented, that this certificate of the Secretary of State of the summing up of the vote in this election, is to be admitted as record evidence notwithstanding the provisions of the act of 1851, in respect to the time allowed for furnishing testimony, and the contestant would show thereby the number of votes returned for Mr. Campbell, and the number returned for himself.

Well, sir, what is that little slip of paper from the Secretary's office? It is a copy of the clerk's summing up. It is a copy of the original summing up in the clerk's office. But if it is to be admitted as record evidence, then the original is the poll-books themselves in the clerk's office, and they are record evidence of the fact that A, B, C, or D, voted; and you cannot prove by secondary evidence facts which may be proved by record evidence.

But, sir, the contestant is estopped from producing this evidence at all. He did not produce it in sixty days, which was absolutely necessary to make it conform to the law of 1851. But suppose I waive that point, and, for the sake of the argument, admit it as record evidence—the paper which he produces is only a copy of a copy. It is only a copy of a copy from the poll-books which are kept in the clerks' offices in the several counties which compose that congressional district; and if you want to prove who are the voters that cast their votes in that election you must either produce the original, or a certified or sworn copies of the original. While I help him out of a ditch, therefore, on one side, he falls into another on the other side—to wit: as to the necessary proof of the persons that actually voted. I ask every lawyer here to answer me whether such record evidence is good evidence? Whoever heard of a copy of a copy being better than the original?

Why, sir, this certificate in the office of the Secretary of State, is only intended for the inspection of the Governor, under a special provision of the statutes of Ohio, for a special purpose. It is there to enable him to determine to whom he shall give the certificate of election—for that purpose, and that alone. But that certificate itself would be a copy of the original. Now you do not take a copy of a copy as evidence, when either the original, or a copy of the original, can be produced; and such a copy could have been produced, for the poll-books are kept in the clerk's office in every county, open to the inspection of all who desire to see them. So that, I say that ends this case. It ends it in the mind of every fair-minded lawyer who will give it his attention for a moment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, according to what is held, not in foreign courts, but according to what is held in this country, by committees of election of this House, as necessary for the contestant to show, before he can oust the sitting member and secure the seat for himself, I shall proceed to show that Congress has heretofore held that the contestant must make out his case from such testimony as is known to be regular and legal—such as would be admissible in a court of law or equity. I will call attention to what the House has, through its committee, heretofore said upon this point in the case. Here it is:

"It may, however, be said that the case in 1 Denio, was at law, and that therefore the same does not apply. But in 14 Barb. R., 326, it is well said: 'The result of an election, when controverted in court, is like a judgment sued upon.' And in the report of the majority of the committee in the case of Archer vs. Allen, it is well and correctly said: 'The House in judging of the election returns of its members sits as a court. Their proceedings are judicial in their character, and why is it not as competent for Congress, by law, to regulate the proceedings in this court as any other? And if such regulations are made, why are they not as binding? This is an important point; and the undersigned insist upon the propriety of its observance by the House, not so much in consideration of any bearing it may have on the merits of this case, as on account of the consequences which will naturally follow the precedent which a disregard of it would establish.'—Archer and Allen's Case, Minority Report, page 13.

Again:

"For when a party controverts an election, he must make full proof of the fact that he, and not the party who has obtained the certificate, is elected."

"In the case of Easton vs. Scott, (Contested election Cases, 278.) it is well said by the Committee of Elections, that "in cases where the person returned comes rightfully by the certificate, then he ought to keep his seat till it is shown that he is not entitled to it." Being rightfully in possession of the certificate, the legal presumption is that he was duly elected. And "where the law raises a presumption in favor of the fact, the contrary must be fully proved."—1 Stark, Ex. 452, side fo., Met. & Ing. ed., 1832.

Now, does any gentleman here pretend that this is not the law of the case. And now let us see what description of testimony has heretofore been held to be legitimate and proper. I call the attention of the House to the case of Allen vs. Archer, which is a recent case, in which some of the authorities are cited, when—"The Hon. T. L. Harris, in speaking of hearsay testimony, in Archer vs. Allen, forcibly remarked: 'There is some testimony that certain persons said that they had heard another man say that he had voted for Mr. Allen, when he had no right to vote. But are we to disfranchise a congressional district of a hundred thousand inhabitants on hearsay testimony that would not be received in a magistrate's court when a shilling was in controversy?'"—Appendix to Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-Fourth Congress, volume 33, page 929.

"And the minority, too, of the committee, in their report of the case of Archer vs. Allen, (page 16,) well and admirably says:

"Next, as to Alfred Cowden, the only evidence is that he was heard to say that he had voted at the election; that he had voted for Allen; that his vote had elected him, &c.; and that he was not of age at the time. This evidence, the undersigned are clearly of opinion, is hearsay evidence of the worst sort. It is no evidence at all. It would not be received as evidence in any court, and it never should be received in cases of contested elections before this House, for by the admissibility of such evidence it would be the easiest matter in the world to set aside any close election, and defeat the will of the majority, by getting persons to say that they had voted illegally for the man whom perhaps they had used their greatest efforts to defeat. Falsehoods, where there is no solemnity of an oath, are often resorted to in elections in canvassing before the people against a candidate before an election, as all of us, perhaps, well know; and who that would tell a lie before an election would not do the same thing after it, if he could thereby effect the same object?"

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask gentlemen, before they come to vote upon this question, to give their attention to this testimony—each man for himself; and if any fair-minded gentleman, under the rules of admitting evidence in a court of law or equity, will come to the conclusion that the contestant has made out his case, to wit: that the sitting member ought to be ousted, he will come to a conclusion different from what I think he will. Our friends on the other side of the House, in making up the minority report in behalf of the contestant, have apologized for the conclusions to which they have come, by saying that this is a case of public concern, and that they do not think they should be held to the rules of evidence applicable in the courts of law; for if they had, honest gentlemen, as I know them to be, they would never have come to the conclusion which they have reported.

But I desire to call attention to what has been held in cases of this kind in this House heretofore.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. With the gentleman's permission, I will have a motion entered just here.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to any arrangement, unless the gentleman is regularly entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor and must yield unconditionally, in order that the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky may come in, objection being made.

Mr. GILMER. I yield to the gentleman unconditionally.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask to have entered the following proposition:

"That the papers, in the contested election case of Valandigham vs. Campbell, be, and the same are hereby recommended to the Committee of Elections, with instructions that both parties are permitted, by the House, to take further testimony under the regulations of law, on notice, until the first Monday of December, 1858."

Mr. GILMER took the floor and was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. SEWARD. Can the gentleman hold the floor when he has spoken on this subject once already?

The SPEAKER. He cannot if any other gentleman who has not spoken desires to obtain the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Cannot the gentleman from North Carolina speak on the motion to recommit just submitted?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is right, and the gentleman from North Carolina will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. GILMER. I will resume my remarks where I left them when the gentleman from Kentucky introduced his proposition. In the printed report, on page 69, I find that which I have already read.

It is only by virtue of such testimony as this, that our friends (as they naturally admit in their report) are able to come to the conclusion which they have reported.

But, Mr. Speaker, my friend the chairman of the committee, [Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois,] who has given this case, I am willing to concede, as faithful and I have no doubt as honest an investigation as any member of this committee, has pointedly stated his views of the case in his conclusion. I send the conclusion of his minority report to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It seems clearly proved that Anderson voted for Campbell; and one witness swears that Lawrence admitted that he had voted for Campbell. These are the only mulattoes that are in any manner proved to have voted for him. Anderson swears that he believes Redmond and Mitchell voted for him, but does not give the ground of his belief. Molyneux saw three or four go to the polls attended by friends of Campbell. As to the rest of these 'mulattoes or persons of color,' the candidate for whom they voted is left to the merest conjecture.

"Of the twenty-three votes above referred to claimed by contestant as being illegal, and having been cast for Campbell, the testimony seems quite strong and conclusive that Walk, Tate, Anderson, Odlin, Hartman, W. Lamb, Drayer, and Ogden, (eight votes,) did vote for Campbell, and that they were not legal votes.

"The proof is neither clear nor regular, but it strongly tends to prove that Norris, Smith, Davis, Foulan, Gulliland, and Hall, were not legal voters; while, in regard to Maxwell, Gosline, Lowe, Sharpe, Coble, Levi, Neas, Foster, Fisher, and Palmer, it is too slight to justify a rejection of their votes, or too doubtful as for whom they were cast to warrant upon it the unseating of a member, and the bestowal of his place upon another.

"While, from a view of the whole case, it is impossible to satisfy the mind that the contestant has, by strictly legal proofs, shown himself entitled to the seat, yet he has certainly brought the right of the sitting member to the severest question. It has been held that where 'a person holds a certificate of election, he ought to keep his seat till it is shown that he is not entitled to it.' But what shall be sufficient to show this? The mere fact that the returning officers on false votes have given to one the certificate, ought not justly to endow him with superior rights or privileges to him who questions such returns or votes. Would it not be more just that the parties stand on equal rights, and in the same position as though both had presented themselves at the same time, and under the same circumstances, and claimed the seat? Then, if we are unable to decide between their rights, we refer them back to their constituents. To give the sitting member superior advantages, is offering a premium for false returns and fraudulent votes. I prefer to consider them as standing on equal ground.

"In deciding questions of contested election, it is often difficult to reach a conclusion that shall be unobjectionable and command general assent. This is more difficult where elections are by secret ballot than where they are viva voce; for in the latter case the poll books show unerringly not only who voted, but for whom the votes were cast. When the voting is by ballot, after a given vote is proved to be illegal, the great difficulty still is to show for whom it was cast; so great is this difficulty that it is proposed to resort to statements of the character of hearsay (because not given under oath, and uttered by third persons) to show for whom votes were cast. This is dangerous evidence, but, from the necessity of the case, it is insisted that it should be received. If it should be done, it should be with the greatest caution.

"The legality of each vote forms a question by itself, and where seventy or eighty of these votes are in question, it is next to impossible to agree upon the legality of each, and yet the ruling upon one of them is to determine the case. The legality of each vote must be settled; each, perhaps, involves questions of law and fact mixed up in inextricable confusion, and to be settled by reference to rules of law and evidence, and by circumstantial or hearsay testimony, often given by heated and interested partisans. The whole testimony is not to be weighed as in a case of law, but each vote must be scrutinized and determined with mathematical certainty. As it is next to impossible to reach such conclusions, party zeal generally comes in to aid the hesitating judgment, and the Journals of this House will show that the views of members, as to the legality or direction of votes, and everything connected with elections, have too often been determined by the party medium through which they have been viewed.

"It is quite easy to seize upon vote after vote, and with dogmatic confidence accept or reject them as our impulses may incline; but it is a severe task to go through with an extended investigation and arrive at conclusions entirely satisfactory to the mind that justice has been done. A large number of votes may be in dispute, and upon the admissibility of each the best legal minds and most impartial judgment may differ. We may adopt principles of construction and rules of evidence, (without which we cannot proceed in our investigations a step,) but even then we may be balked with the constantly recurring inquiry: whether the matters presented come within our rules and are admissible or otherwise? And when we have concluded our examination, according to the principles and rules we have adopted, and are brought to a result, even then our minds are often impressed with a conviction that a true and just conclusion would be the reverse of that to which, by our own rules, we have been forced.

"In reviewing the important questions connected with this case, I have discarded all technicalities, and endeavored to reach, through testimony admissible under well-settled rules of evidence, a satisfactory decision; yet I have been unable to find sufficient to warrant me in pronouncing the contestant entitled to the seat of the contestee; at the same time there are such facts and circumstances, some of them mixed up, it is true, with opinions and hearsay testimony, as to amount almost to a conviction that he is so.

"The question, then, presents itself, will the House, in this state of doubt and uncertainty, arbitrarily decide in favor of one or the other of these parties, when it is as liable to decide wrong as right? or will it refer the case back to the people for their decision? When the verdict is questioned, poll the jury. This has very often been done in cases less doubtful than this. And fortunately it can be done here without serious public inconvenience. The present session of Congress is near its close. But a few days of service remain prior to the next regular election in Ohio, when this contest can be settled by the people without extra trouble or expense, and settled in accordance with their own wishes. Believing that such mode of decision is, under the circumstances, the only proper one, the undersigned thinks that the seat should be declared vacant, and the Governor of Ohio notified thereof.

"THOMAS L. HARRIS."

Mr. GILMER. I had that read in order to show the reasons and the conclusions to which the chairman of the committee had come. The conclusion is that this is one of those cases which ought to go back to the people, for the reason that he was not able to determine, from the testimony, which gentleman was elected—in other words, because he was not satisfied, from the testimony, that the contestant was elected. Then I submit that, in law, upon the finding of the chairman, the judgment should be in favor of the sitting member. Bear in mind that a majority of the committee, in their reasonings upon this subject, hold and go together as to that point; although four of the committee go one step further than the chairman, and have satisfied their minds that the sitting member is entitled to his seat. The chairman of the committee, deciding in his judgment between them, has done so honestly and candidly, whether correctly or not, and has come to the conclusion that the contestant should not deprive the sitting member of his seat.

I advert again to the point I made before, and I call the attention of the House to the fact that the contestant himself, who has labored and argued this case, and has sought out every authority, from the beginning of the Government down to the present time, thinks himself that his case is to be decided upon hearsay evidence, and the point, whether his Secretary's certificate, obtained after the testimony was closed, can be read; otherwise he would not have spent so much labor and time on his flimsy hearsays, and on the admissibility of his said certificate. In the report, in reply to the point as to the admissibility of the certificate, he says:

"I answer, first, that it is at least doubtful whether it is my place to produce at all the summing up at the Secretary's office, of the result. It is no part of my care. I claim nothing under it. Upon its face it shows nineteen majority against me; and by so much it would diminish my vote, as it appears by the testimony."

Not necessary for him to show the actual result of the vote! Suppose he should show that Campbell had received one hundred illegal votes: unless he could show by legal testimony that those one hundred votes would alter the result, he would gain nothing by it.

I desire each gentleman to take all these facts and sum them up for himself, and apply the evidence under the rules of evidence to the various contested votes; and if he can come to a result that will give the contestant the seat, then I have examined this case in vain.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish to suggest a point for the gentleman's consideration, as he has alluded to my opinions in this case. The gentleman says that the sitting member has a superior right to any contestant, and that it is necessary that the contestant should show that he has a superior right before he can be allowed to stand upon an equal footing. The opinions which have been advanced heretofore in favor of the sitting member, that a superior right in the contestant must be shown before the sitting member is ousted, is predicated upon the idea that the sitting member is entitled to his seat. I admit that, before you can oust him and give his seat to another, that other person must show a superior right. But while others propose to put the contestant in a position of superior right, I choose to consider them as standing upon an equality. In all the cases cited, to which my attention has been called, where the doctrine has been laid down that possession of the seat may be retained by him who holds it, until superior right is shown in another, they are all of them predicated on the idea that the seat is to be given to the claimant. If I proposed to give the seat to the claimant, I should undoubtedly be compelled to concede that the claimant must show superior right before he could get it. But I do not so propose; and therefore the hypothesis on which the gentleman predicates his argument is false.

Mr. GILMER. The argument I make is, that the sitting member has a prima facie right, and that his certificate under which he took the oath, and his seat, retains him in his seat, until it is shown by legal, competent, satisfactory testimony, that there was such irregularity, illegality, fraud, or mistake, as would satisfy the House that the contestant would be elected if there had been fair play; and unless he makes his case that strong, he is not reasonably entitled to oust the sitting member.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to go into the discussion of this contested election at length; but I desire, on behalf of the State of Ohio, and as one of her Representatives, to enter my caveat against what seems to have been recognized as a proper construction of her constitution, and the rights of voters under it. It seems to have been granted on all hands, that, under the authority of the Dred Scott decision, no person having any African blood in his veins is a voter under the constitution of Ohio. Now, sir, I do not admit any such construction of our constitution. I do not propose any discussion of the Dred Scott decision. Everybody knows that I do not subscribe to it. But I say, that consistently with that decision, persons having more than one half white blood, and less than one half African blood, are legal voters under the constitution and laws of Ohio.

Now, sir, for the purpose of the argument, I am willing to concede that any person having any African blood in his veins is held by the Supreme Court of the United States not to be a citizen of the United States so far as to entitle him to sue in the courts of the United States or to entitle him to any of the rights of citizenship under the laws of the United States, because, under those laws, the Federal authorities are supreme and sovereign. But, sir, I do hold that the courts and constituted authorities of the State of Ohio have a right, in the last resort, to put a construction on their own constitution, and on their own laws; and whatever is held by the Ohio courts to be a sound construction of an Ohio law, or an Ohio constitution, is its true construction everywhere, and wherever it may be called in question; and the United States Supreme Court is bound to follow it.

Mr. HILL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether, under the constitution of Ohio, unnaturalized foreigners are permitted to vote?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly not. The constitution of the State of Ohio, adopted in 1802, contained this provision in regard to the rights of suffrage. Section one, article four, has this provision:

"In all elections, all white male inhabitants shall be admitted to vote."

Under that constitution the question arose as to what was a white male inhabitant within the meaning of the constitution?

In the 11th Ohio Reports, is a case to which I would refer specially. An action was brought against the trustees of a township, who are the judges of election, for refusing a party, who had more than one half white blood, but who had some African blood in his veins, the right to vote. And that brought the question directly to the court as to what was a white person within the meaning of the constitution of Ohio. The court held that mulattoes were persons who were half white and half black; that negroes were persons more than half black; and that all who were more than half white were white persons within the meaning of the constitution. The constitution of 1851, in describing the qualifications of voters, provides that all free white male citizens of the United States shall be entitled to vote.

Now, I hold that for the purpose of determining what is a white citizen, the decisions of the courts of Ohio are final and conclusive. Its authorities are sovereign on that question; and I hold that as to what is a white inhabitant or white citizen, there is no difference between the construction of the constitution of 1802 and that of 1851. It is all a construction of the term "white." That decision has been repeated over and over again, so long as to become the settled and unquestioned law of the State on the construction of that term.

Now, sir, if I am not right in this—if the court of Ohio cannot determine the question as to what is the true construction of her constitution, her Legislature cannot. Suppose the Legislature of Ohio should pass a law providing that all persons having more white than black blood in their veins should be regarded as white citizens within the meaning of the constitution, and be entitled to vote: could it be said that, for the purpose of controlling the right of suffrage within the State, the Federal authorities have a right to put a different construction on it? I hold not. Bear in mind, sir, that I am not calling in question, in this argument, the Dred Scott decision, or making any question about the Constitution or laws of the United States, or the courts of the United States deciding whether any person having black blood cannot be a citizen. But I am holding that, the courts of Ohio having settled that question, having put a construction on the term "white," as used in her constitution, it is not competent for this House or for Congress to put a different construction upon it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman as saying that the supreme court of Ohio have ever decided that the term "free white male citizens" means the same thing as "white inhabitants?"

Mr. STANTON. No, sir.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. These are the two terms used in the two constitutions.

Mr. STANTON. That is true enough. Since the adoption of the constitution of 1851, the question has not arisen in the courts of Ohio; but the argument I am making is, that the construction of the term "white," in the second constitution, must of necessity be the same as in the first.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman state that the term "inhabitant" means the same as "citizen of the United States?" because it is necessary for him to beg that question before his argument prevails.

Mr. STANTON. Not at all, sir. The question is as to what is a white citizen of the United States. I know that the Supreme Court of the United States holds that there cannot be any such thing as a citizen of the United States that has African blood in his veins; but my point is, that for the purpose of conferring the right of suffrage and other rights of citizenship, the State authorities, the State Legislature, and the State courts, have a right to determine what is a white male citizen. Certainly they have said what is a white man. I would like to know how the term "white" can be construed in one constitution differently from the same term in another constitution?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I wish to ask my friend from Ohio one question. The qualifications of voters for members of this House are declared by the Constitution to be the same as those of electors for the lowest branch of the State Legislature. Now I desire to ask whether, by the construction which is given to the law or Constitution in Ohio, persons of half white and half negro blood are allowed to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the Legislature?

Mr. STANTON. All persons having more white than negro blood are, by the construction which is given in Ohio, considered as white persons, and are allowed to vote at all elections.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire whether the courts of Ohio have ever decided, under the constitution of that State, which was adopted in 1851, that the term "white" is applicable to a person having more white than black blood, though he may have African blood in his veins?

Mr. STANTON. I have already stated, that so far as I know, there have been no decisions of the courts under the constitution of 1851; but the provision of that constitution is susceptible only of the same construction as that of the old one, and the practice under it has been in conformity to that construction.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to submit a very few words in regard to this contested-election case. It is no part of my purpose here at this time to enter into any discussion touching negro suffrage or the qualifications of electors in the State of Ohio. But, sir, I desire to present a single question of fact here, for the consideration of the House; and that is that there is no legal proof that the contestant was elected, or even tending to show that he was elected. If, by the testimony adduced by the contestant, or by that adduced by the sitting member, it had been made apparent that the contestant was in fact elected by a majority of the legal voters of the third congressional district of Ohio, he should have my vote for a seat in this House. I am willing, if gentlemen can show that question to be decided by the proof in favor of the contestant, to record my vote in his favor, and against the sitting member. But that has not been shown, nor can it be shown upon any testimony before the House.

Sir, I think the contestant manifested great wisdom when, in his labored speech at the opening of this discussion, he stated to the House that he would not dwell upon the facts of the case. In the absence of proven facts, it throws no light upon the question now before us for the contestant to tell the House what have been the rulings of the British Parliament in cases of contested elections upon the admission of heresy testimony. However successful the gentleman may have been in his researches upon this head, his array of ancient British precedents and modern instances throws no light upon the question who received the largest number of legal votes in the third congressional district of Ohio. Instead of citing here at great length nice decisions which have been made upon questions of evidence in contested cases, the gentleman would have greatly obliged some of us if he had laid his finger upon the facts, the legally proven facts, upon which he based his assumed conclusions that he received a majority of the votes given by qualified electors of the third congressional district of Ohio. I should have been especially obliged to him if he had pointed distinctly and plainly to the facts proving that my colleague [Mr. Campbell] received nineteen votes less than were counted and certified to him in the official returns. That is the question in the case, and that is the question upon which, unhappily, the gentleman failed to give us any light. I challenge him, or any of his friends, to point out any testimony that would be admitted in a justices' court in a case involving the worth of a jack-knife, much less in a case like this, showing, or tending to show, that my colleague received a single illegal vote which was counted for him in the official returns. I defy the gentleman to do it. The proof is not there.

I have looked into this case with some degree of care. I do not intend to delay the House with many remarks upon the subject; but I do ask the attention of the House to the character of proofs upon which it is sought, by the votes of this House, to oust the sitting member, and to elect a man to a seat here from the third congressional district of Ohio, contrary to the expressed will of a majority of the legal voters of that district.

I shall not raise any question as to the validity or sufficiency of the notice, though I think that therein a grave question is involved. I waive all that, and call the attention of the House to the facts, as they appear, in proof. What are the facts, as they appear from the poll-books, the abstract of which is duly certified? That my colleague, the sitting member, received nine thousand three hundred and thirty-eight votes, and that the contestant at that election received nine thousand three hundred and nineteen votes. This official and legal evidence, this abstract of the returns made by the county officers of the several counties in the third congressional district of Ohio, proves that the sitting member [Mr. Campbell] received a majority of nineteen of the legal votes cast at that election.

How is this proven fact to be got rid of? My colleague is here with the certificate of the Governor of the State, issued in pursuance of law, certifying that fact to the House, and upon that he is sworn in, and takes his seat. How is that certificate, under the great seal of the State, to be got rid of? Why, by raising a mist, in the first place, about votes having been given for my colleague by legal voters, non-residents of the ward in which they voted. The fact that these persons voted at all is attempted to be proved, not by the best evidence which the nature of the case admits of, (which is the only legal evidence,) but it is attempted to be proved, as everything else in the case is attempted by the contestant to be proved, by illegal testimony, and that which cannot be held admissible for any purpose, except it might be to corroborate other and better testimony—testimony, sir, which would not be admitted in any court of justice whatever; the mere declarations of men that other men had declared that third persons had said that they voted in a given ward, and that they voted for Campbell. It is in vain that the learned Counsel for the contestant, a brief of whose argument was filed, and is published with the testimony in this case, attempts to show that the poll-books of this election were not records, and that it was therefore not necessary to produce them before the committee, as the best proof of the fact that certain persons voted at that election in certain wards. I put it to every member of this House, whether the poll-books are not record evidence, and (if the poll-books be not technically records) whether they are not written evidence of the fact which it is attempted to be proved, and whether they are not the best evidence of the fact of voting? They show, and they are the only legal evidence to show that A, B, or C, voted at that election, being written evidence, made and sworn to by the officers of the law, and pursuant to the requirements of the same. They are best evidence of the fact that any person voted; and, being accessible, they are the primary legal evidence of that fact, and, in the absence of that proof, secondary evidence cannot be received, and ought not to be.

I submit that the learned gentleman in his labored argument this morning, entirely failed to prove that the best evidence which the case admits of can be dispensed with. That is the point I make. I say it, and I say it without the least fear of contradiction, that the poll-books certified to by the officers of election, in which are written the name of every voter who cast his vote at that election, are the best evidence which the nature of the case admits of, and were accessible to the contestant. Surely this written evidence would be more satisfactory than the declarations of any man or set of men can be, who stood by the polls and saw, or thought they saw, one or five hundred men cast their votes. There was no difficulty in procuring this written proof in order to lay the foundation for the other proofs as to the qualifications of the electors. That written proof is not furnished. For what purpose is it omitted? What excuse can be given for not making it? Does not every man know that the testimony of the legal custodians of these poll-books could have been taken, that they could have been compelled to testify and set out every name that is therein recorded or written? Every man understands that. They could have been compelled to set out as a part of their depositions full copies of the poll-books, and thereby show the name of every single elector returned by the officers of that election as having voted at any poll within that district. Every man knows that, but it has not been done. Again, I ask, why was it not done? The burden of proof is upon the contestant; and it was his duty to furnish the best evidence—the written evidence. Hearsay testimony is introduced, instead of the written proof, for the purpose of showing that sundry minors voted at that election. What is the effect of that hearsay testimony, after we have got it? The House might as well not have been detained or troubled with it at all. What is the result of it? Simply that three minors voted for Mr. Campbell, and four (4) for the contestant! The strongest view that can be taken of this case for the contestant is the view expressed by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] The gentleman from Mississippi, and three of his associates upon the committee, have come to the conclusion that the contestant has the better claim to the seat, upon the hearsay testimony in the case. They state, in their published views of the case, that they find in this proof that of minors three voted for Mr. Campbell, and four for Mr. Vallandigham. That does not reduce Mr. Campbell's majority, but increases it one vote! Why, then, did the contestant trouble the House with proof on that point? If you take three from the nineteen majority reported for Mr. Campbell, and four from the vote for Mr. Vallandigham, it will increase the majority of Mr. Campbell to twenty; so that, instead of making out a case against the record and certificate of election, it makes a case in favor of the record and certificate! So much for that point.

The next point made by the contestant, and to support which, he produces his hearsay proof, is that persons of unsound mind, who are disqualified by law, voted at that election. His hearsay proof results in this: that three persons of unsound mind voted on each side. The result is not changed; notwithstanding that proof, my colleague's majority is still twenty. So much for that proof! The next point raised, (and I cannot see what earthly object he had in view in getting up proofs of this kind, unless it was to mislead somebody), is that aliens, who were disqualified by the laws of Ohio, voted at that election. In my judgment, and I will state it here, in passing, no State has the right to confer the elective franchise for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, much less for Representatives in Congress, upon ALIENS, for the reason that the exercise of any such authority by the State, or by any State Legislature is in direct conflict with the laws of the United States regulating the naturalization of aliens and their admission to citizenship, anywhere within the United States. Under, and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, the elective franchise is the guaranteed and exclusive right of the citizen; and a State Constitution, or State law, which confers that franchise upon ALIENS, is in conflict with that provision of the constitution of the United States which says that, this "Constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme LAW of the land, the constitution and laws of ANY State to the contrary notwithstanding." A compliance with the naturalization laws of the United States, is, in my judgment, indispensable to the legal enfranchisement of aliens in any State of the Union!

I hold, therefore, that the aliens who voted at this election were disqualified, irrespective of any State law (if any had existed) on the subject. But what does the contestant make by his proof that aliens voted? By his hearsay proof it turns out that three aliens voted for Campbell, and three for Vallandigham. After passing through with the proofs about minors, after passing through with the proofs about aliens, after passing through with the proofs of persons of unsound mind, we are just where we started, except, if anything is to be done, that one vote is to be counted additional in favor of the sitting member.

Mr. HILL. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. It seems to me, from what I can learn, that there is a discrimination made between the old constitution of Ohio and the new one which was adopted in 1851, on the subject of suffrage. Is the gentleman able to inform me from his own knowledge, whether any class of colored persons who exercised the right of suffrage before 1851, have been excluded by reason of the adoption of the new constitution?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will answer the gentleman, that I have no personal information on the subject; but, I understand that the practice has been precisely under the constitution of 1851 what it was under the constitution of 1802; that is, that native persons resident in the State, of more than half white blood, are allowed to vote.

After disposing of the case, as it appears, touching the votes given by minors, by persons of unsound mind, and by aliens, I come to another point raised by the contestant, and that is as to the votes of non-residents of the ward in which they are alleged to have voted. The report on that subject of the gentleman from Mississippi and his three associates—and I think that they report correctly—states that two non-residents of the ward voted for Vallandigham, and none for the sitting member. If you come, then, to strike a balance between these gentlemen, the contestant and my colleague, under these four heads, instead of my colleague [Mr. Campbell] having a majority of nineteen over the contestant, [Mr. Vallandigham,] he has, in fact, a majority of twenty-two.

Now, sir, there are three other points made by the contestant, and on which he has adduced his hearsay proof. One is in regard to non-residents of the county who voted at that election; one is in regard to non-residents of the State who voted at that election; and another is in regard to mulattoes or negroes who voted at that election. Those are the three and only remaining points. For the purposes of my argument, I might consent here that the six non-residents of the county who are reported on this hearsay proof to have voted at that election, did vote as claimed. Did they all vote for the sitting member? Waiving my objection to this secondary proof, in the absence of the poll-books, which furnish the best evidence of the fact whether these six men voted at all; admitting, in the absence of the legal proof, that they did vote as claimed, and that they voted for my colleague, [Mr. Campbell,] how does the record stand? It stands, even with that admission, upon the proof of the contestant, at six less than twenty-two majority, leaving sixteen majority for the sitting member, [Mr. Campbell.]

What next? Allowing, in the absence of the legal proof to be furnished by the poll-books, that negroes and mulattoes to the number of fifteen, as claimed, did, in fact, vote at that election, and allowing still further, in the absence of proof, that they did vote for Campbell, it still leaves Campbell a majority of one over the contestant, and that too upon the showing of the four gentlemen of the committee, who report here most favorably for the contestant, [Mr. Vallandigham.]

What point, then, remains of the case? Only the point that, votes of non-residents of the State were given at that election. I will dispose of that point briefly. I dispose of it in this way. The gentlemen who reported favorably for the contestant [Mr. Vallandigham] found it very convenient in their printed argument or report to refer to the testimony of persons relied on to prove the fact that fifteen negroes did vote at that election for Mr. Campbell, while they found it very inconvenient to refer to the testimony of a single man who shows the fact that a non-resident of the State, of any name whatever, voted at that election, much less that any such non-resident voted for the sitting member, [Mr. Campbell.] I undertake to say upon that point—because the whole case is now narrowed down to that—that no man who looks candidly at this record can come to the conclusion that the fact is proved. Having, by conceding facts to be proved, which are not proved, reached the point of the votes of non-residents of the State, and upon which the whole case turns, after conceding all that has been assumed by and for the contestant, I plant myself upon the principle of common law and common sense, and which, in spite of the parliamentary cases cited by the contestant from the English cases, prevails in all bodies which sit in judgment upon anybody's or any community's rights—that the best evidence which the nature of the case admits of must be adduced.

I say, then, in relation to the fact, whether thirty-one non-residents of the State of Ohio, or any greater or less number of such non-residents, voted at that election, the best evidence that any one or more of such persons so voted is the written evidence of a fact which the law of the State authorized and required to be made out at the time of the transaction, under oath, by the judges and clerks of the election, and which was deposited in pursuance of that law, at the offices of the clerk of the common pleas of the respective counties of the district, and which is there preserved. I submit it to the common sense and candor of every gentleman upon all sides of the House, whether that written evidence is not more reliable than the slippery, treacherous memory of a thousand witnesses who stood, mingling with the throng, at the election, and partaking of the excitement of that day, and who have nothing but their memory to rely upon, to prove the fact that those persons did, in fact, vote at all?

That evidence is not produced in this case; and I say the fact that thirty non-residents did vote at that election is not proved, though there is hearsay evidence to that effect, while the best evidence is withheld. It rested on the contestant to make out his case by the best evidence, and until he does so, the House should not set aside the authority of the great seal of Ohio, by which my colleague holds his seat. The contestant has given no excuse for failing to produce it—the written proofs, the best evidence. He has introduced by way of apology for this neglect, through his counsel, a futile evasion, by having them say in his behalf, that the poll-books are not records. They are written evidence, open to inspection, and, as I remarked before, everybody knows that the custodians of that written evidence were liable, by compulsory process, to be compelled to produce it, and, in their depositions, to set out the names of every voter therein recorded. Such proof has been made in numerous instances before, may be made again, and ought to have been made by the contestant in this case.

Well, suppose you concede the fact that these thirty-one persons did vote at that election, and further, that these thirty-one persons were non-residents of the State of Ohio at the time, the other great fact, important to this case, is not true, and that is that they voted for Campbell. I would like to see the testimony showing that any six of them voted for Campbell, much less that twenty-one voted for him, as claimed: by the contestant. I should like gentlemen to point out that evidence, and until they do, I for one, irrespective of all party considerations, will refuse to reverse the record as it stands here before us. I insist that common respect shall be shown here to the attested voice of the people of the third congressional district of Ohio, as well as to the accredited voice of the people of any other congressional district in the Union. The attempt is made here to set aside the will of the people of that district by the mere hearsay of irresponsible and unknown witnesses. I submit that it is an outrage attempted to be perpetrated here against that people, and an outrage which I trust they will have the courage and the dignity and the self-respect to rebuke, as it deserves to be rebuked, on the second Tuesday of October next.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not rise, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the merits of this controversy; and I will not trespass upon the already exhausted patience of this House by an analysis of the mass of testimony contained in this record. My purpose is a brief answer to one or two positions maintained by my two colleagues on the Committee of Elections, [Messrs. WILSON and GILMER,] who have just addressed the House in support of the right of the sitting member to retain his seat upon this floor. Both these gentlemen seem to rest their arguments upon technical objections, rather than upon a full and frank consideration of the merits of this contest. Their objections partake rather of the character of special demurrers, or exception to the testimony than of a consideration of the weight which should be given to it, or the results deducible therefrom. I propose briefly to reply to these objections. Both gentlemen complain that the official abstract from the office of the Secretary of State of Ohio, with the broad seal of State attached certifying the result of the congressional election in the third district in Ohio, on the 14th October, 1856, was not properly before us, and that the Committee of Elections had no right to receive it as evidence or give any weight to it, because it was not filed with the Clerk of this House within the sixty days prescribed by the ninth section of the act of Congress "prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections," approved February 19, 1851. I maintain that a just and reasonable construction of this act does not include within its provisions an official record, which, by the broad seal of the sovereign State from which it emanates, proves itself, and cannot, therefore, be comprehended under that species of "testimony" comprehended by the act, and required, by its ninth section, to be taken within sixty days from the day on which the answer of the member returned shall be served upon the contestant.

A careful examination of this act will, in my opinion, fully justify my construction of its provisions. What are they?

The third section provides:

"That when any such contestant or returned member shall be desirous of obtaining testimony respecting such election, it shall be lawful for him to make application to any judge of any court of the United States, or to any chancellor, judge, or justice of a court of record of any State, or to any mayor, recorder, or intendant of any town or city, which said officer shall reside within the congressional district in which such contested election was held, who shall thereupon issue his subpoena, directed to all such witnesses as shall be named to him, requiring the attendance of such witnesses before him, at some time and place named in the subpoena, in order to be then and there examined respecting the said contested election, in the manner hereinafter provided."

The fourth section provides merely for the service of the subpoena.

The fifth section provides simply a penalty for neglecting or refusing to attend or testify.

The sixth section provides for the mode and manner of giving notice of the time and place of taking the testimony, the names of the witnesses to be examined, and their residences, and the name of the officer who is to conduct the examination.

The seventh section provides the mode and manner of the examination, and requires—

"That the testimony of the witnesses, together with the questions proposed by the parties or their agents, the said magistrate is hereby authorized and required to cause to be reduced to writing, in his presence, and the presence of the parties or their agents, if attending, and to be duly attested by the witnesses respectively; after which he shall immediately transmit by mail the said testimony, duly certified under his hand, and sealed up, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives; for the time being, together with a copy of the subpoena and notice, served upon the party, as provided for in the preceding section and of the proof of the service of the said notice."

The ninth section provides—

"That the testimony taken by the parties to the contest, or either of them, shall be confined to the proof or disproof of the facts alleged in the notice and answer mentioned in the first and second sections of this act; and no testimony shall be taken after the expiration of sixty days from the day on which the answer of the member returned shall be served on the contestant; and a copy of the notice of the contest and of the answer of the returned member, shall be prefixed to the depositions taken, and transmitted with them to the Clerk of the House of Representatives: Provided, That the House may, at their discretion, allow supplementary evidence to be taken after the expiration of said sixty days."

I submit, Mr. Speaker, very confidently, that a careful inspection of the foregoing provisions of the act, conclusively show that they contemplated parol evidence, or some instrument of writing which required parol proof of its genuineness. Neither the spirit or letter of the statute includes official records as within the testimony required by the ninth section to be closed within sixty days after service of the answer of the returned member.

Mr. GILMER. If the gentleman will read the eighth section, he will see that that very identical sort of testimony was contemplated.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am coming to that point directly. My friend from North Carolina seems to think that the official statement of the result of this election, from the office of the Secretary of State of Ohio, with the broad seal attached thereto, is comprehended by the eighth section of the act of 1851, already referred to. I think he is clearly in error. What are the provisions of this eighth section? They are in these words:

"That the said magistrate shall have power to require the production of papers; on refusal or neglect of any person to produce and deliver up any paper or papers in his possession pertaining to said election, or to produce and deliver up certified or sworn copies of the same in case they may be official papers, he shall be liable to all the penalties prescribed in the fifth section of this act, and all papers thus produced and all certified as sworn copies of official papers, shall be transmitted by said magistrate, with the testimony of witnesses, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives."

This section confers upon the magistrate the authority to call for the production of certain papers, and if produced, provides for their transmission. It does not exclude or deprive either party from filing official papers which prove themselves, and which were not called for or produced before the officer who took the testimony. The section simply confers the authority upon the officer to enforce the production of papers if called for. It nowhere restricts either party from filing official papers which prove themselves, and which were not called for or produced during the examination.

But, Mr. Speaker, I deny that this act anywhere confines the filing of testimony to sixty days. The restriction is upon the taking of testimony, and not upon its production. The words are, "no testimony shall be taken after the expiration of sixty days," &c.; and were an officer, through neglect or design, to fail in transmitting immediately the testimony taken by him, I deny that such a failure would deprive either party of the testimony, if filed after the assembling of Congress. Such would, in my judgment, be the true construction of this act as to parol evidence. The limitation could, a fortiori, have no possible effect upon records or documents which bore no testimony as to their genuineness, but which became authentic from the impress of the seal of sovereignty attached thereto.

My friend from North Carolina [Mr. GILMER] somewhat anticipated this argument, and said it was barely possible that this official abstract might come in as a public document, assimilating it to a paper filed as an exhibit to a bill in equity. He argued very earnestly, however, that this position would prove fatal to the claims of the contestant, Mr. Vallandigham, because the same rule would require a production of a copy of the poll-books as the best evidence to show how each elector whose vote was challenged had voted; and that the parol testimony taken by the contestant on this ground be excluded.

If the law of Ohio placed the copies of the poll-books, and the abstract of the result of an election certified by the official canvassers to the Secretary of State, on a common grade in the scale of testimony, there might be some force in this objection. Such is not the fact.

A reference to the election law of Ohio (Swan's Statutes of Ohio, page 443-4) will show that the poll-books of an election are not returned to the Secretary of State. One poll-book is returned to the clerk of the court of common pleas in each county, and the other to the township clerk. It is made the duty of the clerk of common pleas in each county, with two justices of the peace, on the sixth day after an election to open the returns in congressional elections, and certain State officers, and to make an abstract of the votes in manner prescribed by law, and to forward a copy, certified and subscribed, to the Secretary of State.

By the law of Ohio, the Secretary of State is the keeper of this abstract, and is authorized to make copies thereof under the great seal; and such copies, when thus certified, are received as evidence in all courts and places, in the same manner and with all the force and effect of the originals, if produced. (Swan's Statutes of Ohio, pages 361, 367.)

No such effect is given to the poll-books. They stand wholly on a different footing. There is no statute authorizing any officer to make official copies of them; and if made, they would not, by any statute of Ohio, become competent testimony. If required, they could be produced only by a subpoena duces tecum; and no application was made for their production, had it been competent to do so under the eighth section of the act of Congress.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to know if it is not the law of 1851, that all official papers shall be transmitted by the magistrate with the papers?

Mr. STEVENSON. I construe that law differently from the gentleman from Indiana. I have already attempted to show that by the eighth section of that act, the magistrate was authorized to certify no papers that were not then produced; and that a failure to call for them by either party at that time could not diminish their authenticity, or prevent either party from filing them at a subsequent period. But I hope the gentleman will allow me to go on with my argument, without interruption. I had just stated the postulate, that no man could carefully examine this act, and arrive correctly at the conclusion that official papers, which, under a broad seal of State, prove themselves, could be included under the term "testimony," as used in the act.

In support of my construction, I can cite gentlemen to the fact that, since the passage of this statute of 1851, these official abstracts have been allowed, as I am informed, in a dozen contested elections, to come in after the termination of sixty days, without question. So that in my argument I am supported by the past action and precedents of this House in similar cases.

What is the next ground, Mr. Speaker, on which the gentlemen attempt to rest? It is still more technical. They claim that the notice of contest from Mr. Vallandigham, required under this act of 1851, is fatally defective in specifying all the names of the voters whose votes he intended to contest. The first section of that election act is as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act, whenever any person shall intend to contest an election of any member of the House of Representatives of the United States, he shall, within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the officer or board of canvassers authorized by law to determine the same, give notice in writing to the member whose seat he designs to contest of his intention to contest the same; and in such notice shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest."

Now, does the word "grounds," as used in this section, necessarily require a contestant to name every voter whose vote he intends to contest? Such is the construction confidently urged upon us by my friends and colleagues on the committee, who have argued the other side of this question. Now, sir, I maintain, the contestant here has specifically set forth the grounds of the contest, and fully complied with all the requistions of this act. He has specified particular classes of electors, whose right is challenged, not by name, but by setting out, with mathematical accuracy, the various grounds of illegality on which he intended to rely. His notice of contest contained nineteen specifications—votes by non-residents of the State, by non-residents of the county, aliens, minors, idiots—each ground specified and separately set out. The sixteenth specification enumerated by name ten mulattoes and persons of color, with twenty-two others not named, who were illegally permitted to vote for the contestant. And yet gentlemen say, that because the names of every voter intended to be challenged is not set out in this notice, therefore the sitting member shall retain his seat without an examination, and no matter how illegal was his election, or what frauds were practiced in its accomplishment. I would ask my friend from Indiana, who talked of popular sovereignty in the close of his speech, and who seemed to constitute himself the peculiar guardian of popular rights, if when a man comes to this Hall, representing nine tenths of the voters of his district, to seek his rights as their chosen Representative on this floor, he would turn him off and say, "Sir, whatever your majority, or whatever may have been the frauds and outrages on the ballot-box, you have not specified in your notice the name of each illegal voter, and I will not examine into your proof or listen to your complaint?" Is the popular voice to be strangled by such a technicality? Are wrongs and outrages upon popular rights to be passed over under so unnatural and strained a construction of a statute passed to protect the elective franchise? This act of 1851 was enacted to protect the right of popular suffrage; and yet if such a construction is to be given to it, it ties up the hands of a contestant, and tends to defeat the very object of its enactment. Take such an election as the one we are now considering in three populous counties in Ohio, where nearly nineteen thousand votes were cast, and I ask, would it not be almost physically impossible for any man, in thirty or forty days, to ascertain the name of every illegal voter that may have voted at that election? The time prescribed for giving notice is within thirty days after the board of canvassers have determined the election. In many districts in my own State, such a requisition would be almost impossible. Such a construction of the word "grounds" as to require the name of every illegal voter to be given, would amount, in some cases, to a denial of the right of contest.

There is one ground, Mr. Speaker, upon which I think we should all agree. It is, if this section of the statute has hitherto received in this House, by its past precedents, a uniform and consistent construction, that construction ought not now to be departed from. If the construction hitherto adopted is more enlarged and liberal, and better calculated to carry out the objects of this act than a more restricted and technical one, it affords another pregnant reason for a strict adherence to it.

The act was passed in 1851. Some seventeen contested elections have occurred here since its adoption. Of these but two are reported, which afford any light on this question. They both sustain my construction, and expressly decide that a contestant, in stating in his notice the grounds of contest, is not required to name each voter whose right of suffrage is contested.

The first of these cases is that of Wright vs. Fuller, decided in 1852. There the objection was made, that the notice was fatally defective, because it did not enumerate the names of the illegal voters. Mr. Ashe, of North Carolina, made the majority report, overruling at length this objection, and expressly deciding that it was not necessary in the notice to enumerate the names of the challenged voters, and this report was sustained by the House. Again, during the last Congress, in the contested election of Otero vs. Gallegos, a similar objection was interposed to the legality of the notice. Mr. William R. Smith, a leading member of the American party, made the report. In it he says:

"Your committee think the notice was quite sufficient to authorize the taking of the testimony. No such objection was made by the sitting member or his counsel at the time of taking the depositions. On the contrary, he appeared and examined the witnesses without any objection whatever; and if he had no notice at all, and had appeared and examined them, he would have been estopped from setting up notice."

These authorities, uncontradicted by a single precedent of a contrary ruling since the passage of this act, would seem to be decisive of this objection. It may be added, however, that Mr. Campbell appeared by counsel, and examined the contestant's witnesses without objection, and it would be too late now to insist upon it.

Mr. Speaker, the construction hitherto placed by the House upon this act is eminently right and proper. To give the construction contended for by the gentleman on the other side, to the first section, would render it impracticable to detect and expose the most flagrant abuses and outrages on the elective franchise. Nothing is required by the letter or spirit of the act but to give the grounds of the illegality committed in the election, and I hope this House will never depart from the construction hitherto given to it. How unjust would be a contrary ruling at this day? Had the contestant looked to the reported precedents of this House, which I have just quoted, as we have a right to presume he did, before giving his notice, could he have doubted that an enumeration of the voters' names was wholly unnecessary? Shall we now overturn these precedents, and thus make it a snare for entrapping him? I cannot and will not believe it. The construction heretofore uninterruptedly given is right, and, I trust, will be adhered to. If originally doubtful, justice requires it should not now be disturbed.

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend, and do not now intend, to go into the merits of this controversy. That will be much better done by my friend from Mississippi, who will close the debate in support of his report. I wish, however, to say a word or two before I sit down on the qualification of suffrage as contained in the present constitution of Ohio. I do not agree with the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] as to his deductions about the class of colored voters, who, in his judgment, are still entitled to the right of suffrage in his own State. Nor can I, highly as I estimate his legal acquirements, yield my acquiescence to the process of reasoning by which he arrived at the conclusion that colored persons are still good voters in Ohio.

The constitution of Ohio provides that—

"Every male white citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of the State for one year next preceding the election, and of the county, township, or ward, in which he resides, such time as may be provided by law, shall have the qualifications of an elector, and be entitled to vote at all elections."

Whatever may have been the former decisions of the Ohio courts, I maintain, that, under the present constitution of Ohio, no descendant of the African race can exercise the right of suffrage. There has been no adjudication on the question of suffrage by the courts of Ohio, as I learn, since 1851, when the present constitution was adopted. The gentleman from Ohio maintains, however, that Ohio has a right to determine for herself, not only what excess of white blood constitutes a white man as contradistinguished from a colored person, but also to say, within Ohio, who are citizens, and as such entitled, within her limits, to the right of suffrage. He maintains that the supreme court of his State has already judicially settled, prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1851, that persons having a portion of black blood were entitled to the right of suffrage, and that even the Supreme Court of the United States would follow the decisions of the supreme court of Ohio in the construction of one of its own statutes. I cannot yield my assent to this argument, and I do not think the position assumed can be maintained.

If the constitution of Ohio, adopted in 1851, had simply said "a white citizen," I can perceive that there would have been great force in this argument.

It may be maintained that a State shall prescribe how much black blood shall constitute a certain class of her people to be colored persons. Most of the States have provisions on this subject. A construction of such statutes by the supreme court of the State where they existed would be followed, too, by the Supreme Court of the United States. Indeed, that tribunal has said that a State within its own borders can say who shall be voters, and who enjoy the rights of citizens within the State. That, however, is not the question here. No State has a right to confer citizenship of the United States, and where a State constitution requires as a suffrage qualification that the elector shall be a white citizen of the United States, I utterly deny that in such State any descendant of the African race can be an elector. The decision of the supreme court of Ohio cannot control the question. Whenever it shall decide that a descendant of the African race, however small the quantity of black blood, or whatever the degree, is entitled to the right of suffrage, its decision will be in direct antagonism with the Dred Scott decision. That case authoritatively settles that no descendant of the African race is or can be a citizen of the United States. The constitution of Ohio requires an elector to be a white citizen of the United States. If, therefore, the supreme court of Ohio were to construe their constitution as conferring citizenship of the United States on such descendant of the African race, it is manifest that such a ruling could not be upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States do not follow the State decisions in the construction of their own constitutions, nor are they bound by them. I must, however, express my opinion that the supreme court of Ohio will never construe their constitution of 1851 as conferring suffrage on a descendant of the African race. I am aware of its decisions heretofore made.

"The first case was Gray vs. The State, 4 Ohio Rep., 354, decided upon the statutory rule of competency of witnesses, which excluded blacks and mulattoes from testifying in a cause to which a white person was a party. The defendant was nearer white than a mulatto; and the decision in favor was made, that a mulatto could not be a witness in behalf of the State. As this was a favorable construction of the statute, and made in a criminal cause, it passed without notice.

"In another case, Williams vs. School Directors, Wright's Rep., 578, it was decided that the children of a white mother and a father three fourths white, could not be excluded from the common schools, the benefits of which were by statute limited to white children; and force was given to the consideration that the father was taxed for the support of the schools to which his children had been denied admission, as black and mulatto persons were the only persons exempted from taxation for school purposes; and that the father was not included within the exemption. The opinion in Ohio as to the principle of this decision, and the following section, is quoted:

"The words 'colored persons' and 'colored children,' as used in this act, and the act to which this is an amendment, shall be deemed and held to mean those who are reputed to be in whole or in part of African descent."—53 Ohio Laws, 118, section 2, April 8, 1855.

Again: the question as to the meaning of the word 'white'—a word which, of all others in the language, ought to require no gloss—arose in Jeffries vs. Ankeny and others, which was an action brought by a person, the offspring of a white man and a half-breed Indian woman, against the judges of election for refusing his vote; and the judgment of the court was for the plaintiff, that he was white and entitled to suffrage, the court giving weight to the fact that persons of partly Indian descent 'were members of the bar, had exercised political privileges, filled offices, and worthily discharged their duties, and that disfranchisement for this cause will be equally unexpected and startling.'"

I am also aware of the case of Thacker vs. Hawk and others, 11th Ohio, 379, which was an action brought against the judges of election for refusing the vote of the plaintiff "the evidence tending to prove he had some negro blood in him"—and where the ruling of the lower court, instructing the jury "if the plaintiff had any negro blood in him, he was not entitled to vote," was reversed by a divided court. That decision rested on the authority of Jeffries vs. Ankeny et al., already referred to. Judge Read's dissenting opinion, however, in Thacker vs. Hawk and others, is a masterly argument in support of the ruling of the lower court.

In addition to this, the popular sentiment of Ohio, as reflected by the Legislature, seems to have approved of the dissenting opinion of Judge Read rather than the opinion of a majority of the court. On the 3d April, 1856, they passed an amendment to the school law, from which I quote the following section:

"The words 'colored persons' and 'colored children,' as used in this act, and the act to which this is an amendment, shall be deemed and held to mean those who are reputed to be in whole or in part of African descent."

Mr. BINGHAM. Is that the school law?

Mr. STEVENSON. It is an amendment to that law. It is apparent, Mr. Speaker, if the Legislature of Ohio have declared that any one who is in part descended from the African race is a "colored person," he is not a white person, and therefore not entitled to be an elector.

If this law should, however, be repealed, any portion of black blood would make him in part a descendant from the African race; and if so, he could not be a citizen of the United States under the ruling of the Dred Scott decision; and, if not a citizen of the United States, not a legal elector in Ohio under the constitution of that State.

It is true that this House is the judge of the returns of its own members. In arriving at correct results in the determination of the legal questions arising in contested elections, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States must always have a controlling weight. I doubt not their opinions will always receive the weight on this floor to which they are entitled, not less from the high legal acquirements than the exalted character of the individuals who constitute the court; and of all the decisions which have entitled them to the high position of being regarded the loftiest judicial tribunal of the world, none will add more luster or defy for a longer time all legal criticism than that which has judicially established that a descendant of the African race is not a citizen of the United States.

Mr. TOMPKINS. The gentleman from Kentucky, who has just addressed the House, has been led into an error in regard to the time when this notice of the contestant would have to be served upon the sitting member. The statute from which he read declares how the notice shall be served.

Mr. STEVENSON. It is thirty days after the votes have been canvassed.

Mr. TOMPKINS. Thirty days after the votes are canvassed, and not thirty days after the election. The elections in the State of Ohio are held on the second Tuesday of October, which can never happen earlier than the 8th of October, or later than the 14th. The result of the election for members of Congress has to be declared between the 1st and 10th of December following; and within thirty days from that time the contestant is to serve the notice upon the sitting member, or upon the person declared to be elected. Hence, almost ninety days are allowed for the purpose of serving the notice. It is true that the statute says the notice shall be served within thirty days after the result is announced. The Governor and the Secretary of State are made canvassers of the votes, and they are to declare who are elected members of Congress; and within thirty days of that declaration the notice must be served. I thought the gentleman from Kentucky was misled by that act, and that he might mislead others.

I wish to say a word upon another point. The decision of the supreme court was as to the effect of the word "white," and what constituted a "white male inhabitant" of the State of Ohio. The court having given a particular construction to the word "white" in the old constitution, the new constitution has not changed the rights of persons from what was established by that decision. By the old constitution, "white male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years" were entitled to vote. By the new constitution, "white male citizens" have the right to vote; still, whenever it is decided that a person is white, he has the rights of a citizen of the United States; and hence the rights of persons having colored blood in them are not changed under the new constitution, for the reason that the court gave a construction to the word "white," and declared what it meant in the constitution. The decision was that a person having a preponderance of white blood, was a white man; and if a man be white he is a citizen of the United States, if born within the United States; although he may have one fourth of African blood in his veins, he is nevertheless a citizen of the United States. The decision of the court upon that one point has settled this question, and the new constitution has not changed it.

Mr. QUITMAN. I would ask the gentleman whether the voter must not only be white, but a citizen?

Mr. TOMPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. QUITMAN. The point is, whether "white" and "citizen" mean the same thing?

Mr. TOMPKINS. Every white man born within the limits of the United States is a citizen of the United States; and the court having declared that a man who has a preponderance of white blood in his veins is a white man, he, of course, is a citizen of the United States.

Mr. QUITMAN. To be a citizen a man must be of pure white blood, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. TOMPKINS. We say that the supreme court of Ohio has the right to declare what the meaning of her constitution is; and whatever the Supreme Court of the United States may have decided does not affect the construction given by the courts of Ohio to the constitution of Ohio. Our courts have the right to declare what is meant by the term white, as used in our constitution. We find many persons that do not come up to the standard of pure white. Then who shall decide? The courts; and the courts have declared that those who have a preponderance of white blood in their veins shall be considered white, and are citizens.

Mr. LAMAR. I did not expect to participate in this discussion, nor can I do so now with any justice to myself, laboring, as I am, under a severe indisposition. But, sir, the attack which has been made upon the report of that portion of the minority of the committee with whom I am acting upon this subject—an attack partaking more of ingenuity, I will say, with all due respect, than of fairness—leaves me no alternative but to come forward and defend the positions taken, and the general conclusion arrived at in that report.

Before I come to the consideration of the points which it presents, I desire, if I can, to fix the attention of members upon one point alluded to by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON;] a point which, though entirely unnoticed, and constituting no part of the contestant's case as made out in the report, is nevertheless, to my mind, absolutely conclusive as to the right of the sitting member. Reflection upon the subject, and an examination of the authorities, have convinced me that the election in the second ward of Dayton, excepted to by the contestant, and which resulted in a majority of ninety-two for the sitting member, was illegal and void. I hold that the entire returns of that ward ought to be rejected, upon the ground that the person who undertook to preside as judge over that election had no authority to act as such, being appointed, not in accordance with the law, but in direct violation of its provisions. By the law of Ohio regulating elections, the councilmen of each ward are constituted, ex officio, judges of the elections in their respective wards; and in the absence of either of those councilmen, or if either of them shall be a candidate at any election, the law provides that it shall be the duty of the electors of said ward, or the electors present, to choose a person to act as judge at said election.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire whether that statute does not prescribe the mode of electing the judges to be viva voce?

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for that suggestion.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I desire the gentleman's attention a little longer. I desire to inquire whether the officer of election himself does not swear to the fact, and whether anybody has contradicted him, that Mr. Vallandigham was there when proclamation of his election as judge was made by many voices, and objected to by none, and that Mr. Vallandigham allowed him to be sworn in?

Mr. LAMAR. I shall go on to that point, but will remark, in passing, that the testimony shows directly the reverse to be the facts.

Mr. WILSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that when the judge was elected fairly; when he came forward and took the oath; when no objection was made, even if there was an informality on the part of the judge, the election is to be void?

Mr. LAMAR. I am going right to that very question. For the benefit of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] I will read the statute on which I am commenting:

"Sec. 7. That if either of the trustees, common councilmen, or clerk of any township shall fail to attend at the time and place of holding an election; or if either of them should be a candidate, then it shall be the duty of the electors present to choose, viva voce, suitable persons (as the case may require) having the qualifications of electors, to act as judge or clerk (as the case may be) of the election."

Now, sir, what do the proofs show? They show that so far from the statute being complied with, the election was conducted in direct violation of its provisions. Reuben Chapman, the councilman, several days prior to the election, appointed one Suth M. Sullivan to act as his substitute in that election. Sullivan states that he acted as judge in that election by virtue of that appointment, and by virtue of no other authority whatever. That is, he acted as judge of that election by the appointment of Reuben Chapman, the councilman.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question presents itself—and it meets the point to which my friend from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] directs my attention—how does the want of authority in the officers of an election affect the validity of that election? That is the question now presented by this case. To what extent does the validity of an election depend on the authority of those who preside over it? Well, on this point, I presume there will be little difference of opinion when I call the attention of members to the views of writers on the subject, who are recognized as standard authors on legislative proceedings. I quote from Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Proceedings, pages 71 and 72:

"In this country the rule appears to be that persons assuming to be returning officers and acting as such, are presumed to be legally elected or appointed, and to be duly qualified for the discharge of their duties, until the contrary is made to appear; in which case, their proceedings in reference to elections will be set aside."

"It is the invariable practice therefore, with us, to allow the authority and qualifications to be inquired into; and if it appears that persons assuming to act as such are not duly elected, the proceedings of the persons thus assuming to act will be void."

Mr. TRIPPE. Is there any evidence that this illegal precinct vote was ever counted in the consolidated returns?

Mr. LAMAR. I think it is sworn to positively in the testimony. Here it is:

"Question 39. How many votes were received and counted at said election for L. D. Campbell, and how many for C. L. Vallandigham?"

"Answer. Two hundred and thirty-five for Campbell, and one hundred and forty-three for Vallandigham."

Mr. TRIPPE. The question is this: did this ninety-two majority enter into the estimate?

Mr. LAMAR. I will answer the gentleman's question by reading another question and answer from the printed testimony:

"Question 40. Were those the respective numbers for each as returned in the poll-book to the office of the clerk of the court of Montgomery county?"

"Answer. Yes."

Mr. BINGHAM. I submit that that does not answer the question yet. The question is, did the canvassers include this vote at all?

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. Where is the proof of it?

Mr. LAMAR. I answer the gentleman from Ohio that there is evidence that it was counted in the general summary returned by the clerks of the various counties to the Secretary of State. For instance, here is the certified copy of the return from Montgomery county, and from every ward thereof.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the summary which the gentleman contests, and says he does not rely upon.

Mr. LEITER. I propose to make a suggestion. It is this: it has been decided there very many times, that, although the judges are required to be sworn under our statutes, nevertheless, if they be not sworn, and if the votes taken by those judges are legal votes, the Legislature will not disfranchise the people.

Mr. BINGHAM. The statute is only directory.

Mr. LAMAR. I think I can satisfy the gentleman from Ohio that the decision referred to by him is correct, and yet consistent with the point I am making. There are congressional precedents of a similar kind. Congress has, in repeated instances, where the conduct of the returning officers was irregular, or the returns of the election informally made out, waived the irregularities and informalities, provided the election itself was fairly and legally conducted; but these precedents are all based upon the broad and obvious distinction existing between the returns of an election and the election itself. The election is the choosing of their Representative by the people, in accordance with the law; whilst the returns are the mere evidence of the result, as furnished by the officers, consisting of certificates and boards and commissions. The election is the great fact, of which the returns are the mere legal evidence. Now, these returns may be informal; the acts of the officers may be irregular; Congress may set them aside, or waive them, without affecting the validity of the election itself. The fact of the election still exists, although Congress may ascertain its existence by evidence other than the returns.

But, sir, when you come to inquire into the election, it is quite different. The times, places, and modes of holding, and the qualifications of its officers, as prescribed by law, enter into the very essence of an election; are indispensable to its validity; and the fact of the election does not exist unless these are substantially carried out. And hence, whilst Congress has been very liberal in waiving the mistakes or neglect of returning officers—the officers duly appointed—it has ever been jealously rigid in enforcing the law in relation to the election. I will refer gentlemen to a case which occurred in the Fourth Congress, of which many of the framers of the Constitution were members, and among them James Madison. In that case the very principle is laid down which I contend for; it is almost a parallel with the case under consideration. I refer to the case of Jackson vs. Wayne, (Contested Elections, page 47.) In that case it was held that—

"Where the law required the election to be held by three magistrates, an election held by three persons, two of whom were not magistrates, should be set aside."

In another case it was decided that—

"Where the selectmen are returning officers, an election is conducted by persons who are not duly elected selectmen, the proceedings of the persons thus assuming to act will be void."

There are many other cases directly in point, which I have not time to refer to.

The case quoted by the gentleman from Indiana to show that the acts of an officer de facto are valid as to third persons, is wholly inapplicable. It was a case of quo warranto in a court of common law; and the language of the judge demonstrates, more clearly than anything I can say, the utter inapplicability of the decision to the case of an ordinary contested election:

"The result of an election, when controverted in court, is like a judgment sued upon. We have no power to reverse it for errors in conducting it, and thus give those concerned in it a retrial."

Is this true of a contested election in Congress. Why, sir, nothing is more common than for this House to review the proceedings of those who conduct the elections, and to reverse their judgments. Analogies drawn there from the practice of common law courts of limited jurisdiction are hardly applicable to a body like ours, made by the Constitution judges of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members. The words of the Constitution are broad and comprehensive, and embrace within their scope every subject and question connected with membership. We are judges not of the returns and qualifications merely, but of the election of members. We can go behind the returns and inquire into the elections and into the qualifications of the officers, and set aside their acts if they be not duly qualified. It is a high and important power, sir, I admit. There is, perhaps, nowhere in the Constitution a power conferred upon the Government, or any of its departments, more important and delicate. And, sir, in the hands of a corrupt and factious majority, it might be made a dangerous instrument of oppression; for it opens an avenue through which Federal power can effect an entrance right into the heart of a State, and going behind the acts of its authorities, march up to the very fountains of political power. And hence I respond fully to the sentiment of the gentleman, that we should decide these questions impartially, and without reference to party prejudices. Sir, he who would drag such a question into the arena of party debate, trifles with the rights of the people. The member who, in this matter, is prompted by any motive less pure than truth; who raises his voice or gives his vote with even a glancing thought of party profit, is untrue to the high responsibilities of his position, and guilty of crimen lèse majestatis.

Mr. TOMPKINS. Will the gentleman disfranchise the people of a county, township, or precinct, simply because there was some informality in appointing one of the judges of election?

Mr. LAMAR. I must confess that I have spoken to very little purpose if I have not answered the gentleman's question already. But I think I might say to the gentleman, and to those who have argued the question on that side, when they complain of setting aside an election by the people on account of technicalities, et tu, Brute! for every objection urged by them is technical. The arguments relied upon by them would deprive the contestant of his seat, even though the evidence had shown him entitled to it by a majority of one thousand votes. Why, sir, all their points are technical, and some of them barely rise to the dignity of a technicality. When they complain of technicality, therefore, let them remember that "they that take the sword shall perish with the sword."

But, sir, I tell the gentleman that the absence of all authority in the presiding officer at an election is something more than a mere informality. It is of essence. What is an election by ballot but a choice of the Representative in the mode prescribed by law. In reply to the statement of the other gentleman from Ohio, that there was a tacit election and no objection made to Sullivan's acting, I have to say that there was objection made, as appears in the testimony. But, sir, I hold that the people cannot by acquiescence waive the forms of an election as prescribed by law. They cannot elect visa voce, if the law prescribes ballot. They cannot acquiesce in an illegal alteration of the time, and hold a valid election on a day different from that appointed by law. And so with any other requirement of the law. Sir, this right of suffrage is a conventional right—the creature of law, and those who exercise it must exercise it subject to the conditions and restrictions which the law throws around it.

The disregard of the wholesome restrictions of the law is the vice of the present age; a symptom of the decay of public order and public virtue in our country.

Now as to the effect of this election. I think that, inasmuch as the majority of the sitting member is greater in the second ward than in the district, it clearly invalidates his right to the seat now in contest. But I admit it does not strengthen, in the slightest degree, the title of the contestant. He can claim nothing from it; he can get no benefit from it; for, in order to show him entitled to the seat, he must show his affirmative right by a majority of all the votes in the district. If he has not a majority over the sitting member, of all the votes, including those cast in the second ward of Dayton, I am willing to set aside the election, and send it back to the people.

Mr. BINGHAM. Before the gentleman leaves that point, I would like to say a word.

Mr. LAMAR. I understand that half of my time has expired, and I hope the gentleman will allow me to proceed without interruption. I think I have been very liberal in yielding the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly. I only wished to call the gentleman's attention to the proof upon that point.

Mr. LAMAR. I will now pay my respects to the gentleman from Ohio, and reply to his review of the report of the minority with whom I act.

Mr. PHILLIPS. With the permission of the gentleman, I desire to say a word, as I was one of those who joined in his report. There is nothing in the report upon that question; that vote of that ward in Dayton is not counted, and with my consent it would not have been. I recognize the right of officers de facto. As that matter has been referred to, it may have been supposed by some that it would affect the result. It is not so.

Mr. LAMAR. I have so understood and so stated. I will only say in reply, that in a contested-election case the officer de facto is held to be acting de jure until the contrary appears, and that then his acts are not recognized as good and valid. Now, as to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio. He has with a great deal of confidence taken up the report, and ridiculed the fact, that of aliens I report the same number of illegal votes for the sitting member and for the contestant, and with an air of triumph, exclaims, "so far the result is not changed." He then takes up the votes of minors, and shows that according to my report more minors voted for the contestant than for the sitting member; and with the same air of exultation exclaims, "this gives Campbell one more vote than he came with." And so he goes on, until he gets to the votes of the non-residents of the State, and he seems to consider it a great triumph over me that I had deducted as many illegal votes from the poll of the contestant as from that of the sitting member. The surprise the gentleman manifested was natural; but I can give him a clew to my conduct, by telling him that I deducted illegal votes without reference to the person for whom they were given; and that I was as careful to deduct the illegal votes cast for the contestant as I was to deduct those which were cast for the sitting member. I might say, if I were inclined to say a bitter thing, that—

Mr. BINGHAM. My criticism was confined exclusively to the remarks of the contestant.

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman spoke of Mr. LAMAR, thus violating the rules of the House, in his allusion to me. All I have to say is, that I deducted illegal votes impartially; and if the gentleman cannot understand the motive which prompted me to do so, allow me to say that we act from very different motives.

Mr. BINGHAM. I must disclaim expressing any surprise at the sense of justice manifested by the gentleman. I deny that there was anything in my language that would imply it. I limited my criticism to the contestant, in attempting to show himself elected, by adopting, for that purpose, the merest hearsay, much of which, if it tended to prove anything, tended to prove that the contestant was not elected.

Mr. HILL. I also misunderstood the gentleman from Ohio. I understand him to say now, that, taking the report of the gentleman from Mississippi as the basis of argument, the conclusions he would derive from it would be different from those deduced by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BINGHAM. And the matter I dwelt upon with surprise was, that the contestant should attempt to get up an election of himself by any such procedure or by any such incompetent or illegal evidence.

Mr. LAMAR. I accept the gentleman's disclaimer with pleasure. If I am not mistaken, however, the gentleman also applied the words "perpetrate an outrage upon the rights of the sitting member" to those of us who sustain the claim of the contestant. That may not be an offensive imputation according to the Ohio standard of etiquette, though it is considered so in Mississippi.

But I will take the gentleman upon his own argument. He admits that my report, until it comes to the votes of non-residents, brings out the sitting member only one majority ahead.

Mr. BINGHAM. I did not admit the fact to be proved, by any means, that the sitting member had but one majority, or that the fifteen negroes and mulattoes either voted in fact, or that they voted for the sitting member.

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman said he would take my own report and prove the title of the sitting member. Until I come down to the votes of "non-residents of the State," he admits that, according to my showing, the sitting member is only one ahead. The votes of the negroes and mulattoes are included in that calculation. He then defies me to show, by any positive proof, what non-resident votes ought to be deducted from the poll of the sitting member. I will show by the highest authority that there were non-resident votes that ought to be deducted. If you will read from the report of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER,] you will find that he deducts from the poll of the sitting member the votes of Hudson George, A. H. Rice, J. F. Morris, J. T. Sage, J. M. Morrison, Samuel J. Hoikes, George Sowbray, Derrick Barkalow, James Paine, making, in all, nine deducted for non-residents. This gives a majority of eight for the contestant.

Mr. TRIPPE. In that, I suppose, you estimate the fifteen negro votes?

Mr. LAMAR. I do.

Mr. TRIPPE. Well, I find on page 9 of the report made by yourselves that the witness Molyneux is represented as saying that the twelve colored men were brought up by the friends of Lewis D. Campbell, and that the Democratic party objected. On looking at the testimony, page 125, the witness you refer to only says that he saw two vote; and that his statement as to the friends of the one party or the friends of the other party agreeing to or opposing them respectively, was as to these two. The statement of the committee is made to cover the whole twelve. Is there any other testimony than that of W. J. Molyneux on that point?

Mr. LAMAR. There is; I shall have to throw myself on the indulgence of the House for the want of connection which must appear in my argument by these frequent interruptions. I am now on a point wholly different from that of the testimony by which negroes are proved to have voted. I will come to that, and consider it hereafter.

In reference, Mr. Speaker, to the sufficiency of this notice, (so much discussed,) I have only to say there have been fifteen cases of contested elections since the law of 1851 was passed, and that, in not a single instance, have the names of the illegal voters been set forth. The point was expressly raised and decided, just as we contend it should be decided in this report of the minority, and that decision was sustained by the high authority and ability of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN,] whose name appears first among those of the Committee of Elections who now maintain that this notice is insufficient because the names of the voters are not stated. Any one who reads the notice will see that it sets forth very plainly, fully, and distinctly each ground of contest—that the propositions are expressed with marked precision and sharpness. Both on principle and authority, unless you make "names" and "grounds" synonymous terms, the objection stands condemned.

Mr. MILLSON. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry for information? The gentleman has stated there have been fifteen cases of contested election since the law was passed—will the gentleman inform me if there has been any instance in which a contestant has gained his seat on such a notice as this?

Mr. LAMAR. In the case of Otero and Gallegos, the specifications did not contain the names.

Mr. MILLSON. Was that a question of illegal voting?

Mr. LAMAR. I understand it was.

Mr. MILLSON. My impression is different.

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman's impression is incorrect. But I will state another case. In the case of Archer against Allen, the point was carried. There were no names specified in that notice, and yet the member was unseated under it.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman is mistaken as to the case of Archer against Allen. Allen was the sitting member; and I remember distinctly that I myself objected to the insufficiency of the notice, and Allen retained his seat.

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman is mistaken about that. Mr. Allen was sent back.

Mr. MILLSON. At all events Archer did not get the seat.

Mr. LAMAR. What possible difference does that make, when both the committee and the House affirmed the legality of the notice by entertaining the case and receiving the testimony under it, and actually unseating the sitting member? I will state, for the information of the gentleman from Virginia, whose recollection, usually so accurate, seems somewhat at fault in this matter, that the notice in this case is more minute and particular, in setting forth the grounds of the contest, than that in the case of Archer vs. Allen. The notice in that case was a sort of drag-net notice, in which no particular grounds were set forth, except a general claim of a majority; and the gentleman from Virginia might well have objected to it. He could, with perfect consistency, have objected to the notice in that case, and yet hold the notice in this case to be one which is, in every essential particular, conformable to the statute. In reference, Mr. Speaker, to the abstract of the votes, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] has left me nothing to say.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one word as to the ground on which I and those who act with me deduct from the polls of the sitting member the number submitted in our report. First, I lay it down as a proposition which can be sustained both by precedent and authorities, that, where the election is by ballot, and the voters do not appear, or, appearing, refuse to answer, the declaration of the voters themselves as to how they voted may be taken in evidence.

Mr. WILSON. Does the gentleman state that in this case voters were produced, and refused to answer?

Mr. LAMAR. I will reply to the point intimated in the question. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it is necessary to call a voter before you can take evidence as to his declarations? I assert, Mr. Speaker, that the precedents and the authorities go to the admission of the declarations of voters as to how they voted, whether the foundation is laid or not by calling the voter. And it has been decided that it is unnecessary to subpoena witnesses who cannot be compelled to testify when they are subpoenaed.

Mr. WILSON. I ask whether these witnesses within the counties of Preble or Montgomery, could not have been subpoenaed, and, under the law, compelled to answer?

Mr. LAMAR. I answer the gentleman confidently and emphatically in the negative. I assert that the man who casts his vote under the law which gives him the right to cast a secret ballot, cannot, unless there be some special statute authorizing it, be compelled to appear and testify as to how he voted, or as to the fact of his voting. I take my position, and I am willing that it shall go forth to the country, that, where the right of secret ballot exists, men cannot be compelled to testify as to how they voted, or as to the fact of their voting; and that, in the absence of direct testimony, their declarations are admissible for the purpose of proving the political complexion of their vote. In confirmation of this view I refer to the unanimous opinion of the committee in the New Jersey case, and a host of other cases decided by this House.

Now, sir, one word as to the evidence that the mulattoes and persons of color voted for the sitting member. I think the testimony of Anderson as to his own vote; the declarations of Mitchell and Redman, of Lawrence and Cowan; the fact that their right was disputed and opposed by the friends of Vallandigham; that it was advocated by the friends of Campbell; that the friends of Vallandigham had made arrangements to have all these identical men challenged; that the friends of Campbell attended some of them to the polls, and advocated their right, as a class, to vote; their known political sympathies, added to the fact that the sitting member complains (in his answer to the notice) that more of the same were not allowed to vote, "who would have voted for" him, will leave but little doubt upon any impartial mind; and that doubt would be removed by the fact that neither the sitting member nor any of his friends, either before the committee by way of evidence, or here by way of argument, have ventured the expression of a belief to the contrary. Upon the question of the admissibility of this circumstantial evidence, I will quote from Cushing on Controverted Returns and Elections:

"When the voting is by ballot, the voter is not compelled to disclose the character of his vote, or to testify for whom he voted, on a given occasion. When it becomes necessary, therefore, on the trial of a controverted election, to show for whom votes by ballot were given, and such voter refuses to appear, or appearing, refuses to disclose for whom he voted, evidence is admissible of the general reputation of the political character of the voter, and as to the party to which he belonged at the time of the election."

Now, if it be said that the voter should first be called, in order to see if he will refuse to testify, I answer, the Supreme Court has expressly decided in Rayburn's case that when a witness cannot be compelled to testify, he need not be summoned. And in Monroe vs. Jackson, the committee received evidence of the political opinions of the persons voting, their party associations, the persons who opposed their right of voting, and those who maintained their right, and a large number of votes were rejected by the committee upon that evidence alone.

Now, sir, if these authorities do not vindicate fully the propriety of deducting those votes from the poll of the sitting member—provided they be illegal—I am willing to yield the question.

And now let me appeal to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON,] and to every other gentleman in this House, whether there has not been brought evidence, strong as proof of holy writ, as to how these men voted? They dare not rise, in the face of that evidence, and assert that they believe these negro votes were cast for any one besides the sitting member. But, sir, grant all that they ask; take the position which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] and my friend from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] assume, that there is no evidence as to how these people voted except as to one; and the contestant has still a majority of, I think, some eight or nine, and perhaps more than that. He has at least a majority of nine, without counting as illegal a single negro vote. And, in according to him that majority, we have only received such evidence as has been repeatedly received and acted upon by this House in contested-election cases. The current of authority in favor of this kind of evidence, is, with few exceptions, unbroken.

Before I forget it, I wish to call the attention of my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER,] for whose astuteness as a lawyer I have a high respect, to a remarkable instance of an illegal vote being deducted from the poll-list, upon evidence that was, in no particular, positive or direct.

Mr. GILMER. I think my friend will find it hard to point to a case where a vote has been counted by a committee without positive testimony.

Mr. LAMAR. I think I can find one.

Mr. GILMER. Not if there be any doubts as to how the vote was cast. There may be other facts and circumstances which make the proof conclusive.

Mr. LAMAR. I think I can find an instance where a vote was deducted, and not upon direct testimony, and that in the absence of any corroborating facts or circumstances.

Mr. GILMER. The gentleman will understand me. I do not mean to say that there have not been such instances; but the general tenor of the decisions has been the other way.

Mr. LAMAR. I will show you an instance that carries authority with it. The gentleman will find it in his own report. Can the gentleman rise upon his feet and show me the positive proof upon which he rejected from the poll list of Mr. Vallandigham the name of John W. Shroyer? If he can, I shall be very much obliged to him to do so. Sir, the gentleman from North Carolina has stricken from the poll-list of the contestant that name. Can he show me the evidence upon which he assumed that Shroyer voted for the contestant?

Mr. GILMER. At what page does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. LAMAR. At page 160 of the report. I make the gentleman from North Carolina my authority, and I think the authority is a valuable one. It is one that I pride myself upon. The gentleman from North Carolina is exceedingly ingenious, and now I want him to show one particle of direct evidence by which he rejected or appropriated that vote. I will go further. I ask the gentleman to point me to one particle of evidence of any kind whatever.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARLAN obtained the floor.

Mr. WILSON. I just want to reply to one single point made by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] I hold, and I hold upon authority, that it makes no difference at all if there is irregularity in an election, so far as the judges, inspectors, and clerks are concerned, if the election is fairly conducted, no voter obstructed from voting, and no person allowed to vote who is not entitled to vote by law. What is the object of an election? It is to ascertain and express the will of the voters of a township, or county, or State. And when you have once ascertained the will of that people, and there has been no obstruction thrown in the way of the expression of that will, then I hold that it is a legal election, and you cannot disfranchise them by setting it aside.

Now another point. The gentleman reads from Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Bodies that, in the case of a contested election, where a voter refused to appear, or, appearing, refused to testify. Where is the evidence that any of these voters refused to appear? There is not a particle of evidence that any voter has refused to appear. I challenge the contestant even to prove that he ever sought to produce these voters, or that, when produced, they refused to testify. So that the law read by the gentleman has no application to this case. No voter, or at least not more than one voter out of the whole sixteen, did disclose the vote he gave; and no one in this whole evidence refused to disclose it. There is no evidence to show that the contestant in this case took any steps to get them to come forward; and, under such circumstances, I say that evidence going to show the character of a vote by the general political reputation of the voter is not admissible, when the voter himself has not refused to appear, or, appearing, has not refused to disclose the character of his vote.

Mr. GILMER. I will put this thing on the proof.

Mr. LAMAR. As to how he voted. Let us know why you deducted him from Vallandigham.

Mr. GILMER. Here it is. Let it speak for itself.

"Question 30. Are you acquainted with John W. Shroyer; if so, where did you make his acquaintance, and how long have you known him?

Answer. I am. I have been acquainted with him something over a year; became acquainted with him in German township aforesaid, where I reside.

Question 81. Where does he now reside, and where has he resided for the year last past?

Answer. He resides in Indiana. He came to Ohio in August last, and remained with his relatives in our township until the day of election. He left then, and I have not heard of him since; do not know where he is. He came in from Indiana a year ago last fall, when I first made his acquaintance. He was on a visit then, and remained with his friends some five or six weeks, and returned to Indiana again. He came back to Ohio again in August last, as before stated.

Is that hearsay?

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman cannot escape me in that way. My question was as to how he voted, and why you deducted him from Vallandigham's poll? Show me the direct proof on that point.

Mr. GILMER. There may be other proof; but I cannot readily turn to all points of this evidence.

Mr. LAMAR. You may turn till doomsday; you will not find it.

Mr. GILMER. It was to hearsay the gentleman referred.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to state that I have waited with great patience for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to fulfill his pledge. He said that he could prove, by the rules of evidence on which I predicated my argument, that more than one non-resident of the State of Ohio had voted at that election for Mr. Campbell. He has not pointed to one title of evidence of that sort, and I say to the gentleman that he cannot do it. Allow him to take his view of the case, and it is not necessary to produce the best evidence. Hearsay will answer the purpose to prove that the man voted for Campbell, and to prove the fact that he was a non-resident. What I want is the proof.

Mr. LAMAR. I will reply to the gentleman in this way. I took the report of my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER,] signed by all those of the committee who support Mr. Campbell's claims, and showed him that, upon the basis which he said that he would admit—

Mr. GILMER. I hope my friend does not intend to misunderstand me. I asked him to show where the mere admission—

A MEMBER. Is this irregular debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman has not done what he proposed to do; and, with all respect to him, I do not think he can do it.

Mr. HARLAN. I wish to make one or two remarks in reference to one conclusion which gentlemen seem to arrive at with great satisfaction to themselves. It is as to the proof of voters going to the polls and claiming to be Republicans. That sort of proof goes to show that certain men voted the Republican ticket; and from that the conclusion has been drawn that all those who voted the Republican ticket, or who called themselves Republicans, had justly been charged with voting for Mr. Campbell. Now, I wish merely to refer to the printed evidence, and to read the Republican ticket, which is set forth there, and which is referred to by the committee, or that portion of it which has reported unfavorably to the sitting member, to show that, in this instance, where a Republican ticket was used—and used, I presume, by a Republican—that the contestant claims a vote given on that Republican ticket. I wish merely to refer to it as a signal evidence that neither Mr. Vallandigham is justly chargeable with the votes of all the Democrats who voted at that election, nor Mr. Campbell with the votes of all the Republicans, or those who voted the Republican ticket at that election. I refer to the 49th page of the evidence. It is as follows:

REPUBLICAN TICKET.

Supreme Judge, (full term.)	Auditor,
Josiah Scott.	Daniel H. Dryden.
Supreme Judge, (short term.)	Sheriff,
Ozias Bowen.	Samuel C. Emley.
Board of Public Works,	Commissioner,
John Waddle.	John F. Platt.
Attorney General,	Whisky Inspector,
Christopher P. Walcott.	C. P. Leonhard.
School Commissioner,	Flour Inspector,
Anson Smith.	N. R. Bennett.
Congress,	Pork Inspector,
	Joseph Bimim.
Common Pleas Judge,	County Infirmary,
Ebenezer Parsons,	Peter Shirner.
C. L. Vallandigham.

The report of the committee which is unfavorable to Mr. Campbell includes that vote for Mr. Vallandigham, though his name is under the head of "Common Pleas Judge;" and that, too, when contained in a Republican ticket.

Mr. LAMAR. The minority of the committee who report against Mr. Vallandigham allow him that vote. If not, the objection is a valid one.

Mr. HARLAN. It is immaterial to the point I raise, which goes to show that all the Republicans at that election did not vote for Mr. Campbell, and that the conclusion that all who did vote at that election voted for Mr. Campbell is not a legitimate, or, at least, an invariable one. I think that if the poll-books were canvassed, it would be ascertained that a great many other gentlemen who called themselves Republicans omitted to vote for my friend, the sitting member, and further, that those who claimed to be Democrats did not all vote for the contestant. So I understand the evidence to read. I merely wished to rebut the presumption on which the committee have proceeded, that all the Republicans voted for one, and all the Democrats for the other.

Mr. LAMAR. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I consider the gentleman's argument a good one, and it proves that the rule is not an invariable one. I do not regard it as an unerring test. The ballot produced proves that there was in the third congressional district of Ohio at least one repentant sinner. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARLAN. I think there were a great many repentant sinners on the other side.

As the gentleman who has just taken his seat read the testimony as to the manner in which Sullivan was made judge of the election in the second ward in the city of Dayton, my object in rising was merely to refer to the evidence which shows the manner and form in which that judge was appointed. The evidence does establish the fact that he was appointed by the general consent of the bystanders on the ground on the morning of the election, and that the appointment was concurred in by all present, Mr. Vallandigham himself included. I ask the Clerk to read the twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth questions put to Mr. Phillips as to the manner in which that judge was constituted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Question 25. About how many persons were present at the time Sullivan arrived at the polls? At what time were the polls opened?

Answer. I think about ten or a dozen persons were present when Sullivan arrived. I think the polls were opened about a quarter after seven.

Question 23. On the arrival of Sullivan was the outcry of "here he comes," "swear him in," &c., from the bystanders—and if so, was it general?

Answer. It was a general exclamation from the bystanders.

Question 27. Was there any one among the bystanders who objected to Sullivan as judge of the election on that day?

Answer. No objection made.

Question 28. Was Clement L. Vallandigham there when Sullivan arrived, or at any other time during the morning before Sullivan arrived?

Answer. I think he was there all the time.

Question 29. Did he seem to desire that Sullivan should serve as judge on that day?

Answer. He made no objection to me. I pushed to see if any objection would be made, and then swore Sullivan in.

Mr. HARLAN. I also ask the Clerk to read the evidence of Mr. Sullivan on the same point, as found on page 58.

The Clerk read as follows:

Question 9. What occurred on the morning of the 14th day of October last, on your arrival at the polls in the second ward? State fully.

Answer. When I arrived at the polls several voices cried out, "Here he comes! swear him in, so that the polls may be opened." There was not to exceed some ten persons present, and I thought all desired me to act as judge.

Question 10. Was any objection made to you by any of the bystanders?

Answer. None whatever.

Question 12. Was the outcry of which you speak made by those who were waiting at the polls to vote; and if so, did they generally join in the outcry of "here he comes," "swear him in," &c.

Answer. It was from the bystanders, and it was general from all present.

Question 13. Were the duties of judges and clerks of the election then and there discharged faithfully and impartially?

Answer. They were.

Mr. LAMAR. Will the gentleman allow the Clerk to read an extract from the same testimony on the preceding page?

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly

The Clerk read as follows:

Question 2. Did Chapman ask you to act as judge of election in his place on that day? When did he first ask you to do so, and how often? Who else, if anybody, spoke to you to act?

Answer. Mr. Chapman met me in the street a few days prior to the election, and said to me that his family was in such a situation that he feared he would be unable to act as judge in the second ward, and asked me whether I would act in his place if he found it impossible to act, and I answered in the affirmative; and on the morning of the election he came to my house about seven, a. m., and said they were waiting at the polls for me, so that the election might be opened. We then started together for the polls, and just as we got within a square of the place of election he left me, as he said, to go home to breakfast.

Question 3. Do you know of any other authority for your acting that day as a judge of election than the appointment and request of John B. Chapman, as aforesaid?

Answer. I do not know as I do.

Mr. HARLAN. This does not conflict with the evidence to which I have referred, and I have nothing further to say.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I suppose that all the evidence submitted to the Committee of Elections is to be found in their report of December 15, 1857. I would inquire of the gentleman from Mississippi if that be so?

Mr. LAMAR. That is so, I believe.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. With a view to arrive at a conclusion satisfactory to myself, and to determine my vote, I have examined this testimony, and the case of all the voters whose votes have been arraigned either by the contestant or the sitting member. I find that the contestant has arraigned as illegal votes some seventy-two or seventy-five; that the sitting member has arraigned some twenty-five. From a careful examination of this testimony, myself sitting in judgment upon each individual case as I found it in the evidence, without regard to technicalities, and without regard to the legality or illegality of the notice, I have made a list, from the beginning of this testimony to the end, of the voters whose votes have been called in question. I have set down as illegal voters those which the evidence has satisfied me were illegal voters in one column, to be deducted from the vote of Campbell, and in another column, under the head of "not proved," I have set down the names of those whose votes I have regarded as not having been established as illegal.

Of the votes cast for Campbell, I find fourteen to be illegal; of those cast for Vallandigham, I find thirteen to be illegal, and only thirteen upon any legal, competent showing. I find also, from the testimony submitted to the Committee of Elections, that the judges should have allowed Vallandigham two votes that were not allowed him in the Lemon township. I also find four votes which should have been allowed to Campbell which were not allowed to him.

Assuming, then, that the sitting member has received, according to the official canvass, nine thousand three hundred and thirty-eight votes, there should be four votes added, and fourteen deducted therefrom. His legal vote, then, would be nine thousand three hundred and twenty-eight. Vallandigham received, according to the official canvass, nine thousand three hundred and nineteen, to which two votes should be added and thirteen deducted, leaving him nine thousand three hundred and eight. This vote of Vallandigham, deducted from that of Campbell, would leave a majority of twenty in favor of Campbell.

If I had been a member of the Committee of Elections, I should have come to this conclusion. As a member of the House, I have arrived at that result, and I shall feel constrained to vote to retain the sitting member in his seat.

In this calculation, Mr. Speaker, I have rejected all hearsay evidence. I have understood from the beginning of the examination that the rule of law in regard to secondary evidence, as to whom a voter voted for, can only be allowed when the voter himself has declined to testify. I have also excluded as evidence the inference that a man voted for Mr. Vallandigham from the fact that he was a Democrat, and voted the Democratic ticket; because I do not think that that is evidence which ought to satisfy this House, or satisfy any judicial tribunal, that the voter, in that particular instance, cast his vote for Mr. Vallandigham. Nor do I think the proof that a class of voters were understood to be Republicans, and were brought to the polls by Republicans—their votes pressed by Republicans, and resisted by Democrats—without proof that they voted personally for Mr. Campbell, is evidence that they did vote for him.

In regard to the testimony as to the colored votes, I do not find that there is any evidence to show that any one of them voted for Mr. Campbell, except Anderson. All the rest is hearsay evidence; and the hearsay evidence that the others voted for Mr. Campbell only extends to some three, four, or five of the voters; and yet we are asked to assume that the balance of these colored voters voted for Mr. Campbell, because they were regarded as Republicans. Why, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the experience of every gentleman on this floor (for even one election gives him some experience) tells him that there are a great many people who pretend to have voted for a successful candidate, who did not do so. My experience is that the successful man finds a great many more friends than he thought he had. He finds friends around him who say they voted for him, and who he never anticipated would vote for him. I can cite an instance of where I received only two votes in a town, and I believe I have had twenty-five voters of the town declaring that they voted for me. I cite this to show how unsafe a rule it is to take the hearsay testimony of a voter.

I have been actuated by no partisan feeling in this matter. I have, in this case, as in every other contested-election case that has been brought before this House since I have had the honor of being a member, examined the testimony from beginning to end, carefully, and I have come to my conclusions from the testimony, and not from the reports of committees. I have studiously avoided in this case reading either the report made by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] or that made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] or the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS.] I have looked at the testimony, and at the testimony alone; and in making this tabular statement of the voters whose votes I would reject from the evidence, I did not know to what result they might lead. My rule was that I would reject all hearsay testimony, all secondary evidence, and would only count such votes off from the sitting member, or off from the contestant as were clearly shown to be irregular; and I have arrived at the result which I have stated—that the sitting member is clearly and honestly entitled to occupy his seat, as having a majority of about twenty over the contestant. And, Mr. Speaker, I would venture this prediction, that if these votes which are arraigned were put to vote to this House, one by one, and the House should vote on the merits of each particular case, the House would arrive at the same result which I have arrived at, namely, that the sitting member is elected by a majority of twenty, more or less.

I find, since I have made my tabular statement, that, on comparing it with those votes that have been excluded in the report of the committee, I have set down one or two gentlemen as not proved to be illegal voters, who are counted as such in the report of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER.] I find that I differ from him. But I believe that the candid judgment of any three or five, or ten, or fifteen lawyers of this House—were they not members of Congress—would on this question arrive at the conclusion that the sitting member has a majority equal to the one officially reported. I do not, by these remarks, intend to impugn the motives or acts of members of Congress; but we are too apt to be swayed by partisan feelings. They should never operate on us in a contested election. We do not know how soon our own turns may come. Therefore let us approach this question divested of all partisan feeling, with the single aim of arriving at a correct result; and let our votes be governed accordingly. I am totally at a loss to know how the gentleman from Illinois arrives at the conclusion that neither of these gentlemen are entitled to a seat here. I think that the evidence conclusively shows that one or the other is entitled; and if the rule of law which has governed me is the correct rule, the sitting member must retain his seat.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If no one else desires to speak upon this subject, I propose to address the House upon the pending question, and to close the debate. While I have as little interest or feeling in the result of the contest of these parties as any one who has spoken, the debate which has occurred here to-day has more and more satisfied me of the correctness of the position taken by me in the "views" which I had the honor to submit to the House as a minority on the Committee of Elections. The two sides being so wide apart, giving reasons for their opinions so different from each other, being unable to find any common ground upon which to stand, it seems to me that the only safe resort for a decision in so doubtful a case is to the tribunal to which I propose to refer it.

Some gentlemen have expressed themselves as unable to comprehend how it is that I have been unable to see this case as they see it, while they themselves are as wide asunder as the poles in their own views of the question presented. If these gentlemen had paid attention to the humble attempt at reasoning which I have made in my report, it seems to me that they would not have had cause to mistrust the soundness of the conclusions to which I have arrived, or the arguments upon which they are based. I stated some time since, in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER,] that, if I took the ground which he has taken, I would be compelled to hold that the sitting member had the best of the question. I hold with him that, before a contestant can be admitted to a seat held by a sitting member, the contestant must show a better right to the seat than he who holds it. This is undoubtedly requisite. But for the purposes of this contest, I consider them as standing on equal ground; and while it might be easier to shirk the responsibility of a decision by allowing the sitting member to hold his seat, I cannot do it, because I am not satisfied that he is entitled to it. I am unwilling to assume that the sitting member has any advantage conferred upon him, by holding the certificate, superior to the person who is contesting the legality of his election. To assume such premises is equivalent to offering a premium for fraud, force, intimidation, violence, or any means which unscrupulous candidates or party zealots may choose to employ to obtain possession of the certificate of election. If by such means a candidate obtains possession of the certificate, are you to insist that, when his right to hold it is brought in question, fraud is to strengthen his right? If he has done wrong, shall he have the advantage of his wrong? I am not disposed to look at the question with any such degree of regard for the holder of the certificate as to consider him as having a paramount claim or superior rights over the other. I look upon them as equal in rights, and equal in position; and, upon scrutinizing the testimony, and finding myself at an utter loss to decide between the two contending parties, I come to the conclusion that the proper mode of decision is to refer it back to the constituency. This case is so peculiar, there is so much in the testimony of a circumstantial character; so much that is hearsay; so much that confuses and leaves an unsatisfactory impression on the mind, that the judgment is baffled and brought to a dead halt. At least it is unfortunately so with me; but my eight colleagues on the committee divide off, four and four, each full of confidence that they alone are right, and all who differ from them are wrong. I agree with them all, or I agree with each division that the other is in error; but, though I thus agree with all, I find that I receive little credit for it.

It has been so strongly contended that hearsay statements should be received as evidence to determine questions of contested elections; and as the law and practice in relation to such testimony are stated to be so much broader and stronger than I have supposed them to be, and so much in conflict with the opinions I have entertained, that I feel it to be my duty to refer to some of the points and arguments made in the debate, and endeavor to answer them.

It is contended that hearsay testimony is proper to be received, and sufficient to determine the legality of votes cast at elections; and it is alleged that it has been uniformly so decided by committees of elections of the House of Commons, in England, for hundreds of years, and by committees of elections of the House of Representatives from the earliest cases down to the present time. That part of the members of the committee who favor the right of the contestant to the seat, say in their "views":

"The admissibility of evidence consisting of the declarations of voters as to any matter concerning their own voting, has been settled in the British Parliament repeatedly and uniformly for one hundred and fifty years, and is no longer to be questioned. These decisions are to be found in the numerous volumes of reported election cases and of treatises upon this subject. This rule has been recognized also in approved books of law: 3 McCord's Reports, 233, note; Phillips's Evidence, with Cow and Hill's notes, 322. It is sometimes treated as an exception to the rule, excluding the hearsay declarations of third persons; but generally it is put upon the ground that in elections, contested because of illegal votes being received, each voter challenged is a party to the proceeding, and, therefore, whatever he says about his own voting is an admission or confession. In Congress, also, while the undersigned find several precedents distinctly adopting or recognizing the rule, they find none where it has been decided the other way, except in Newland vs. Graham, 1835-36. Against this they refer to the following: Contested Elections, 80, 280, 272, 282, 258, 367, 750; the broad-seal case, 1840, 3 House Reports, No. 541, pp. 699, 749; Farley vs. Runk, 1845-46, and Monroe vs. Jackson, 1847-48. In England, as in some of the States of this Union, the voting being viva voce, a class of declarations continually occurring in States where elections are by ballot, are there, of course, almost unknown. We refer to declarations by voters as to how they voted. One case, however, accidentally occurred in Parliament where the poll list did not show for whom the party had voted, and so his statement as to how he intended to vote, made to a third person, was allowed to be given in evidence: the Windsor case, 1807; P. and O. election cases, 173. No distinction has been set up in this country, nor do the undersigned perceive any; both are but hearsay, and the latter affects the party as much and in the same way as the former; and as the voter cannot be compelled to testify as to his qualifications, so neither can he as to how he voted."

This statement of the law of evidence, as applied to contested elections, must be shown to be correct, or the conclusion to which that portion of the committee have arrived is erroneous. Is the statement correct? and if so, does it show the establishment of a rule applicable to this case?

Nearly all the cases referred to in the contested elections in England refer to the qualifications of the voters alone. The votes there are given viva voce; and the register lists and poll-books show the names and residences of the voters, and the names of those for whom the votes are cast; leaving the question of qualification as the only one that can ordinarily arise in contests for seats in the House of Commons. Those who are entitled to vote in the counties in England are "freeholders having land or tenements to the value of forty shillings a year above all charges, &c. Copyholders or of any other tenure than freehold, whether of inheritance or for life, to the value of ten pounds, above rents and charges, &c. Lessees or assignees for a term originally created for sixty years or more, value ten pounds; for twenty years or more, value fifty pounds above rents and charges," &c. In the boroughs, including cities and towns, the qualifications are different; but in all, the possession of certain property interests are requisite; and in questions that have arisen in England as to the qualifications of voters, in most cases it has directly related to their existing interest in property. And proceeding upon the presumption that a man will not make a confession or declaration against his pecuniary interest, it is true, that many cases are reported in the English books when the statements of the voter against his interest have been received to exclude his vote.

There are also decisions there against the admissibility of such statements, but the general current is in favor of their reception. But it will be clearly seen that the statement of a person against his possession, or right of possession, of a tangible, existing, valuable interest or estate, and by which his possession or right of possession may be lost, is a very different matter from the loose and often foolish talk of persons who may not be even aware of the import or consequences of what they say, or may mean the reverse of the construction placed upon their words by the hearer. Then the hearer himself may have lost, misapprehended, or forgotten some of the words used, and inferences may be drawn from them woefully erroneous. You once establish such a rule, and every illegal voter can, by making a false statement in the presence of a witness, make it appear that he voted directly the reverse of the fact; and while he, in truth, voted for you will deduct his vote from B. In this country, where almost every one has a voice at the polls, it is doing, in my judgment, violence to reason, to hold that admissions and declarations here, as to the qualifications of voters, more especially those made before and after voting, are to be placed upon the same footing as in England, where the admissions and declarations are against the pecuniary interest of the party making them, or where, relating to the question of bribery, they go to the effect of attaching to him who makes them the severest disgrace—a disqualification forever from voting, and extreme penal consequences. There is no similarity or analogy in the condition of things that ought to make the decisions there authority here. Declarations or admissions made at the polls, when the act of voting is performed, may often, with the greatest propriety, be admitted as a part of the res gestæ. There is but one case which I have found in the English decisions, where the statements of a party, as to whom he had voted for, were ever received in evidence, and that is the Windsor case; but that was received because neither party objected, and cannot be cited as a precedent. The cases cited in Ph. Ev. Con. and H., note 322, and taken from 3 McCord R., note 233, and they, in turn, from the English cases cited, which I have attempted to show have no analogy to our condition of things here. So much for these authorities and precedents.

As to the view that "each voter challenged is a party to the proceeding," it may be that where there is evidence of record, or directly establishing that a person voted, and for whom he voted, his declarations at the polls, or coupled with all the circumstances surrounding him, may be admitted, its weight and effect to be determined in each case as it arises. Where it is proved that a person voted, and for whom he voted, he may be, in one sense, said to be a party with him for whom he voted, and, so far, a party to the proceeding; but it is begging the whole question to assume that a person voted, that he voted for a given candidate—and that his vote is illegal, and, by this assumption, make him a party to the proceeding, for the sake of getting his declarations, and then bring in a third person and prove what they are, and, by this process, strike a vote from the poll. This process is too subtle and too dangerous for my approbation.

But in the foregoing extract of the "views" of the friends of the contestant, it is stated that these alleged English decisions have been recognized and followed in this country; and as cases in point, were cited to "Contested Elections," pages 80, 260, 272, 282, 258, 367, 750; the broad-seal case, 3 Howard Reports, 1840, pages 699, 749; Farlee vs. Runk, 1845-46; and Monroe vs. Jackson, 1847-48. This is a formidable array of authorities, and if they sustain the view taken, they ought to be entitled to great respect, if not allowed to control our decision. The case cited on page 80 is that of Trigg vs. Preston, and on page 80 nothing is found upon the subject of hearsay testimony, except a speech of a member of the House, who argued in favor of Trigg; but the House decided against him, his report, and his argument. This, it would seem, is not very binding authority in favor of hearsay testimony. The next case, 260, (Kelly vs. Harris,) contains not a word upon the subject of declarations, admissions, or hearsay evidence. The next, 272, (Easton vs. Scott,) I have examined with great care, but find nothing relating to this question of evidence—not one word; but after a long discussion, the House vacated the seat, and sent the parties back to their constituents—what I am asking shall be done in this case. Case page 282 is the same, Easton vs. Scott. The next, 258, (Barrett vs. Bayley,) has not a word upon the subject which I have been able to find by the most careful reading. The next, 367, (Reed vs. Cosden,) contains an argument by the sitting member (Cosden) in favor of receiving the declarations of voters in evidence; but the House seems not to have regarded it, for he was ejected from his seat, and it was given to the contestant, (Reed.) The last one cited from the Contested Election Cases, is that of 749, (Letcher vs. Moore.) The long report of this case, covering one hundred and thirty-five pages of the volume, shows the interest and zeal displayed in its contest. So far from this case favoring the doctrine stated, it is manifestly against it. The Committee of Elections, in that case,

"Resolved, That all declarations or statements made by voters after the election, relative to their rights of suffrage, be rejected."—Page 750.

But the committee in that case, in fact, went further, and rejected statements made before, as well as after, the election. (Vide testimony of Thomas Poole and others, page 835.)

But the case relied on so confidently to sustain the admissibility of hearsay evidence, is the broad-seal case, 1839-40. It will be observed that, in making the report in that case, it was concurred in by the members of the party having the majority, and dissented from by all the members of the minority of the committee; and whoever will take the trouble to examine, and compare the testimony with the present, will find this celebrated committee ruling both ways upon the same sort and grade of evidence.

But, Mr. Speaker, I deny that even that case sustains the doctrine contended for. The majority of the committee held that it was erroneous to hold the voter as a party to the proceeding except at the polls, and they declare on page 695 of the report, that "mere hearsay declarations of the alleged voter as to the fact of his having voted have been uniformly rejected." The only language used by the committee in their report in that case, which at all looks in the direction of the admissibility of hearsay evidence, is found on page 699, where it said:

"Although in numerous instances the voter being examined as a witness, voluntarily disclosed the character of his vote, yet in many cases, he either did not appear, or, appearing, chose to avail himself of his legal right to refuse to answer in that point. In such cases the proof of general reputation, as to the political character of the voter, and as to the party to which he belonged at the time of the election, has been considered sufficiently demonstrative of the complexion of his vote. When no such proof was adduced on either side, proof of the declarations of the voter has been received, the date and all the circumstances of such declarations being considered as connecting themselves with the questions of credibility and sufficiency. In every instance where the proof under all the circumstances was not sufficient to produce conviction, the vote has been left unappropriated."

This statement amounts to very little. The committee adopt no rule, fix no principle, and leave nothing for precedent. They accept proof of "declarations being considered as connecting themselves with questions of credibility and sufficiency," and when these were "not sufficient to produce conviction, the vote has been left unappropriated." Conviction in whom? Conviction of what? What may convince one mind of one thing, may convince another mind otherwise. It will be seen that nothing is settled here. But if we look at the ruling of the committee, we shall find that in most cases they reject this hearsay and doubtful testimony. I turn at random and take the vote of A. P. Brink. The whole evidence concerning his vote is found on pages 200, 201, 205. Samuel Price swears:

"I know Andrew P. Brink. After the election of 1838, (I think the same day,) saw Andrew P. Brink and James H. Brink, his brother, in my fulling-mill. James told him he had voted when he was not twenty-one. Andrew appeared to be angry, and told his brother he knew he lied. James is the elder brother. I thought James was teasing him at the time. I act with the Democratic party. It is said James H. Brink is a Whig. He professes to be such. In political sentiments, A. P. Brink is with the Administration party. Do not know whether or not I have heard him say how he voted, but from what I know, I have no doubt he voted an Administration ticket."

Alpheus Gusten swears that A. P. Brink voted as appeared by the poll list.

James H. Scribe swears:

"I do not know what are the sentiments of A. P. Brink, except by reputation. I believe him to belong to the Administration party."

James H. Brink swears:

"I am elder brother of A. P. Brink. I am not positive as to his age, nor can I tell the month he was born. I was of opinion he was not of age at the election of 1838, and told him so at that time. I have told him so since. When I talked to him, he would not give me any satisfaction. On the morning of the election I talked with him. Judge Price came to the fulling-mill, where we worked, and talked to us about voting. I then said Andrew P. Brink and Samuel A. Price were not of age, and not entitled to vote. There was a good deal said which I cannot repeat. Andrew P. Brink said he was going to vote the Administration ticket; but I do not know that he voted it—I do not know that he voted at all. I have talked with him since, and, from his conversation, I have no doubt he voted an Administration ticket. It was the common talk among the men at the mill that Samuel A. Price and Andrew P. Brink were both minors at the time. They did not pretend to deny it. I will be twenty-five the 11th of July next. There is a sister next me, and older than Andrew. I do not know her age. Andrew is next to her."

This is all the evidence relating to this voter. One would suppose, if hearsay evidence and circumstantial testimony could prove a vote bad, this would be sufficient; but by turning to page 47 of the Journal, when the committee decided on the question of deducting this vote, Messrs. Fillmore, Smith, and Botts, voted ay; and Messrs. Rives, Brown, and Mr. Chairman, no—so the vote was retained and held good. So will be found almost every instance, in this "broad-seal case;" and when these decisions are otherwise, they are made by a strict party vote, and thus lose their force as precedents. Thus much for this authority. I can find nothing in it to support the views advanced in favor of this hearsay testimony.

There are but two cases remaining, that of Farlee vs. Runk, and Monroe vs. Jackson. In the former case, it turned upon the legality of certain votes cast by the students of Princeton college. The minority were in favor of hearing evidence of the declarations of the voters; the majority of the committee express no opinion upon the point. It will be seen, also, by the evidence, that it turned more upon the proof, the party to which the voters belonged, than upon their declarations. The House, by the casting vote of the Speaker, decided to retain Mr. Runk in his seat, and against the recommendation of the minority, who were in favor of receiving hearsay testimony. This would seem an authority against the rule, and not one in its favor.

In the latter case of Monroe vs. Jackson the subject of hearsay testimony is alluded to, both by the majority and minority; but it was no where settled and decided. The whole case turned upon the vote of certain paupers; the proof as to how they voted was purely circumstantial, and not hearsay; and it resulted in declaring the seat vacant, and remanding the election back to the people. These are the authorities relied upon for establishing this dangerous rule; but, in my opinion, they settle the question strongly against it. This conclusion, it seems to me, settles this case fully, so far as to show the contestant not entitled to the seat.

The laws in New Jersey and Ohio are very similar for making and preserving a copy of the poll-books. They are as accessible in one State as in the other; yet, in the New Jersey case, the committee broadly declare that they have in every case rejected evidence of the declarations of voters, as to the fact of their having voted at the election; and this must have been for the reason that the poll-books furnished the best evidence of the fact.

Mr. LAMAR. I have this to say in respect to that citation: that the majority of the committee and the minority of the committee say, in unmistakable language, that they have received evidence of the declarations of voters as to the complexion of their votes. It is true they say they have uniformly rejected hearsay declarations as to the fact of a vote; but my only way of reconciling that seeming inconsistency is, that they reject hearsay evidence of a declaration. If the witness will not swear directly himself to the fact, they reject hearsay declarations as to the fact. The declaration of a voter is one thing; but when you speak of hearsay declarations, you must speak of a declaration proved by hearsay evidence. It is that which is meant by hearsay evidence. That is the state of facts. They did receive the declarations of the voter himself as to his vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does not the gentleman discover, by referring to this report, the very reason of the rule, that so long as the poll-books were open for inspection, they rejected hearsay evidence upon facts which were susceptible of being proven by record evidence?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The fact is nevertheless stated by this committee in the New Jersey case, that they have uniformly rejected the statement of the voter as to the fact of his having voted. Now, sir, that is the rule which was established by them, and it is a rule which ought to govern us now. I think it an important and useful rule. In the case now under consideration, there is no proof that many of those voters whose rights are questioned, did, in fact, vote, except the statements of other witnesses. Under the rule, this testimony should be rejected, because other and better evidence could have been procured. And in the New Jersey case, so confidently relied upon by my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] I have already shown that it did not turn upon hearsay testimony; and when the legality of a vote was determined, it was from circumstantial, and not hearsay evidence; and even that, they think, should be received with great caution. They take all the circumstances into consideration, and reject the evidence where it does not produce conviction.

Now, a word in regard to these negro votes. It seems to me that there is no testimony satisfac-

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MAY 25, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 147.

tory to the mind of any one as to how those negroes voted—admitting that they were illegal votes—with one exception, and possibly three others. The testimony is extremely frail, and entirely circumstantial. This man Anderson swears substantially that all he knew is derived from the statement of his mother—he presumes she had one fourth part African blood in her veins; that his mother's father was white, and her mother Indian or African, and that the father of witness was a white man, and that witness voted for Campbell. He also swears that there is a visible admixture of African blood in Redmond, and he believes Redmond voted for Campbell. He also swears he believes Mitchell voted for Campbell, and that there is no visible admixture of African blood in him, (page 121.) Milliken swears (page 105) that there was a visible admixture of African blood in them all.

Mollineaux swears that John D. Robbins, Alexander Proctor, Thomas Tester, Ephraim S. Jones, Evan Hoffman, Arthur Hoffman, Cyrus H. Cowan, Robert Goings, W. Griffith, William Lawrence, W. Huffman, and Alfred Huffman, voted at the election. That they are mulattoes and persons of color. He saw two of the Huffmans vote. Robbins told him he voted; and the others, he knew, by the poll-books, to have voted. Those he saw vote came up by themselves. The Democrats bitterly opposed their voting. The Republicans favored it. The friends of Campbell, as far as he knew, favored their voting. He did not see any of them challenged. He heard a man say he did challenge their votes; knew nothing of any opposition to their voting except that he opposed it himself "outside in conversation, and heard others oppose it in conversation. Supposes they were challenged by persons inside, but did not see it personally."

Ringwood swears:

"I know John D. Robbins, Alexander Proctor, Thomas Tester; I know the Huffmans, but could not distinguish them by name; I think there are five; four of them I believe voted; I know Cyrus H. Cowan, William Griffith, and William Lawrence; they are all of mixed negro blood."

"Question 182. State whether you were present when any of these persons voted, or saw them offer to vote."

"Answer. I did not see them hand their tickets in; I believe they were all challenged, from the fact that we, the friends of Vallandigham, had made an arrangement to have Dr. Garver inside at the polls for the express purpose of challenging these identical men, as well as others whom we could learn were not entitled to vote."

"Question 183. State what part the friends of Campbell took with regard to these mulattoes voting."

"Answer. They took the usual part that men do at elections to get up their friends to vote. So far as my knowledge extends, (and I saw three or four go up to the polls,) they were attended to the polls by the friends of L. D. Campbell. One of them, Mr. Lawrence, in conversation with me, admitted that he voted for L. D. Campbell for Congress, and advocated his election. Cyrus Cowan told me, yesterday or the day before, that he had been forced to go to the polls to vote by John A. Gage, (John A. Gage is a very violent party man, and friend of L. D. Campbell.) I saw Gage come to the polls with Cowan, and urging him to vote."

"Question 184. State whether these mulattoes and persons of color whom you have named are persons of a visible mixture of negro blood?"

"Answer. According to my opinion, they are; they are so admitted generally in the community, and also by the judges of election. The matter was discussed before the judges; the judges decided that these persons had a right to vote, because they were more than half white."

"Question 185. How many of the judges of that election were political friends of Mr. Campbell, and how many were friends of Vallandigham?"

"Answer. I cannot say positively; I think two of them voted for Campbell. J. D. KINGWOOD."

"Zachariah W. Selby, of lawful age, being first duly sworn, as hereinafter certified, deposeth and saith:

"Question 186. State whether you have examined the poll books on file in the clerk's office of Butler county, Ohio, of the election held in Oxford township, in said county, on the 14th day of October, 1856, and if so, state whether said poll-books show that John D. Robbins, Alexander Proctor, Thomas Tester, E. S. Jones, Evan Hoffman, Arthur Huffman, Cyrus H. Cowan, Robert Goings, W. Griffith, William Lawrence, W. Huffman, and Alfred Huffman, voted at that election?"

"Answer. I have examined the poll-books of that township for that election, and I find therein the names of those persons as voters at that election. Z. W. SELBY."

Here now, Mr. Speaker, is all the testimony upon which it is sought to strike sixteen votes from the poll of Mr. Campbell. Admitting, for argument, that these persons were all illegal voters under the law of Ohio, I ask where is the evidence that these men voted for Campbell, except the statement of Anderson, as to his own vote, and his opinion or belief as to Redmond and Mitchell? No one is proved to have challenged them at the polls, and nothing is elicited except a wrangle outside and away from the polls, which these mulattoes did not even hear, or hear of, as to their rights. When three or four went to the polls they were attended by the friends of Campbell. How attended? Did the friends of Campbell aid them in getting in their votes; or were they going to the polls at the same time only? Ringwood says one of them (Mr. Lawrence) told him that he had voted for Campbell. Why were they not called as witnesses, as was Anderson? It is not alleged that they could not be had. Why leave these votes in uncertainty and call upon us to decide how they voted, with no guide to our opinions but our political attachments and prejudices?

I emphatically condemn this process of determining who are members of this House. We may, like the mulatto Anderson, presume that they voted for Campbell—or Vallandigham. The presumption would depend upon the peculiar feelings which we entertain, or which pervade the community in which they live. But are we to decide an important election case, which involves the rights of a whole constituency, upon our mere opinions, formed without evidence, and without any testimony whatever? I cannot, and will not, do it. If other gentlemen can satisfy their minds and consciences that it is right to do so, the case is with them. I take no such responsibility. Out of these fifteen or sixteen mulatto votes, there are some eleven or twelve concerning whose votes no attempt is made to show whether they were for Campbell or Vallandigham; and an attempt to deduct them from either the one or the other is not, in my judgment, warranted by the evidence.

There are ten other votes which are not shown to my mind as being illegal, or for whom they were cast, to justify me in their rejection—they are those of Palmer, Fisher, Foster, Levi Neus, Coble, Sharpe, Line, Maxwell, and Gosline. Some are said to be aliens, some idiots, some non-residents of the county, and some non-residents of the State. I have neither time nor inclination to scan the testimony relating to each. It seems, in each case, to be either inadmissible, contradictory, or insufficient. There are others where the testimony strongly tends to show that they were not legal voters, and that they ought to be deducted from Campbell's poll; but the testimony is not clear nor satisfactory. They are the votes of Norris, Smith, Davis, Foulan, Gilliland, and Hall. The conclusion to which the mind would arrive, in considering the legality of these votes, would be apt to turn upon the rule adopted as the test of legal evidence and the predisposition of the judgment upon the question at issue. I will refer to one case as an illustration of the whole; and it is one of the strongest cases in the list—that of Gilliland. Here is the evidence, p. 110:

"Alexander Sterrett, sr., of lawful age, being by me first duly sworn, as hereinafter certified, deposeth and saith:

"Question 48. State whether you were present at the election held in Ross township, Butler county, on the 14th day of October, 1856, for the election of Congressman for the third congressional district of Ohio; if so, state whether Luther Gilliland and James Paine voted at that election, and if so, for whom did they vote?"

"Answer. I was present at that time and place on the day of that election. Luther Gilliland and James Paine did vote at that election; they voted for Lewis D. Campbell for Congress."

"Cross-examination."

"Question 51. Did you see the tickets voted by James Paine and Luther Gilliland at that election?"

"Answer. I did; I saw the name of L. D. Campbell on the tickets."

This testimony is direct and positive. Now as to his qualifications:

"William C. Morris, of lawful age, having been by me first duly sworn, as hereinafter certified, deposeth and saith:

"Question 154. State whether you were a judge of the election held in October, 1856, in Ross township, Butler county, Ohio, for Congressman, and if so, state whether James Paine and Luther Gilliland voted there at that election?"

"Answer. I was a judge of the election held at that time and place; James Paine and Luther Gilliland voted for Congressman then and there."

"Question 156. When did Luther Gilliland come into Ross township, Butler county, and when did he leave it?"

"Answer. He came a day or two before the election and staid a day or two after. I mean the congressional election. He had been making his home, I understood, previous to that in Warren county, in this State. After he left he went back to Warren county, and has not been back to Ross township since, that I know of."

"Cross-examination."

"Question 158. How do you know when Luther Gilliland came into Ross township?"

"Answer. He told us under oath, when sworn on the day of the congressional election, that he had come into the township a day or two previous. He claimed that he had no other residence, and had always considered that his home."

"Question 159. How do you know where he went to after the election?"

"Answer. Only from what his friends said, and his own declaration that he was going there."

"Question 160. Do you not know that Ross township was his place of residence, or that he made his home there?"

"Answer. He had not for three or four months before the election. I know this from having been in Venice every week, and was told there that he was in Warren county at work at his trade. His parents live in Venice. He is a single man. WILLIAM C. MORRIS."

The reason for rejecting this vote must be, (if any there is,) that the voter was a non-resident of the county, and he is so classed in the report favoring the contestant. Now let us inquire into the matter. This election was held on the 14th day of October, 1856; and, under the laws then existing, appended to the argument filed by contestant, and published with the reports, is a note, (see pages 57-58,) as follows:

"Note.—Prior to the session of the Legislature in 1857, no fixed period of residence in a county, ward, or township, was required as a qualification for electors. Any person moving into a county on the day of election even, and declaring that he had come in for the purpose of making the county his home, was allowed to vote. Such cases were of frequent occurrence. Residents of other counties and districts, usually unmarried men, 'light to run away;' were many times brought in to work at some trade or business until after the election; and under a facile conscience and a loose administration of the law were procured and permitted to vote. Thus 'pipe-laying'—colonizing—was an easy and not an uncommon thing; and to prove the offense next to impossible. This sad defect in the election laws of the State was remedied at the last session of the Legislature, and a thirty days' residence in the county is now required."

Now, here is the law stated by the contestant himself. The voter swore he "had always considered that his home," and his vote was admitted by the judges as a legal vote; and was so by the law, as stated by the contestant. This is one of the strongest cases in this list, and in the "views" which I submitted, if I have erred, it is in favor of the contestant. It seems, on the most liberal view, to stand thus:

Returned vote of Campbell	9,338
Add three votes improperly rejected	3
	9,341

Deduct votes of George, Rice, Sage, Heikes, Sorbray, W. H. Houghton, White, Wright, Payne, Donaldson, Ayres, Morris, Morrison, Bolton, and Backston, (conceded,)	15
Also, Walk, Tate, Anderson, Odlin, Hartman, W. Lamb, Drayer, and Orden	8
Also, (as claimed,) the votes of Anderson, Mitchell, Lawrence, and Redmond	4
Also, Norris, Smith, Davis, Foulan, Gilliland, and Hall, (all doubtful,)	6 33

	9,308
Returned vote of Vallandigham	9,319
Add votes improperly rejected	3

Deduct votes of Brewner, Tehan, Forney, Friday, Landis, Ryder, King, Roac, Dennis, Richmond, Freidline, S. Wolf, and Rea	13
	9,300
Majority in favor of Vallandigham	1

In this estimate I deduct from Campbell several votes that can hardly be claimed as illegal. Then there are other votes which the contestant claims should be deducted from Campbell's poll, for which I can see no grounds whatever; yet I may be in error, and it is not impossible that those from whom I differ are in error. If gentlemen can, from this evidence, satisfy themselves that Campbell should be turned out, and the contestant have his seat, I cannot. I am equally in doubt as to the right of the sitting member. These votes which are questioned were admitted at the polls; and no rule is better established in contested elections than that a vote passed upon and admitted by the judges is to be held good until it is proved (not supposed or presumed) to be bad. It is a dangerous precedent to set, to permit the statements of voters, not on oath, to unsettle and supplant members holding certificates of election; for every one knows that statements as to how a party intends to vote, or has voted, are often made the reverse of the fact.

It is not unusual to refer cases of contested election back to the people. Such was the action of the House in 1792, in the case of Jackson vs. Wayne; in 1806, in McFarland vs. Culpepper; in 1817, in Easton vs. Scott. In 1823, in Adams vs. Wilson, the Committee of Elections reported a resolution declaring the seat vacant, "it being doubtful, from the evidence, who ought to have been returned," &c. This report was not concurred in by the House. In 1833, in Letcher vs. Moore: in the debate upon this case Mr. Wise said:

"The uncertainty in this case did not lie in the constitution or laws, but in the facts of the case. Upwards of six hundred votes had been polled, and yet the question was reduced, according to some gentlemen, to a difference of twelve disputed votes." "There was a mass of conflicting testimony which rested in comparative credibility, of which the House could not judge. The most certain, the most proper, the most republican mode to settle the question was to send it back to the people."

In 1836, in Newland vs. Graham; in 1837-38, in Prentice and Wood vs. Gholson and Claiborne; in 1849-50, in Miller vs. Thompson; and in 1855-56 in Archer vs. Allen. These cases are sufficient as precedents and as authority; and in the case now under consideration, where there is so much doubt and uncertainty, it seems to me the only just decision that can be made will be by the people themselves from whom these contesting parties come.

The Journals of this House show too many decisions of contests like this, where they have been made by strict party votes. Such records go far to weaken the confidence of the people, if not our own confidence, in the impartiality and integrity of this body. It is far better, in cases where there is reasonable doubt of the result, to refer it to the people. Neither the contestant nor sitting member should fear to go to that bar. There let us send it.

I have no feeling in the world, so far as I can judge, between these parties, which influences my judgment. Politically they have been with the contestant; but I cannot escape the consciousness, that if I am forced to vote in favor of either, to the exclusion of the other, I shall do violence to my own sense of right and justice. I have, in reviewing this question, discarded all technicalities and all considerations except such as reach directly to the merits of the controversy. To these let the inquiry be confined, and by them let it be settled, either here or by the people of the third congressional district of Ohio.

I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of debate only.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the year ending June 30, 1859.

Mr. DURFEE. Mr. Chairman, representing, as I do, a constituency which is largely interested in manufactures, trade, and commerce, and whose industrial pursuits have been stricken as with a paralysis, and now languish in almost hopeless depression for the want of that aid and sustenance which they are entitled to, and should receive, from a wise, stable, and judicious policy of national legislation, I feel constrained by a sense of duty to those whom I represent in this body, to raise my voice in earnest entreaty that some measure may be adopted, ere we separate and return to our homes, that shall restore animation and healthful vigor to the different branches of business in the country, now so depressed.

Many months (almost the entire session, thus far) have been consumed in discussing a single subject, while the entire business portion of the community have been struggling and suffering, unheeded, and apparently uncared for by us, who have had it in our power at any time to adopt measures that would at once dispel the gloom and depression that now weigh upon the minds of business men, cheer their hearts, nerve their arms, and send them once more bounding forward in a career of activity and enterprise, such as we have witnessed in times past.

Our constituents have all this time been patient, because they have been hopeful. They have looked anxiously for the time when we should dispose of the all-absorbing Kansas question, confident that when that was out of the way Congress could not so far fail in its duty as not immediately to turn its attention to "the state of the Union," and set about doing something to restore its prostrate energies and give an impetus to the now almost stationary wheels of industry.

Sir, if it is not our duty, as a national legislative body, to look to the great national interests of finance, trade, commerce, and manufactures—to remove whatever causes may operate to depress or to paralyze them—then I must confess I can see little use in our meeting here, and I have been brought up in a school that has taught me most erroneous notions as to the duties of this body; and I cannot but think that the people, at least in that portion of the Union with which I am more especially acquainted, will come to the same conclusion. They have long since formed the opinion that those who constitute this body are more intent upon making speeches than in endeavoring "to promote the general welfare," and I fear we are about to give them further reason for entertaining such an opinion. We have passed a joint resolution to adjourn on the 7th of June, which is now near at hand; and yet, what have we done? or what have we time to do, if we adjourn then, to set the great machinery of business, now standing almost idle, again in active motion? What answer can we give to our constituents, when, on returning to our homes, they ask us what great measure we have originated and perfected, having for its object the relief of the country, now so depressed in her financial, manufacturing, and commercial interests? We can tell them, to be sure, that we spent a great deal of time in endeavoring to enlighten them in regard to the attempt of the Administration and its supporters to force upon the people of Kansas a constitution conceived in sin, brought forth in iniquity, and covered all over with fraud—a constitution in the formation of which the people had had no voice, and were not permitted to say whether they liked it or detested it.

In doing that, their reply may be, "you have but done your duty; though you took an unnecessarily long time for it." But having disposed of that subject, why not turn your attention to the "state of the Union," and inquire whether the country was in a state of prosperity? whether our commerce was in a healthy and thrifty condition? whether, in every department of industry, the people were doing an active and remunerating business? and whether prosperity and contentment everywhere pervaded the land?

I must confess, Mr. Chairman, I shall, for one, hardly know how to give my constituents a satisfactory answer to these questions. I can only exonerate myself by saying that as far as my feeble voice could be heard, urging action upon these important subjects, it was heard; but, had I been endowed with the eloquence, and could have sounded the clarion notes of a Clay, my voice would have fallen on deaf ears and indifferent hearts.

There are but few subjects now that statesmen of the present prevailing school of doctrinaires deem it constitutional for Congress to act upon. The first is appropriations—that is to say, such appropriations, and such only, as the Federal Executive may demand. These include, first, appropriations for the support of the President, his Cabinet, foreign ministers, heads of bureaus, clerks, &c., collectors of customs, and, indeed, all such as "look to the Executive," and are dependent on him for their respective shares of "the spoils of office;" second, appropriations for the Army and Navy; third, appropriations for Congress; fourth, appropriations for the public buildings in Washington and various cities of the country; and last, though not least, appropriations for the public printing, binding, engraving, &c., which amounts, annually, to the little item of two or three millions.

The second subject deemed a constitutional one for Congress to act upon, is the abrogation of fishing bounties; third, the abrogation of treaties; fourth, the construction of a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean; and fifth, the granting of immense bodies of public lands indirectly to railroad companies in the States in which the lands lie; though it is not constitutional to distribute the proceeds of the public domain to all the States, whose common property it is.

As to a tariff, if it is to raise money to pay Federal officers, support the Army and Navy, or supply funds to be appropriated under any of the heads I have mentioned, it is a constitutional subject, according to the doctrinaires for Congress to act upon. But if, in the imposing of duties, an eye is turned to the effect they may have upon our own industrial interests, and they are so laid as that in raising sufficient revenue, they are made to furnish incidental protection to our manufactures, then it becomes, according to these sage statesmen, unconstitutional!

But, in stating what are now deemed constitutional and unconstitutional subjects of congressional legislation by this class of politicians, a general rule may be given by which the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of any given question or subject may be at once ascertained; it is this: if the legislation proposed is expected to benefit, or is desired by the South, or the Democratic party, it is constitutional; if it is desired by, or is expected to benefit the North, it is unconstitutional, even though it might promote the welfare of the whole nation.

This statement may seem to be rather hyperbolic, but, unfortunately for us, there is more truth than poetry or hyperbole in it. The time was when the South deemed "high protective duties" upon foreign goods, and especially upon all such as were manufactured of India cotton, promotive of her interests, and the interests of the nation; and then it was that "protection to domestic manufactures" became one of the articles of Democratic faith, a constitutional measure, and a favorite one with the American people generally. Under the lead of those eminent statesmen, Mr. Lowndes and Mr. Calhoun, of South Carolina, the celebrated minimum duties were laid, which gave the highest protection—protection being their object—ever given by any tariff act, not excepting that of 1828, denounced as "the bill of abominations."

But the minimum duties having performed their office—that of driving goods made of India cotton out of our markets—protection to cotton goods was no longer deemed necessary by the South; and from being a favorite and cherished policy, became in their eyes unconstitutional, odious, oppressive, and tyrannical—so oppressive and odious, indeed, as to cause South Carolina to calculate the value of the Union, resort to nullification, and threaten an armed resistance to the execution of the revenue laws of the United States in her ports. Fortunately for the country, there was, at that time, a Jackson in the White House and a Clay in the Capitol. The one stood ready to draw the sword, while the other succeeded in preventing so unnatural a conflict and the effusion of fraternal blood, by the passage of that harmonizing measure, the compromise tariff act of 1832.

During the first five or six years of the operation of that act, the country enjoyed a high degree of prosperity; but then came comparatively low duties, large importations, an inordinate expansion of the currency by the excessive issue of bank paper, ruinous speculations, high prices, large exportations of specie to pay for foreign goods, "the specie circular," the stoppage by the banks of specie payments, a general financial and commercial revulsion, and universal bankruptcy. For a few years the country was utterly prostrate; business of all kinds was at a stand; our cotton and woolen mills shut up; our laborers unemployed; and gloom settled upon the land. It was natural, in this state of things, that the people should look to Congress for relief. Nor did they look in vain. So low was our credit, that the Government was unable to obtain a small loan of twelve million dollars, either here or in Europe, and was compelled to resort to the use of Treasury notes, as it has done of late.

A better day soon dawned. The tariff act of 1842 was passed by a Whig Congress, and at once, as if by magic, our cotton and woolen mills again gave forth the cheerful hum of activity; the forge fires of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Maryland, and Virginia, were again lighted up; and everywhere the energies of the people were awakened; the wheels of industry put in rapid motion; animation, hope, and confidence, dispelled the gloom that had settled on the land; the mountains rejoiced, the valleys became vocal with the sound of the hammer and the cheerful song of the working man, and there were none to molest or make afraid.

Under the operation of this tariff, the United States reached the culminating point of prosperity, growing out of her industrial pursuits. Unfortunately for the American people, the tariff of 1842 was a Whig tariff; and because it was a Whig tariff, and a Whig measure was covering the country with blessings and benefits, it became obnoxious to the Democratic party, which came into power soon after, and pronounced sentence of death upon it, which was carried into execution by the passage of the act of 1846.

And then, too, the doctrine of "free trade" became permanently incorporated into the articles of Democratic faith; since which time, protection is held to be unconstitutional and heterodox—free trade constitutional and orthodox.

The country has now had ample experience of the operation of both systems—of the "American system," which seeks to protect our own labor and manufactures against the injurious competition of foreign labor; and of the low-duties system which discriminates against our own products, and in favor of foreign goods, which encourages large importations of foreign merchandise, to the utter prostration and ruin of our manufacturers, capitalists, and operatives. If any one desires to know the effect of the two systems, let him look at the condition of the United States under the operation of the tariff of 1842, and then at our present condition, under the operation of the tariff of 1846, as amended by the subsequent acts.

These will present a study for a statesman; and he who will honestly and earnestly investigate the subject, unblinded by prejudice or preconceived opinions, will not be long in arriving at just conclusions as to the causes which have brought about the present general prostration of trade, commerce, and the various branches of productive industry.

Sir, as nations are but an aggregation, or congregation, of individuals; their affairs are to be judged of, as we judge of those of a family. Whatever course of conduct or policy is calculated to promote the prosperity of the family is also calculated to promote the welfare of the nation.

It would seem to be but repeating a truism to say that that family which produces the most by the labor of its several members, and at the same time buys the least of its neighbors, especially of articles of luxury, and such as are calculated to minister to vanity, and breed idleness and extravagance, is sure to become the most prosperous, powerful, and wealthy.

On the other hand, that family whose members are either too proud or too lazy to work, who produce nothing, buy everything, and indulge in luxury and extravagance, whatever may have been their wealth, (accumulated by an industrious, wise, and prudent ancestor,) must ere long become involved in debt, and sink into poverty and insignificance—the inevitable consequence of idleness and extravagance.

And thus it is with nations: that which performs the greatest amount of productive labor—which is engaged in the greatest variety of industrial pursuits, so that the various branches may be enabled to interchange their respective productions with the least amount of transportation, and which also employs the largest amount of labor-saving machinery and steam-power, which relies most upon its own labor, and pays the smallest amount of specie for foreign merchandise in proportion to its population, and the amount of its exports—that nation will inevitably outstrip all others in the race of national power, wealth, prosperity, and importance.

To withhold from our own people that fostering care which they have a right to look for from a wise and considerate Government, and at the same time to give the industrial classes of other nations advantages over them in our own markets, and to expect them to win the race which is ever being contested between great nations, is to hamstring your own high-metled racer, and to expect him to outstrip the foreign horse that may be brought in competition with him upon the turf! The one would not be more unwise and cruel than the other. But such is the treatment our industrial and business classes have been, and are now, receiving at the hands of the Federal Government, controlled as it is, and has been for more than twelve years, by the free-trade doctrinaires, guided by the "platforms" or charts of modern Democracy, authoritatively and oracularly laid down, put together, and marked out by those well-known bodies of distinguished, learned, and experienced statesmen, profound jurists, and eminent scholars, which meet every four years for the purpose of revising, adding to, and amending the canons of Democracy, and nominating candidates for President and Vice President; and also by that other body, so distinguished for moderation, wisdom, and love of the Union, which meets annually, or semi-annually, to devise means to dissolve it!

Sir, it is sometimes profitable for statesmen and legislators to turn back the historic pages of their own country, and make themselves familiar with the ideas, feelings, opinions, hopes, and expectations of some of the most eminent men who have long since passed away; but whose actions and opinions as public men who gave direction to public opinion in their day and generation, must always command respect. I have said that, according to the canons of modern Democracy, protection and encouragement to our own labor and manufactures is unconstitutional and heterodox. The Constitution, as construed by these profound statesmen, gives Congress no power to promote the general welfare. Our manufactures may be depressed, or utterly ruined by the competition from abroad, and our operatives thrown entirely out of employment by the influx of foreign fabrics produced by the half-fed and half-paid labor of European or eastern countries; but there is no help for it. Congress has no constitutional power to protect the one or relieve the other by imposing such duties as would put a stop to such ruinous competition! Such is now the doctrine of "the Democratic party," and we have lately seen it semi-officially announced in the Union, the organ of the present Administration, that "the Democratic party is the Government, and must be sustained!"

But what were the opinions of those sages who framed the Constitution? A little time may not be unprofitably spent in referring to these, and allowing the distinguished dead to speak to us from the tomb.

The first act passed by Congress under the present Constitution—drawn up with great care, as is well known, by Mr. Madison, one of the leading members, if not the leading member, of the convention which formed the Constitution—is entitled "An act for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States."

Strange, that the very first Congress, composed as it was in no small part of the very men who had been the architects of the Constitution, should, at the very earliest moment, and by its first recorded act, violate that Constitution which the members had sworn to support, by usurping a power not conferred upon it, and that no patriotic or indignant voice was raised to protest against such a glaring usurpation! How unfortunate for the country that some of our modern Democrats and doctrinaires had not been born in time to raise their voices against such heterodoxy, and put Mr. Madison and his co-peers to shame and confusion!

The act thus passed by Congress, and proclaiming its unconstitutional purpose on its very front, was signed by George Washington, who, unfortunately, had not had an opportunity of reading the Constitution (which he also signed as President of the convention) by the brilliant light of modern Democracy which now illumines the Capitol, the White House, and the peripatetic convention periodically held in a part of the country considered not very promotive of the health of an Abolitionist!

That General Washington was a heretic, if tried by the canons of the doctors of the modern school of Democracy, will clearly appear from the following extract from his last annual message:

"Congress has repeatedly, and not without success, directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of too much consequence not to insure a continuance of their efforts, in every way which shall appear eligible. As a general rule, manufactures on public account are inexpedient; but where the state of things in a country leaves little hope that certain branches of manufacture will, for a great length of time, obtain, when these are of a nature essential to the furnishing and equipping of the public forces in time of war, are not establishments for procuring them on public account, to the extent of the ordinary demand for the public service, recommended by strong considerations of national policy? Ought our country to remain, in such cases, dependent on foreign supply?"

As Mr. Jefferson is still held up by those who profess the Democratic faith and belong to the Democratic church as the great teacher, leader, apostle, and founder of the Democratic party, it may not be amiss, Mr. Chairman, to bring him upon the stand, and let him tell us what his views and opinions were in regard to the authority of Congress to protect and encourage manufactures. Let us listen to the voice of "the sage of Monticello:"

"To cultivate peace, and maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises, to foster our fisheries, as nurseries of navigation and for the nurture of man, and to protect the manufactures adapted to our circumstances these, fellow-citizens, are the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings."

Surely such doctrine as this must sound strangely to the ear of a modern Democrat and doctrinaire! What, the apostle of Democracy himself a heretic? As soon would we have expected to discover that the great Hildebrand, Gregory VII., was guilty of heresy! But so it is, and here is further proof of the fact. In his eighth annual message, Mr. Jefferson said:

"The situation into which we have been forced has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to national manufactures and improvements. The extent of conversion is daily increasing, and little doubt remains that the establishments, formed and forming, will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and of protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent."

And, again: eight years after he had retired from the Presidency, in a letter to Mr. Benjamin Austin, of Boston, dated January 9, 1816, he thus gave emphatic expression to his views in regard to the encouragement and fostering of our domestic manufactures:

"To be independent for the comforts of life, we must fabricate them for ourselves—we must now place our manufacturers by the side of the agriculturist. The grand inquiry now is: shall we make our own comforts, or go without them at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures, must be for reducing us either to a dependence upon that nation, or be clothed in skins, and live like beasts, in dens and caverns. I am proud to say that I am not one of these. Experience has taught me that manufacturers are now as necessary to our independence as to our comfort."

Such, Mr. Chairman, were the opinions of the earliest apostle, and the founder of "Democracy in America." Not casually or hastily expressed, but deliberately put forth, written and proclaimed to his friends and the world. There they stand, recorded in the archives of the country, and can never be obscured, hidden, denied, explained away, or "expunged." Mr. Jefferson was not a man to preach one thing and practice another; and he therefore carried his preaching into practice, by clothing himself in the cloth of his own country. It was his pride to appear in garments of domestic manufacture; and in this respect set a praiseworthy and patriotic example to his countrymen and neighbors.

And what, Mr. Chairman, thought Mr. Madison, another apostle of Democracy, in regard to the constitutionality as well as the policy of Congress fostering and protecting domestic manufactures? I have already referred to and given the title of the first act passed by Congress, under the Constitution, drawn up, reported, and advocated by him, the avowed purpose of which was to encourage and protect our domestic manufactures. Let us now see what he had to say on this subject, twenty or twenty-five years after, when he spoke as President of the United States.

In a special message to Congress, May 23, 1809, he says:

"It will be worthy, at the same time, of their (Congress) just and provident care, to make such further alterations in the laws as will more especially protect and foster the several branches of manufactures which have been recently instituted or extended by the laudable exertion of our citizens."

Again, in his special message to Congress, May 31, 1814, he said:

"I recommend, also, as a more effectual safeguard, and as an encouragement to our growing manufactures, that the additional duties on imports, which are to expire at the end of one year after a peace with Great Britain, be prolonged to the end of two years after that event."

I could quote pages of similar sentiments from Mr. Madison, who, like Mr. Jefferson, showed his faith by his works, having been inaugurated in 1813 in an entire suit of clothes made of cloth manufactured in my own State; for which he was greatly commended by the whole nation. I shall not occupy my time by reading any further extracts from his messages, though I cannot forbear calling the attention of my Democratic friends to his letter to Mr. Joseph C. Calwell, of Virginia, dated September 18, 1823, upon "the constitutionality of the power in Congress to impose a tariff for the encouragement of manufactures." In that letter he says:

"That the encouragement of manufactures was an object of the power to regulate trade is proved by the use made of the power for that object in the first session of the first Congress under the Constitution, when among the members present were so many who had been members of the Federal Convention which framed the Constitution, and of the State conventions which ratified it; each of these classes consisting also of members who had opposed and who had espoused the Constitution in its actual form. It does not appear, from the printed proceedings of Congress on that occasion, that the power was denied by any of them; and it may be remarked that members from Virginia in particular, as well of the Anti-Federal as the Federal party—the names then distinguishing those who had opposed and those who had approved the Constitution—did not hesitate to propose duties, and to suggest even prohibitions in favor of several articles of her production. By one a duty was proposed on mineral coal, in favor of the Virginia coal pits; by another, a duty on hemp was proposed, to encourage the growth of that article; and by a third, a prohibition even of foreign beef was suggested as a measure of sound policy."

"A further evidence in support of the constitutional power to protect and foster manufactures by regulations of trade—is an evidence that ought of itself to settle the question—is the uniform and practical sanction given to the power by the Federal Government, for nearly forty years, with a concurrence or acquiescence of every State government, throughout the same period; and it may be added, through all the vicissitudes of party which marked the period. No novel construction, however ingeniously devised, or however respectable and patriotic its patrons, can withstand the weight of such authorities or the unbroken current of so prolonged and universal a practice."

So much for the opinion of Mr. Madison, one of the architects of the Constitution, a true patriot, and a statesman of large experience and comprehensive views; and now what said his friend and successor, the last of the revolutionary Presidents—Mr. Monroe? In his third annual message he said:

"It is deemed of great importance to give encouragement to our domestic manufactures."

In his sixth he said:

"Satisfied am I that there are other strong reasons, which impose on us the obligation to cherish and sustain our manufactures."

Mr. Chairman, I might well content myself with the quotations I have already made from "the fathers of the Republic," in support of the power of Congress to foster and protect, by discriminating duties, the manufactures of our country—a power which was never questioned by the framers of the Constitution. But, as I desire to hear what the great patron saint of modern Democracy has to say upon the subject—and, as there was one President only between him and Mr. Monroe, I will keep up the chain by presenting a passage of striking force from Mr. Adams's fourth annual message, and then come to General Jackson.

This is Mr. Adams's language:

"Is the self-protecting energy of this nation so helpless that there exists in the political institutions of our country no power to counteract the bids of foreign legislation; that the growers of grain must submit to the exclusion from the foreign markets of their produce, that the shippers must dismantle their ships, the trade of the North stagnate at the wharves, and the manufacturers starve at their looms, while the whole people shall pay tribute to foreign industry, to be clad in foreign garbs; that Congress and the Union are impotent to restore the balance in favor of domestic industry destroyed by the statutes of any realm?"

These pertinent questions, put with great force and directness, are well answered by the successor of Mr. Adams—General Jackson; who, in his second annual message, thus presents his views upon this great subject:

"The power to impose duties upon imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust these duties, with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry, is so completely identical with the power, that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction; saving the very inconsiderable reservation relative to the inspection laws. This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and consequently, if it be not possessed by the General Government, it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry, and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely cannot be the case; this indisputable power, thus surrendered by the States, must be within the scope of authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress. In this conclusion I am confirmed, as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who have each repeatedly recommended this right under the Constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people."

Thus, sir, have I presented, not only the opinions of the fathers of the Republic in regard to the power and policy of Congress protecting and nursing our domestic manufactures, but also the deliberate opinion of one whose opinions are never openly called in question by the party which holds his memory in the highest reverence; and these, I think, may be well set up against the strange doctrines now generally held by that party upon this subject. These latter seem to me to be too absurd for argument, or any attempt at refutation; and I cannot but think that the time will come when their absurdity and fallacy will appear so palpable and glaring to the people as to excite wonder that any one could ever have entertained such strange notions, or seriously maintained their soundness.

But whether sound or absurd, so long as they constitute in part the creed of modern Democracy, and are held to be binding upon all who profess the Democratic faith, and acknowledge the binding force of Democratic platforms, and the people think proper to keep that party in possession of the Government, thus giving it a controlling power over the legislation of the country, so long will the industrial interests of the country be suffered to languish in neglect, while, by our unwise and suicidal policy, we encourage foreign imports, by which we are impoverished, and foreign labor and manufacturers stimulated and encouraged by our folly and capital.

In most nations, Mr. Chairman, those questions which relate to finance and business, and which concern the prosperity of the active, industrious, producing classes, demand and receive the earliest attention of those who are placed as guardians over the common weal. If any one branch languishes, and those engaged in it suffer from stagnation, the cause is at once sought, and, if it can be, a remedy applied. But here, where our theory is that the interests of the people will not be overlooked or neglected by the Representatives of the people, we give ourselves little concern whether our laws are such as to promote the general prosperity, or whether they operate detrimentally to our trade, commerce, and manufactures.

Look, for instance, at our commerce: once we could boast that we possessed almost a monopoly of the carrying trade of the world; but how is it now? Do we perform the carrying for other nations now upon the ocean? By no means; and even a large share of the most valuable part of our own produce and goods is in the hands of other nations. Our commerce is dwindling down to insignificance, while that of our rival, England, is increasing in a most astonishing manner. And why is this? Because England is governed by far-seeing and enlightened statesmen, who, whatever party may be in or out of power, look to the prosperity of her great industrial departments, her agriculture, trade, manufactures, and commerce, and hesitate not to adopt such measures and pass such laws as the objects they have in view demand at their hands. They are quick to perceive and prompt to seize any advantage presented, or to profit by the blindness and obstinacy of those nations which pursue theories, rather than solid advantages. If, by spreading a net of mail steamers over every sea, and thereby gathering into her hands the most valuable portion of the carrying trade and commerce of the world, while we stand looking on as if indifferent, or asleep, thus yielding to her the rich harvests of commercial enterprise we once enjoyed, who is to be censured and who commended?

Mr. Chairman, we are often told that the present financial depression under which the country is suffering will soon pass away, and business will again revive, with all its wonted animation and activity. But, sir,

"Hope tells a flattering tale."

I wish I could believe this prediction, or see any reasonable ground for indulging in such a pleasing anticipation; but I cannot. What is to set the wheels of our cotton and woolen mills in motion? What inducement or protection against the ruinous competition of foreign goods, passed through our custom-houses by means of false oaths and fraudulent invoices, by the payment of one third, one half, or two thirds of the duties that ought to be levied upon them, and would be but for these custom-house frauds—what inducement or protection, I say, do you afford to the American manufacturer? None whatever. How, then, can it be expected that he will again put his spindles and looms in operation when he has to meet such competition in the markets of his own country; and when, too, the best fabrics he can manufacture are not considered worthy to be worn, even in the street, by his own countrywomen? Sir, I fear the day is still distant when we shall again hear the cheerful music of the spindle and the shuttle, and behold the smiling faces of active, industrious, and happy operatives swarming in and out of our cotton and woolen factories.

And, sir, can the farmers of the rich and boundless West expect a return of prosperous times while every branch of industry is paralyzed at the North and East? Where are they to find a market for their superabundant crops? Where are the mouths to consume, and the money to pay for their wheat, corn, flour, butter, cheese, and lard? Not among us; at least, so long as our people are compelled to remain inactive for want of a remunerating market for the products of our labor. He who cannot sell cannot buy; and he who cannot buy must contrive to live at the lowest possible rate of expenditure—dispensing with all luxuries, and depriving himself of even some of the comforts of life. Nor, Mr. Chairman, is this all. If those who have heretofore obtained a livelihood by their mechanical or manufacturing skill and industry, find that resource cut off, and are unable any longer to obtain employment in their accustomed avocations, they must abandon these and seek a livelihood in other departments of industry in agriculture, and in other and distant sections of the country.

Sir, we may indulge ourselves in flattering anticipations of returning prosperity, but all such hopes will be delusive, so long as, by our laws, we give advantages to foreign manufactured goods over our own, and thus enable the foreign manufacturer and importer to reap the harvests from our own fields. No European nation has now the folly to expose her own operatives and merchants to the operations of any such suicidal policy; fatal experience has taught them the fallacy of the free-trade doctrines now taught, but not practiced upon, by England; who owes all her wealth and commercial and manufacturing prosperity to her protective laws and her exclusive policy. But we cling to these fallacies, and practice upon English theories, manufactured for others, and not for home consumption; as we purchase and consume English goods, manufactured expressly for us. And, Mr. Chairman, so long as we do this, we may be nominally independent of her, but we are as much her colonies commercially, as we were when she would not permit even a nail to be manufactured here, but took all our raw material, and compelled us to purchase everything that was manufactured of her.

The President has informed us, that the cause of the commercial and financial revulsion, that has come upon us, was the over issue of the banks. Well, Mr. Chairman, if that is true, how does it happen that when that cause is removed, things do not return to their wonted activity? Instead of the banks overissuing now, they can get scarcely any paper to discount; and their capitals are lying comparatively idle in their vaults. Sir, this was not the cause, and therefore the cessation of all banking business is not the remedy. The cause is over trading, over buying; buying more than we can pay for; and buying of foreign nations instead of manufacturing for ourselves; employing foreign operatives instead of our own. And, sir, when this comes to be believed; when the true causes are clearly seen, then legislators and statesmen, will know where, and how, to apply a remedy that will remove the disease; and until the right remedy shall be applied, (and that remedy is the revision and amendment of your tariff laws) the disease may be tampered with, but can not be cured. Like causes, it is said, produce like effects, under like circumstances. Now, we have seen the country, once at least, in like circumstances as those by which she is now surrounded; and we then saw the most admirable and happy effects produced by the passage of the tariff of 1842. Why, then, would not a like remedy produce a like effect at the present time? Would it not be the part of wisdom, at least, to try and see?

But, Mr. Chairman, I have no hope that any remedy will be applied, or will be attempted to be applied, by the present Congress and by this Administration. We must therefore be patient, and bear our sufferings as best we may.

But, sir, as even the most unfortunate and depressed people have some consolation in their misery, so our people have theirs. In the first place, they have the consolation (which is a great one, indeed,) that they live under a Democratic Administration, and if they have not their entire share of its blessings and benefits, they know that the people of Kansas have. In the next place, they have the consolation of knowing that another House of Representatives is soon to be elected; and in the third place, that Presidents are elected every four years, and that, in a little more than half that period, they will have the "glorious privilege" of voting for another Chief Magistrate of this Union, and of choosing one who may deem it his duty to endeavor to promote the welfare of the whole nation, and not confine himself to the "searching operation" of distributing "the spoils of office" among his most noisy partisans.

With such consolations as these they may live, not as those who are wholly deprived of hope—that last comforter of the wretched.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to occupy a moment's time just here, to state, in reply to so much of the remark of the gentleman from Rhode Island as referred to it, that the present Administration had nothing to do with the revision of the tariff in the last Congress. It was brought about entirely by the manufacturing interests, and was especially urged by the (I think) entire delegation in Congress from the eastern States. There was a plethora in the Treasury, and gentlemen engaged in the manufacture of cotton and woolen goods came and implored us who were here in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, to advocate the revision of the act of 1846, imposing duties upon imports, in support of which I had always acted, and in favor of which I spoke in the first canvass I ever made as a candidate for a seat here. They said that the only way by which they could enter into competition with Great Britain and other countries manufacturing cotton and woolen goods, was to introduce a large free list, especially urging that the raw material should be admitted free of duty. Now, while I am very willing to hear, and have listened with pleasure to, the remarks of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. DUFFEL] who has given us a very intelligent and fair expression of his opinion—governed, of course, by the interests which surround him—I am not willing to stand here and hear this Administration deliberately charged with what gentlemen consider offenses with which it had no participation, and of which it can enter the plea of not guilty, and be sustained by the honest sentiment of the entire country. I stand here as the friend of, the devoted friend of American labor, acknowledging none more so; and will, in the exercise of my judgment, and by my vote, act in the manner which I deem most promotive of all the varied interests of our Republic, whether they be manufacturing, commercial, mechanical, agricultural, or of any other interests, demanding our consideration, or needing our fostering care. But I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that just at this time, in view of the commercial revulsion which has just swept over this broad land like a fire in the prairies, and which has not been confined to the United States, this Administration, the preceding Administration, or, indeed, any other Administration of the General Government, should be held responsible for the results flowing from it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the French spoliation question. This, sir, is one of the subjects with which all are familiar, or may be if there is a disposition to examine the public documents relating to it. It has been discussed for more than half a century by men held in high esteem by the people of the country; and although its novelty is exhausted, its merits remain unimpaired. I shall not pretend to say anything new upon this subject. There is no need that I should attempt to do it. As it presents itself to my mind, the question is not one of ideas or theories, but is based upon fixed and unalterable facts; and if we would be just in dealing with it we must resort to research, and abandon speculation. Some months ago I presented a bill which, in all particulars, agrees with that which has been reported to the House; and although this is not the occasion which I should have chosen, I nevertheless avail myself of it to say what I think about the measure.

The pending bill does not make provision for the immediate payment of the spoliation claims; but like that which passed the Thirty-Third Congress, it proposes to provide for the payment of $5,000,000 of the original amount at a future time. It also provides for a board of commissioners, who are to ascertain and allow such claims as are susceptible of proof, and within three years to report a correct list of claimants, who are to receive whatever may be allowed by a pro rata adjustment, in United States five per cent. stocks, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government. This plan will obviate all objections based upon the poor condition of the Treasury, and will satisfy claimants beyond doubt. I regret that the bill has been laid over until another session. Although we here do not understand the postponement as an indication of opposition to the passage of the bill, yet the claimants are unable to regard the action of the House in this particular as being otherwise than to them unfavorable. A little time will, I trust, restore their hopes of a speedy and just disposal of the whole matter.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the real merits of the spoliation question are so obscure as to require any considerable effort at argument to establish them upon a just foundation. As I regard the present condition of the matter, a plain statement of facts will prove the very best argument in favor of the acknowledgment and discharge of the claims. This I propose to submit briefly, but with every intention to be truthful, so far as I proceed in the case. I shall, in the course of my remarks, attempt to show that we made a treaty with France on the 6th of February, 1778, and that we did not live up to its provisions; and although we did not act wholly without provocation, we did so disregard our treaty stipulations as to furnish a pretext for France to authorize a general seizure of American commerce; and that, finally, in order to settle all difficulties, we sent envoys to meet those appointed on behalf of France; and the mission resulted in establishing the claims of the respective Governments—on the part of France, her rights under the treaties of 1778; on the part of the United States, the claims of our citizens for indemnities growing out of the unlawful seizure of their property; and that the end of all claims set up by either party was arrived at by the convention of 1800, or as soon as the two Governments had ratified it.

I have, sir, taken some pains to examine public documents, and to read such reports and speeches upon the spoliation question, as would be likely to embody not only a truthful presentation of the subject-matter, but as would also tend to enlighten minds desirous of receiving correct impressions in reference to it; and the result of my examination is a firm conviction, first, as to the justice of the claims against the United States Government; and secondly, as to the great simplicity which characterizes every well-disposed effort to get at the truth. The gist of the story could be told in a few words, but that will not do. If I am to vote to appropriate a sum of money for any purpose not in the ordinary line of legislation, I want to give a reason for it, and to strengthen it by a statement of the facts which induced my action in reference to the matter with which I am to deal. More than half a century has elapsed since the United States Government, for reasons which may appear to have been good and sufficient, assumed the responsibility of claims due from France to American citizens. I say we assumed those claims, because, as I read, I find that in consideration of important advantages accruing to herself, our Government deliberately cut off all practical recourse upon France by ratifying the convention of 1800. I shall endeavor to show that my opinion in this regard is founded upon fair inferences, taking cognizance mainly of documentary evidence. Gentlemen must bear in mind that the question whether or not citizens of the United States were deprived of their property by virtue of decrees issued by the French Government, in time of peace, is not to be successfully disputed; that these decrees were based upon the assumption that our Government had violated the faith of her treaties with France, is, whether just or unjust, fairly presumed to be the fact. We are only to ascertain the extent of our liability, if we are liable at all, and to account in some way for our presence as a party in the case. If the two Governments had at any time recognized a state of war as existing between them, growing out of the unlawful seizure of American vessels, or for other cause, or if we had become one of the parties to a war with France solely on account of her aggressions and spoliations upon American commerce, I think it would be difficult for our citizens to establish a claim against the United States. If we were at war for cause, and if we made a treaty of peace without first obtaining satisfaction for that which induced the war, it would amount to a defeat. If we obtained satisfaction for our citizens for which we resorted to hostile means, we are liable, because the object of the war was to obtain this satisfaction, and we only performed the duty of the Government on behalf of the rights of the citizen. If no war existed, then we may be regarded as delinquent; having failed to protect the citizen in his lawful pursuits. But if no war existed, and we can show that the United States Government actually bartered away the claims of her citizens for a valuable consideration, whatever it may have been; then we have fastened the liability to the citizen upon the Government itself, and fully exonerated France from every species of responsibility in the case. Upon the basis of common sense and common justice, it appears to me, we can trace the present liability to our own Government. If, however, we are to consult upon points strictly technical in their character, an argument against the liability of the United States may be presented.

The circumstances attending the claims for indemnities date back to where the history of our Government begins. We may claim their origin as cotemporaneous with our first essay at international treaty. We find an apology and partial justification for our long delay in the fact that we have never fully and fairly denied the validity of the claims, but have only awaited a convenient opportunity to examine and discharge them with due regard for the rights and interests of all parties concerned. I think, sir, that the more we attempt it, the more difficult it will be for us to get rid of the impression that, when we were weak, and needing assistance, we sought and obtained it, and when we became strong and at ease, we resolved that we would no longer be bound by the pledges made to the French Government, in consideration of which her valuable services were rendered in our revolutionary struggle. We chose to be peremptory in dealing with our ally, and, if necessary, to resort to hostile means in order to rid ourselves of onerous and embarrassing treaty stipulations. We preferred the present moment for the work, while France was distracted by her internal necessities, and nearly crushed by the hosts which were banded against her. The liberty which we were enjoying at her expense, to a great degree, we had secured; but we had not yet learned to confide in the stability or sufficiency of our resources to maintain it. An alliance of kings and emperors against the popular sentiment in France had its effect upon the leaders in this country. We could not, or, as it seems, we did not, practically regard the moral obligation which rested upon us. We failed to act upon the presumption that the French people had brought upon themselves great public distress by their efforts in achieving the independence of the United States. We desired to be prudent; we were forced, at all hazards, to be resolute.

France was, perhaps, to be reduced to a dependency. It seemed almost impossible for her to maintain her nationality, or to set up a stable and responsible Government amid the trials, internal and external, which beset her. We were then an independent Republic, full of hope and promise, and bearing the first blossom that was to grow and ripen into perfect political and social equality. To our hands was committed the principle of self-government. Our great business was to work out its practical demonstration, and no people could equal ours in the enthusiasm with which they hailed the occasion and husbanded the trust. But we were bound by a treaty of alliance with France which would be troublesome in all future time. So it appeared when we were asked to comply with its provisions. We hesitated, and read the articles of compact to see if there was a just way of escape, and we found no such way; and finally we resorted to a violent interpretation of the provisions of the treaty, to be varied according to our daily necessities, aided by the law of license, as acknowledged in matters diplomatic. This, I infer from an examination of the facts in the case, and upon reflection afterwards, and I do not for a moment intend to traduce the Government under which I live. It is necessary to my purpose that I should be just, according to my own convictions, and I shall, in my remarks, deal principally with reference to our own moral, political, and pecuniary obligations and responsibilities, as the record seems to me to affect them. I shall not pretend to explain the action of our Government in reference to her treaties with France. There appears to me to be but one hypothesis applicable to the case, and that will suggest itself to curious people. I repeat, sir, that it is my intention to trace, as briefly as possible, these spoliation claims from their origin to the time when the French Government formally released the United States from her treaty engagements; and I shall endeavor to force the conviction upon the mind of every just man, that France did this on condition that she should not be called upon to pay American citizens for the amount of property which had been unlawfully taken from them under the sanction of her Government, and in violation of the law of nations.

Immediately after the inauguration of our war of independence, we sent an envoy to Paris, to ask of the French Government aid and coöperation in our cause. We afterwards sent other envoys, fully empowered to negotiate a treaty of alliance, and of amity, and commerce. Our envoys labored with untiring zeal and earnestness to engage France in the war against England. No motive was left unaddressed; no skill in diplomacy was lost sight of; no promise of good faith could have been more earnestly made, than was made by our envoys. In the memorial to Count De Vergennes, dated 5th January, 1777, our envoys say:

"The courts of France and Spain may rely with the fullest confidence that whatever stipulations are made by us, in case of granting such aid, will be ratified and punctually fulfilled by Congress, who are determined to found their future character upon justice, fidelity," &c.

We concluded our several treaties upon the basis of good faith, in 1778. By the provisions of these treaties, we bound the United States to the performance of certain acts which we could not, or did not, finally perform. By the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance, we guaranteed protection to the French islands. This guarantee was clearly, firmly made, and we had received the consideration for it in the services rendered by France, in the shape of men and guns, money, ships, and generous sympathy and determined zeal in support of our cause; all of which were furnished upon the good faith of the Government. We also, by virtue of the twenty-second article of the treaty of commerce, agreed to grant to the French Government the exclusive use of our ports for her ships of war, privateers, and prizes, forever. This provision of the treaty was of great practical advantage to France; it afforded her not only ports of refuge, but a market for her prizes, and a place at which to refit and equip her ships; and by the treaty, these rights were to belong to France exclusively. We had, in our treaty of 1778, stipulated for mutual aid and effort in the war which France helped to bring upon herself by her treaty of alliance with us. If any gentleman doubts the prudence or the propriety of our making such concessions as we did make in the treaties of alliance and commerce, let him look at our necessities, and he will find an explanation satisfactory, I think. If he demurs, let him remember that all our vast territory, all our desired liberty and independence, were subject to the chances of an unfavorable termination of our most unequal war with Great Britain. With a Government not tested; without money or means, which were necessary to a successful prosecution of the war, we availed ourselves of the support of an old, organized, rich, and powerful Government; and for this we agreed to pay dearly, perhaps, but whether too dearly or not, I have no desire now to consider; certainly we assumed obligations which we were as desirous afterwards to cancel as we were formerly to obtain the services in consideration of which these obligations were assumed. We know that by the letter of the treaties of 1778, these stipulations were made perpetual, and the French Government set up the remarkable claim that even war itself could not destroy their force.

It is not important that I should go into the details of the several compacts made between the United States and France in elucidation of any purpose which I now have in view. It is enough to know, in this connection, that the stipulations to which I have alluded were in full force and effect upon the commencement of the war of the French revolution; and, as was pretended, for the crime of beheading her King, all Europe joined in the lead of Great Britain in a war of subjugation against the French people. For all that we know, the spirit of "resentment" was at work against France for the part she took in our war of independence. At least we had an opportunity to keep faith with our ally, if we desired or intended to do it. The parties conducting the war against France were governed by extraordinary motives. A refusal on the part of the masses in France to recognize regal authority was regarded as sufficient provocation for the acts of oppression which were heaped upon them. The greatest want prevailed throughout the French dominions; and this disaster was augmented by the course which we allowed affairs to take. England, within the space of a few months, had formed twenty-three separate treaties with neighboring Powers. The several parties to these treaties stipulated that all their ports should be shut against French ships, and agreed not to permit the exportation, in any case, of military or naval stores, corn or grain, salt, or provisions of any description, and to do all in their power to crush the commerce of France. England boldly led this coalition, and declared against all neutrals; thus coercing the weaker Governments to take ground against France. I would like to read an extract which seems to afford a fair expression of the state of feeling towards France, as well as an indication of the plan of the alliance. These instructions are given by Russia to Admiral Tchitchakoff, in conformity with her treaty with England, of March, 1793:

"We have ordered a fleet of twenty-five sail of the line, and frigates to be equipped for four months and put under your command. The principal duty of our naval armament consists in what follows. We are bound, according to our stipulations with his Majesty, the King of Great Britain, to endeavor to prevent those French who are in rebellion, from receiving any supplies of which they may be in need. The hostile measures employed against them are not strictly conformable to the natural laws of war, when it unfortunately takes place between nations under lawful governments; but as those measures are taken against those arrant villains who have overturned all duties observed towards God, the laws, and the Government; who have even gone so far as to take the life of their own Sovereign—the means of punishing those villains ought, in justice, to be employed in such a manner as to accelerate and insure success in so salutary an affair. We have made representations to the Courts of Sweden and Denmark; wherefore we have declared to them that we cannot see, with indifference, provisions or stores sent to France which serve to nourish the rebels. By this, you clearly see our will and intentions; and we order you to seize all those French vessels you may meet with, and to send back to their own ports all neutral vessels bound to France."

While our Government insisted upon her neutrality, France was pressed to urge her claims under existing treaties. We refused to respond, and finally openly disavowed all obligation under them. The abrogation of these treaties was a work of necessity, perhaps. Certainly, it was one of vast importance to the United States. But this simple assumption of fact will not obliterate the moral aspect of the question, although it may appear to justify our action in the case. The liberty which we were enjoying did not come of grace without works; and whether we paid much or little as a consideration for it, we earnestly begged the coöperation of France, and her acquiescence was dictated by uncommon benevolence and sympathy; and it may be that the lesson of liberty, which France learned in our war, cost the life of her King. In furtherance of the efforts to establish the independence of the United States, the French Government expended $256,000,000, as computed by Mr. Jefferson, while the war cost the United States but $140,000,000. (See Jefferson's Works, vol. 1, pages 57 and 412.) This was in money, and did not include the loss of property, and could not include the great loss of life consequent upon warlike adventure. The guarantee cost the French Government something, it seems; and she had a right to demand the fulfillment of our part of the agreement, or its full equivalent. Mr. Jefferson thought so. In a letter to Mr. Madison, dated April 3, 1794, he says:

"As to the guarantee of the French islands, whatever doubts may be entertained of the moment at which we ought to interpose, yet I have no doubt but that we ought to interpose at a proper time, and declare both to England and France, that these islands are to rest with France, and that we will make a common cause with the latter for that object."

Here seems to be good and reliable authority. Mr. Jefferson had no doubt that we ought to interpose; but did not know precisely when. It would appear to a candid mind at this day, that the moment to interpose was just at the moment that there seemed to be the least necessity for interference. But the fact is, we did not interfere at all; and could not, as we regarded the matter. We did not even remonstrate when Great Britain was about to capture those islands; and the only explanation, of course, is, that if we attempted to execute the guarantee, the effect would be to transfer the seat of our difficulties from France to England with her allies; and, on the other hand, if we refused to execute it, we were guilty of a breach of faith to France, involving great responsibilities, and possibly a war. But, in truth, France was not in a condition to go to war with us; and we thought so, and that circumstance alone secured us from the calamity. Our Government realized the endless obligations and dangers of the guarantee; and that France, in her future wars would, under the old treaty stipulations, leave to us the duty of protecting her islands, and to redeem them, when captured by her enemies, as often as it might be necessary to do so. The present and eventual dangers of this guarantee must have been clearly seen by our Government; and to get rid of it was its first and most important business. The safety of the country imperatively demanded it; and, by the law of self-preservation, a breach of faith may be pardonable in such an emergency, if it be followed by a pecuniary indemnity satisfactory to the injured party. Such, no doubt, was the decision of our Government; its first duty being to save the country from impending disaster. The purity of the motives and far-seeing judgment of the Executive can never be questioned. The present prosperous condition of our people is proof of that; and, although we broke our faith with France, the result was intended to be, and has proved, a real blessing to the United States. But it is not surprising that bitterness should flow from our refusal to maintain the guarantee.

And, as we had been induced to falter in our action in reference to protecting the islands, so we were forced, as matters proceeded, to qualify, and, finally, absolutely to abandon our stipulations in reference to the ports.

Mr. Pickens, Secretary of State, in his report to the President, July 15, 1796, says:

"Mr. Adet asks whether the President has caused orders to be given to prevent the sale of prizes conducted into the ports of the United States, by vessels of the Republic, or privateers armed under its authority? On this, I have the honor to inform you, that the twenty-fourth article of the British treaty having explicitly forbidden the arming of privateers, and the selling of their prizes in the ports of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury prepared, as a matter of course, circular letters to the collectors, to conform to the restrictions contained in that article, as the law of the land. This was the more necessary, as formerly the collectors had been instructed to admit to an entry and sale the prizes brought into our ports."

France had given us some pretext for the course we pursued, by allowing occasional captures of American vessels on the ground of her great necessities, besides assuming as an excuse that the similarity of appearance, and the identity of language rendered it impossible to distinguish our ships from those of England. On the 24th of March, 1793, Mr. Morris, our Minister to France, complained to the French Government that several violations had been committed against American vessels by French privateers, and on the 30th of the same month the French Minister of Marine issued the following circular to the civil ordonnateurs of the Republic:

"Citizens, being informed that some French privateers have taken vessels belonging to the United States, I hasten to engage you to take the most speedy and efficacious measures to put a stop to this robbery, which essentially compromises French honor and loyalty. You must be sensible of how much importance it is to the Republic to preserve the good intelligence subsisting between her and the United States, and to tighten, if possible, the bonds of a fraternal alliance with the people who, having conquered and obtained their liberty, value our principles and respect our rights."

But both parties to the contract became indifferent, and at last embittered in their negotiations. We were not satisfied with the decree issued by the French Government on the 9th of May, 1793, which authorized the seizure of neutral vessels bound into her enemies ports, although for all damage arising from such seizures we were to be indemnified. This decree was claimed by France to be retaliatory and even absolutely necessary as a measure of self-preservation, England having justified the capture of neutral vessels bound into French ports, and American vessels being included among the captured. France also complained of our President's proclamation of neutrality issued on the 22d of April, 1793. We were charged with having failed, in all important particulars to recognize our treaty stipulations in reference to the ports; that we had interfered and released prizes belonging to British subjects after they had been captured and brought in by French privateers; that we had allowed British ships of war the use of our ports, and had abridged the privileges of France in the sale of her prizes; that we had not fulfilled the terms of the guarantee, but had seen her islands captured without firing a gun. So both parties became restless, and both in some degree had violated their treaty stipulations. France, by allowing her privateers to capture our vessels, in the face of the clause that "free ships make free goods;" and we by a steady refusal to maintain the guarantee, and exclusive use of our ports to France. Mr. Livingston in his report thus alludes to the embarrassing state of affairs:

"In all these complaints neither of the parties seemed desirous of pressing the other for a strict performance of the treaty—both, perhaps, from a consciousness that they were, themselves, not inclined to perform all its stipulations; we, on our part, were cautious about asking indemnity for the breach of the articles which stipulated that free ships should make free goods, in the hope that the French would be equally accommodating on the subject of the guarantee; and it is curious to observe the embarrassment which this subject produced in the negotiations between the parties. In the instructions to Mr. Monroe he is directed to state that we are unable to give her aid of men and money, evidently alluding to the guarantee. A plea of inability could only flow from a consciousness of obligation, and must be regarded as an acknowledgment of liability on the part of the nation that makes it. And that Minister, in one of his letters to the Secretary of State, says: 'I felt extremely embarrassed how to touch again their infringement of the treaty of commerce; whether to call on them to execute it, or leave that question on the ground on which I first placed it.' And afterwards, in a conference with one of the French Ministers, the question is directly put, 'Do you insist on our executing the treaty?' This Mr. Monroe, for the moment, evades, but it was afterwards peremptorily again urged, 'Do you insist upon, or demand it?' And Mr. Monroe answers, 'that he was not instructed by the President to insist upon it, nor did he insist upon it;' and he avows that one of his motives was, 'lest it might excite a disposition to press us upon other points, on which it were better to avoid any discussion.' On the part of the French Government, although the execution of the guarantee seems to have been incidentally demanded by their agents in the United States, yet it was rather in the shape of a request of aid in money, provisions, and arms; and the reference made to the guarantee was to show that we might comply with their requisitions under the previous treaty without departing from our neutrality."

We shall find that in all our negotiations with the French Government, the terms of the old treaties were insisted upon by her Ministers. The guarantee of the islands was a convenient article of the treaty. These possessions were remote from the seat of the French Government, and convenient to ours. I have, sir, already alluded to the difficulties which stood in the way of our granting the promised protection. We offered a war subsidy of $200,000 annually, to be released from this guarantee, which is a fair argument in favor of the assumption that we recognized it as binding upon us, and if a bargain could be secured, we were not entirely destitute of the means with which to avail ourselves of it. But we did not pay this money, because France would not accept it in lieu of the guarantee. So, notwithstanding our refusal to stand by our agreement, our obligation to do it was more valuable to France than the proffered annual allowance of $200,000. During the pendency of all our negotiations, to this time, the action of the parties was characterized by kindly feelings, and we were rapidly adjusting all our difficulties. On the 20th of February, 1795, the President, in his message, said, "It affords me the highest pleasure to inform Congress that perfect harmony exists between the two Republics," (France and the United States.) We must remember, sir, that while we were settling our difficulties with France peaceably, she was burdened with a relentless warfare, superinduced possibly, by her former alliance with us. But regardless of this, or other considerations important to the French Government, we, at this juncture of affairs, found ourselves engaged in negotiating a treaty with Great Britain, which effectually destroyed all hopes of a speedy reconciliation with France. The knowledge of Mr. Jay's mission to England, which transpired in 1794, was the cause of new complaints on the part of the French Government, and Mr. Munroe was instructed to check the growing discontent, by giving assurance that "the motives of Mr. Jay's mission to England was to obtain immediate compensation for plundered property and a restitution of the ports," and "that he was positively forbidden to weaken the engagement between this country and France," and to "repel with firmness, any imputations of the most distant intention to sacrifice our connection with France, to any connection with England."

This explanation aided in establishing the era of good feelings upon which all our negotiations were based. But the promulgation of Mr. Jay's treaty changed the aspect of affairs. By the interpretation which we had voluntarily given to the treaty, great innovations were made upon the engagements between France and the United States, and which had not been annulled with the consent of the French Government. That clause in Mr. Jay's treaty which, by the interpretation of the contracting parties, allowed British cruisers to capture American ships laden on merchants' account, and bound into French ports, was well calculated to provoke a spirit of hostility towards us on the part of France. But it was as unjust to American merchants as it was to the French people. France was in a state of starvation, or bordering upon it. Her commerce was destroyed; her people were in arms; her ports were watched hourly by her enemies. The policy of her oppressors was to starve her into subjection, as Lord North thought he could starve the American fishermen into obedience to British dictation. The plan is inhuman, and generally fails.

By the eighteenth article of the Jay treaty, we allowed our provision vessels, bound to France, to be captured, and restricted such captures only to the proviso that "a reasonable mercantile profit be paid to the captain or owners, including freight, demurrage, &c." Whether, in view of her services in the past, and her treaty stipulations still in force, the French Government could justly complain of all this, I leave gentlemen to judge. The treaties speak for themselves. I only state the fact, as I extract it from their perusal. I here wish to read Mr. Randolph's (Secretary of State) letter to Mr. Monroe, of July 14, 1795:

"The treaty (Jay's) is not yet ratified, nor will it be ratified I believe, until it returns from England, if then. But I do not mean this for a public communication, or for any public body or men. I am engaged in a work which, when finished and approved by the President, will enable me to speak precisely to you. The late British order for seizing provisions is a weighty obstacle to a ratification. I do not suppose that such an attempt to starve France will be countenanced."

But, as I have already remarked, Mr. Jay's treaty affected the interests of American merchants unfavorably. I believe it is regarded as legitimate for the mercantile and commercial adventurer to choose his market. He is entitled to the benefit of it to-day, as he is subject to the vicissitudes and changes of every day. At the time these vessels were captured, and their cargoes sold in British ports at an advance of about ten per cent. on the invoice cost, the difference in the price of flour, as between the markets of Great Britain and France, was more than thirty dollars per barrel, and other staple supplies were held in nearly as great disproportion. Now, I will not pretend to explain the cause of this remarkable display of amiability towards a nation with whom we had just been at war, or the no less remarkable indifference towards another with whom we had been, and still were, bound by the strongest ties of friendship. But the considerations which would seem to proceed naturally from our former relations with France, produced no effect upon the action of our Government in reference to Mr. Jay's treaty. Public hostility was aroused against its ratification, and parties divided upon the question, and more than eighteen months elapsed, and the matter was suspended; but finally the treaty was ratified, much against the popular will in the United States, and certainly in violation of the letter and spirit of our treaties with France.

We also, by the Jay treaty, opened our ports to British ships, thus assailing France in her most vital part. The act was equivalent to a formal refusal to allow France the use of our ports at all. Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, wrote to Mr. King, Minister to Great Britain:

"Orders having been given to prevent the sale of prizes brought into our ports by French privateers, conformably to the twenty-fourth article of our treaty with Great Britain, a certain class of our citizens raised some little clamor, that the prohibition was not only unfriendly to France, but a violation of our treaty with that nation."

The French Minister asked if we had decided to refuse the use of our ports for the sale of French prizes. In reply, he was informed that by the twentieth-fourth article of the British treaty we must so decide. The French islands had fallen into the hands of the British, and now American ports were to be closed against French ships and prizes. The wonder is natural that we should have been so faithful to Great Britain, and so faithless to France. And the charitable explanation is, that the first led a powerful combination against the latter, and we must bow to power gracefully, even if it should cost us a war with our best friend and former ally. It is plain for us to see that President Washington had determined to keep the United States free from "entangling alliances," and that he pushed his policy of non-interference on behalf of France to the very verge of a technical understanding of the treaties in all cases; and as all men bearing public trusts find their motives overlooked, and only the chance results of their acts criticised; so Washington found his course severely condemned by a large party of his countrymen. Mr. Jefferson abandoned his Cabinet, it is believed, because he could not view all the circumstances of our position with composure.

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt, and could not doubt, that stipulations so embarrassing as ours with France must be thrown off, either by compromise or force. We could never fulfill them and maintain our peace with other nations. When we assumed these heavy obligations it was questionable if we succeeded in establishing our independence permanently. The aid of a powerful Government was an important consideration, and we were not taking a risk so great as our ally in bringing on the war. We had everything to gain in a doubtful enterprise. Our ideas of government were not matured. Our resources had not been tried; and, led on by high hopes, we could perhaps afford to agree to anything, upon the "nothing venture nothing have" principle, and we made a bold bargain; and after all our doubts and fears had, in a degree, passed away, we found it to be necessary that we should resort to nice distinctions in giving color and interpretation to the provisions of our treaties with France. Such, it seems to me, is a fair inference, and here motives might be suggested in explanation; but these will come to the minds of all men who care enough about the matter to give it consideration. We have now arrived at the point where our agents find serious business on their hands. There is no longer a feeling of indifference upon the question of good faith. Mr. Monroe stated the demands of his Government to be for payment for losses consequent upon—

- "1. The capture and detention of about fifty vessels.
 - "2. The detention for a year of eighty other vessels under the Bordeaux embargo.
 - "3. The non-payment of supplies to the West India islands to continental France.
 - "4. For depredations committed on our commerce in the West Indies.
- "Mr. Adet, on the 15th of November, 1796, announces the order of his Government to suspend his functions in the United States, and made a formal claim of the guarantee in the following terms: 'The undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, now fulfills to the Secretary of State of the United States a painful but sacred duty. He claims, in the name of American honor, in the name of the faith of treaties, the execution of that contract which assured to the United States their existence, and which France regarded as the pledge of the most sacred union between two people, the freest on earth."

So, then, France says to us, in effect, although we have made an agreement to exempt your ships as neutrals from capture, and while we have not heretofore attempted the justification of seizures made in violation of our treaty stipulations, since you have deliberately set at naught all obligations due to us from your Government, we shall proceed to capture your vessels upon the same terms that you allow Great Britain to take them. The particular hardship in this view of the case arises from the fact that the British Government paid for their plunder, while we bartered away our claims on France in order to get rid of our treaty stipulations. Impelled by the knowledge of Jay's treaty, a decree was issued by the French Government, authorizing an indiscriminate seizure of American vessels. One decree followed another, all aimed at the commerce of the United States, which was almost utterly destroyed. We attempted to settle our troubles by negotiation, and failed. We attempted to retaliate by authorizing the capture of all armed French vessels found upon our coast. We passed several legislative acts—one on the 18th of June, 1798, suspending intercourse with France; and another, which was justified upon grounds of expediency, perhaps, although in direct violation of our treaty engagements. I allude to the act of July 7, 1798:

"That the United States are of right freed and exonerated from the stipulations of the treaties, and of the convention, heretofore concluded between the United States and France; and that the same shall not henceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the Government or the citizens of the United States."

Affairs had now assumed a serious aspect; but no war was recognized on either hand. It was important, if possible, to settle our differences with France at once. Our first mission had failed to accomplish any good results; another was sent out in 1800. The first commission was composed of Messrs. Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry. The French Government did not receive these agents cordially. Many obstacles were raised; and the most that could be done was to obtain an acknowledgment from the French Government of claims due for indemnities on account of unlawful captures, and a proposal from the French Minister on the 8th of November, 1797, to the effect that a commission be established for the purpose of deciding upon the reclamations to be made to Americans on account of captures, &c., provided the United States would loan to France the necessary sum of money to carry out the plan. This proposal our envoys declined to accept; because they doubted the ability of France to pay as might be agreed, or, perhaps, because we feared the hostility of Great Britain in consequence of our apparently aiding France in carrying on the war; and this impression, it seems, we were most desirous to avoid giving, from the first. One of the principal reasons why the first commission failed to meet with favor in France proceeded from the fact that the French people were incensed in view of our conduct in concluding Mr. Jay's treaty, which almost worked actual starvation in France. In our own country, it will be remembered that the Democratic party took sides with France, and the Federal party was strongly in favor of the ratification of Jay's treaty. Two of the commissioners sent to France were active members of the Federal party; and this is given in Gour-gand's History as one reason why they were coldly met by the French Ministers. The depredations upon our commerce after the failure of the first mission were more marked than before, as the extract just read shows. It was on this account mainly that the act of July 7, 1798, to which I have referred, was passed. But in a year or two afterwards we succeeded, through the agency of our Minister at the Hague, in arranging for another mission, which occurred in 1800. From the records of the proceedings of this mission, it does not appear anywhere that the French Ministers denied the justice of our claims for indemnities. They did, however, insist upon the terms of the old treaties as paramount in matters of negotiation. These stipulations they claimed were perpetual; while we had already placed our Government in direct contravention of such an interpretation by the provisions of Mr. Jay's treaty with Great Britain. Thus the business was embarrassed at once. Up to the period of the negotiations leading to the convention of 1800, the claims due to American citizens for debts, contracts, captures, &c., had been thrown together. Now, for the first time, an attempt was made to separate them; and all debts for contracts and supplies were placed to one account, and those for illegal captures were placed in another. The first were paid under the convention of 1803; the last were bargained away to France by the convention of 1800 in consideration of our release from national engagements.

The result of the convention of 1800 was the adoption of the following articles bearing upon the question under consideration:

"The Ministers Plenipotentiary of the two parties, not being able to agree, at present, respecting the treaty of alliance of February 6, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of November 14, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time; and until they may have agreed on these points the said treaties and convention shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows:

"Art. 5. The debts contracted by one of the two nations with individuals of the other, or by the individuals of one with the individuals of the other, shall be paid, or the payment may be prosecuted in the same manner as if there had been no mis-understanding between the two States. But this clause shall not extend to indemnities claimed on account of captures or confiscations."

Thus, it will be seen, we succeeded in checking the aggressions upon our commerce, and after providing for the payment of debts in full for contracts and supplies, we left the claims for spoiliations to meet the precise point of dispute which authorized the capture of our vessels, namely, the claims of France under her old treaties. Even these claims for spoiliations were not considered by France as equal to her treaty advantages. We offered to abandon, at one time, our whole claim if we could thereby extinguish these obligations; but the offer was rejected. The best that could be done by the envoys, in 1800, was to leave affairs open for a while, and to provide for an immediate restoration of friendly intercourse. This was done by a virtual restoration and mutual re-assumption of obligations; on our part an acknowledgment of treaty obligations; on the part of France a formal acknowledgment of our claims for spoiliations. There can be no reasonable doubt of this. I know the Senate refused to ratify the convention of 1800 until the second article was stricken out, mainly, I presume, for the reason that the Government was committed against the acknowledgment of the treaty of 1778 by the act of 1798, and other recorded acts; but when we ratified, with a reservation, the action of our envoys, and returned the papers to France, the First Consul virtually restored the section by a proviso:

"That, by the retrenchment of the second article, the two States renounce the respective claims which are the object of the said article."

Now, what were the respective claims: simply on the part of France, the maintenance of our treaty stipulations; on our part, payment for spoiliations upon the property of our citizens—not for debts, for these had been provided for in full; but for captures and confiscation on account of our refusal to keep our treaty obligations in full force. Now, if our Government asserts that this was not an offset because we did not recognize our treaty obligations; then, I must say in reply, that we gave away the people's money without a consideration, by the final ratification on the part of the Senate, on the 19th December, 1801; and the subsequent promulgation by the president of the convention containing the proviso of the First Consul, and which effectually and forever destroyed all claims for indemnities which we held against France. But, sir, just at this point, I desire to furnish the evidence of an important witness, no less an authority than the First Consul himself, who was a party to the whole business. When at St. Helena, and dictating to his historian, he gave a full account of the convention of 1800; and this extract appears on page 129 of the second volume of Gour-gand's memoirs of the history of France. In speaking of the second article of the convention, he says:

"The suppression of this article at once put an end to the privileges which France had possessed by the treaty of 1778, and annulled the just claims which America might have made, for injuries done in time of peace."

And the writer goes on to say:

"This was exactly what the First Consul had proposed to himself in fixing these two points as equiponderating each other. Without this it would have been impossible to satisfy the merchants of the United States, and to banish from their memory the losses they had suffered. The First Consul's ratification of this treaty was dated July 31, 1801, and declared that it was to be clearly understood that the suppression of article second annulled all claims for indemnity," &c.

And another proof I will give. In a letter from our Minister at Paris to the French Secretary of State of April 17, 1802, he says:

"It will, sir, be well recollected by the distinguished character who had the management of the negotiation that the payment for illegal captures, with damages and indemnities, was demanded on one side, and the renewal of the treaties of 1778 on the other; that they were considered of equivalent value, and that they only formed the subject of the second article."

Here let it be seen that on this celebrated second article was the whole matter resting, and with its retrenchment we annulled all in dispute on both sides. A full opinion, corroborative of this view of the case, may be found in the letter from Mr. Clay, issued at the State Department, in compliance with the Senate resolution of March 5, 1824, and confirmed by President Adams, in his message to Congress of May 20, 1826. I will give an extract from this report. It is the report and opinion of Henry Clay, Secretary of State, and confirmed by President John Quincy Adams, in his message to Congress, May 20, 1826, and is as follows:

"The two contending parties thus agreed, by the retrenchment of the second article, mutually to renounce the respective pretensions which were the object of that article. The pretensions of the United States, to which allusion is thus made, arose out of the spoiliations, under color of French authority, in contravention to law and existing treaties. Those of France sprung from the treaty of alliance of the 6th February, 1778, the treaty of commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th November, 1788. Whatever obligations or indemnities from those sources, either party had a right to demand, were respectively waived and abandoned, and the consideration which induced one party to renounce his pretensions, was that of the renunciation by the other party of his pretensions. What was the value of the obligations and indemnities so reciprocally renounced, can only be matter of speculation. The amount of the indemnities due to citizens of the United States was very large, and on the other hand, the obligation was great (to specify no other French pretensions) under which the United States were placed in the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance of 6th February, 1778, by which they were bound forever to guaranty, from that time, the then possessions of the Crown of France in America."

We had now accomplished our purpose; we were rid of our onerous treaty stipulations, upon terms more favorable than we had anticipated. Our people were satisfied, because France was satisfied. On the 3d of October, 1800, Joseph Bonaparte, one of the French commissioners, gave an entertainment to the American Envoys at Morfontaine. The First Consul was present on the occasion. He gave, as a sentiment, "To the manes of the French and Americans who fell in the battle-field fighting for the independence of the New World." Other kindly expressions afforded assurance that we had finally, and almost providentially, escaped a bitter war with France, and had satisfactorily adjusted all difficulties between the two Governments.

And so I come down to the point. We had the work of collecting debts due to our people placed in our hands; we invited the agency in a circular letter issued at the Department of State in 1793. We found ourselves in debt to the party with whom we were to deal. We were fully empowered to act; and we gave up the claim of our citizens, to silence the clamor of our national creditor. No money passed between the parties—none needed to pass to establish the responsibility, or to settle the question of advantage to the United States. If we wish to know how we were benefited, we must examine the accounts at the Treasury, in order to ascertain how much we saved by getting rid of paying the $200,000 war stipend, or by the greater advantage of saving the expense of a protracted war in consequence of our failure to observe our treaty stipulations. We gave up the property of the citizen for a national purpose; and this we had no right to do; and because we had the power, bestowed upon the Government in good faith, and did destroy the claims of our citizens, therefore we are bound to make reparation, if there is any honor in the Government.

I claim that this opinion is just upon the highest authority. No less a statesman than Mr. Madison said:

"The claims from which France was released were admitted by France; and the release was for a valuable consideration, in a correspondent release of the United States from certain claims on them."

There is the fact we will assume. The Constitution of the United States says:

"Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

There is the law; and the law and the fact, established and brought together, ought to be sufficient to satisfy the veriest of sticklers upon legal technicalities.

I read somewhere the other day a speech upon this question, a statement that the claims for spoliation, and those set up by France, on account of treaty infractions, had never been brought together or considered together. I wish to give an extract well suited to this point; I have never seen it quoted, although I think it cannot have been overlooked in all the discussions of the subject to which it refers. I read the extract from page 631, Senate Documents, first session Nineteenth Congress, volume 5:

"The Ministers of the United States appear to have mistaken the sense of the last note of the French Ministers. They imagine that the indemnities may be sacrificed by the propositions of the 7th of Fructidor, and the treaties, notwithstanding, remain completely acknowledged and confirmed. It has always been the intention of the Ministers of France to reserve to herself the right of choice between the restoration of her privileges, (the treaties,) and the payment of indemnities which may be brought against her. So that they have never supposed that she would enjoy the privileges without the payment of indemnities, nor could pay indemnities without enjoyment of privileges."

Of course not; our claims were based upon the ground that French cruisers had seized the property of American citizens unlawfully. France assents to the proposition, and suggests that as she paid for her privileges in the part she took in our war, and as we refused to comply with our agreement, we therefore forced her to take the law into her own hands, and hence her justification for the violent acts committed. She considered the treaties of more value than the indemnities, but just then being poor, she reluctantly squared accounts, by withholding, with the consent of our Government, money due to American citizens, and canceling all obligations under these treaties as an offset. There is no doubt upon this point that I can discover, and there never has existed a well-established doubt in the mind of any man who is willing to admit the principle of cause and effect as bearing upon the question of international politics in certain cases.

We sought the agency between the claimants and the parties liable. We find the circular letter issued in official form, calling upon American merchants to confide their claims to the Government. I will read it:

"Complaint having been made to the Government of the United States of some instances of unjustifiable vexation and spoliation committed on our merchant vessels by the privateers of the Powers at war, and it being possible that other instances may have happened, of which no information has been given to the Government, I have it in charge from the President [Washington] to assure the merchants of the United States concerned in foreign commerce or navigation, that due attention will be paid to any injuries they may suffer on the high seas, or in foreign countries, contrary to the law of nations, or to existing treaties; and that on their forwarding higher well-authenticated evidence of the same, proper proceedings will be adopted for their relief."

In pursuance of this proffer of agency and aid—which has never been repealed or modified—the sufferers by French spoliations hastened their proofs of loss to the Department of State in full confidence of certain and prompt success. The Department forwarded these proofs to France without keeping any record of them. There they remain to this day. The pending bill for the relief of the claimants makes it the duty of the Secretary of State to cause said proofs to be collected and placed on file in his Department.

Mr. Chairman, one of the greatest hinderances to a just presentation of the facts in the case under consideration, proceeds from the voluminous character of the evidence. There has been so much said and so much written, that the truth is greatly obscured by the mass of documentary matter relating to the question. But, sir, there can be no careful examination of the subject that will not result in a conviction of the justice of these claims as against the United States—at least, so it appears to me. A lawyer might find a pretext for opposing them in the labyrinths of technical reasoning, but not much, I believe, founded upon fact or justice either.

We have had thirty-four congressional reports upon the subject, all or nearly all of which have sustained the claims as due to citizens of this Government. We have had two vetoes, but neither of these met the question upon its merits precisely, nor upon points legally deducible against the bill; but rather upon such as seemed prudential or expedient at the time, however fallacious they may have been. It may not be improper to suggest that errors of fact as well as of judgment, may have induced the opposition of the Executives who vetoed the bill as it came from Congress. I am convinced that this is true in one case, at least. But I wish to allude briefly to two or three objections which are generally urged against the payment of these claims.

I think, sir, that we must admit that the argument which is derived from the fact that Congress declared the treaties of 1778 null and void by the act of 1798, is, in fact, no argument at all. It would be marvelous if either of the parties to a valuable contract, acting separately, could annul its provisions at pleasure. It would be no less remarkable if one of the parties could interpret the true intent and meaning of an instrument, and, without consultation, adopt a course of action which would bind the other. It would be strange if one could determine not only just how far his responsibility in the case was binding upon him, but also the measure of responsibility which the contract imposed upon the other. I do not believe in such a liberal indulgence of ex parte principles. An international treaty is governed by the same rule of intelligent interpretation and perfect fairness as a contract between individuals. It may be annulled by mutual consent; but so long as it is not so annulled, it can only be destroyed by a general war between parties living under it. Such a state of facts will not apply to France and the United States during the pendency of the difficulties; nor has it existed at any previous or subsequent period in the history of the two Governments.

Upon this point I must say a few words. We have often heard, in the discussion of this subject, that war actually existed between France and the United States by the action of our Government; but the suggestion amounts to nothing. A quasi war is not a general, open war, and does not pretend to be. The mere act of capturing the vessels of one nation by those of another is not proof of a state of war, although it may be just ground for apprehension that war may grow out of such acts. We did not consider ourselves at war with England because she authorized her vessels to capture American fishing vessels for alleged infraction of our treaty with that Government. And it looks much less like studied and warlike aggression for a Government to whom we are bound by honorable ties to capture our property, particularly if, under all circumstances, a claim for indemnity, upon a fair and equitable basis, is freely admitted. Certainly the French Government never refused to pay our claims, nor repudiated them in any manner whatsoever. Abundant evidence in support of this assertion can be found in the dispatches from our envoys. We insisted that the seizure of our vessels was unlawful and violent; and so was our interpretation of the old treaties unjust and ungenerous, and so claimed to be by France. And, besides, France was doing no more in the line of illegal seizures than England was doing at the very time of which we complain. Should we have made war with France, to whom we were bound by treaties, when all was wrong on our side, and, at the same moment, conclude a treaty with an aggressor on the other hand, giving him all the license he desired? It is not probable, at all events.

But, sir, a state of actual war is not to be mistaken for something else. We did not deal with the French Government as if war actually existed in the judgment of the American authorities. We find, in the instructions to our envoys to France, of October 22, 1793, under which the convention of 1800 was concluded, the following:

"This conduct of the French Republic would well have justified an immediate declaration of war on the part of the United States; but desirous of maintaining peace, and still willing to leave open the door of reconciliation with France, the United States contented themselves with preparations for defense, and measures calculated to protect their commerce."

It seems we "left open the door for reconciliation." We were desirous of maintaining peace, and contented ourselves with compliance with the advice of our Chief Magistrate, who, in his message to Congress, 3d December, 1793, said:

"If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war."

That is all. We acted upon these valuable suggestions. We did not have occasion to do more. Not even in our negotiations at Paris did we proceed as if we had recognized a state of war.

Our envoys were only authorized to settle difficulties growing out of a misunderstanding between the two Governments. The convention provided for their final adjustment, at a future time, which was limited to eight years. Was the interval to be regarded as a truce? and when and how did the truce end? According to my understanding, a truce must result in one of two things—either a treaty of peace or a resumption of open hostilities, which had been temporarily suspended by it; and it would have been a departure from every principle of diplomacy to end a war in any such manner as that which characterized the action of the envoys on the occasion to which I refer. But I find no record of a treaty of peace, and we know that there was no provision made for resuming the war in the event of the failure of negotiations. The next business which received the attention of the parties was to ratify the convention; and this was done immediately after its adoption. And the next after that came the convention of 1803, which provided for the Louisiana purchase, for which we paid eighty million francs, twenty millions being, by mutual agreement, reserved for payment to American citizens for debts set apart and allowed by the convention of 1800. Not for spoliations, remember; but for debts, for contracts, and supplies; and this is the point of distinction which has troubled many men. But, sir, if war existed, France, of necessity, must have been a party to it; and yet Talleyrand, in a letter dated Paris, August 28, 1798, to the French Minister at the Hague, says:

"France, in fine, has a double motive, as a nation and as a Republic, not to expose to any hazard the present existence of the United States. Therefore, it never thought of making war against them, and every contrary supposition is an insult to common sense."

Again: The report made to the French Tribunal, on the ratification of the convention of September 30, 1800:

"In consequence of this bill, annulling act of Congress of July 7, 1793, the American Government suspended the commercial relations of the United States with France, and gave to privateers permission to attack the armed vessels of the Republic. The national frigates were ordered to seek them, and to fight them. A French frigate and sloop of war, successively and unexpectedly attacked by the Americans, were obliged to yield to force, and the French flag (strange versatility of human affairs) was dragged, humiliated, before the same people who, a little while ago, with eager shouts, had applauded its triumph."

"It was getting past recovery; war would have broken out between America and France; if the Directory, changing its system, and following the counsels of prudence, had not opposed moderation to the unmeasured conduct of the President of the United States. In this way it rendered null the projects of the American ministry, which would have declared war against us, if it had only its wishes to consult."

"Commissions granted by the President to attack the armed vessels of France do not suffice to put America in a state of war; it requires a positive declaration of Congress to that effect. None has ever existed. The Republic was therefore justified in claiming the enjoyment of the stipulations comprehended in the old treaties, and indemnity for the non-execution of those stipulations."—Code Diplomatique, pages 6, 7.

France did not recognize war, it appears, nor did the United States really conduct affairs as if open war was even threatening. Congress had authorized the President of the United States to raise an army, in case of need; but no army was raised, because no need of troops appeared. Even the ships built to meet certain contingencies were sold at auction, by authority of Congress, given March 3, 1801; and this, it will be seen, was many months before the convention of 1801 was ratified by the parties to it. This would, indeed, be a strange proceeding for us to engage in at the same moment that our envoys were employed in negotiating a treaty of peace. There was no war, actual and bona fide, and none could have existed between the two Governments at the time of which I speak.

There was a public sentiment in favor of war at the time. But it was not against France; it was against England. The Americans were kindly disposed towards the French people. Theirs was a struggle for popular liberty—blind and impotent, perhaps, but well calculated to arouse the enthusiasm of a people who had just adopted the new system for themselves. Our citizens would have cordially seconded the determination of the Government to maintain the treaties, if it had been expedient so to act; or even more directly to have aided the cause, now being pressed forward with herculean energy by our devoted friends. But the United States Government wisely—perhaps sternly—insisted upon a constructive neutrality, in direct violation of our treaty engagements though it was. To this day the popular will appears to be disregarded by the Government, perhaps from the best and wisest of motives. It is not strange that it should have been so in the days of our infancy.

Expediency sometimes subordinates principle, from necessity, I am bound to presume. This may have been as true sixty years ago as it is to-day. Congress never declared war against France; but Congress, if necessary, could have done it in all the time from 1793 to 1800. But, sir, where is the war-making power? I find it vested in Congress; and before it is enforced it must have formal expression. The Constitution settles the point. Some of its provisions are easily understood, and this is one of them. It says that Congress shall have power "to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water." There is no record of a declaration of war by act of Congress, and no present recollection of the existence of even an informal war, properly so called, that I know of.

But if a treaty of peace was negotiated by our envoys in 1800, I should, as a matter of pride, like to know which party claimed to have succeeded against the other in the contest, and which finally got the better in the negotiation of the treaty of peace. However, there is no need of my saying more upon this point. If war existed between France and the United States from 1798 to 1801, there would have been no occasion for suspending intercourse, by legislative enactment, from year to year; nor would it be at all necessary for Congress to pass an act to declare the treaties no longer binding upon our Government. The war itself would have put an effectual end to all ordinary international engagements between belligerent parties.

But, sir, if war did actually exist, then I assert that the convention restored the validity of the claims on both sides by its careful and prompt consideration of them, and final dismissal of all obligations on either side growing out of treaties, infractions, or spoliations.

The first proposition made by the French negotiators was in the following language, as contained in a note of the 11th August, 1800:

"In the first place, they will insist upon the principle already laid down in the former note, viz: That the treaties which united France and the United States are not broken; that even war could not have broken them; but that the state of misunderstanding which has existed for some time between France and the United States, by the acts of some agents rather than the will of the respective Governments, has not been a state of war, at least on the side of France.

"If the reflections presented on this subject in the note of the French Ministers, of the 8th of the present month, suffice to lead the Ministers of the United States to the acknowledgment of the treaties, the first consequence which will result from them, and which the Ministers of France will be eager to recognize anew, is, that the parties on both sides ought to be compensated for the damages which have been mutually caused by their misunderstanding."

Here we see that the French Government did not recognize war as existing; but while claiming that the treaty advantages were perpetual, that Government was still eager to recognize anew the damages which "had been mutually caused by the misunderstanding." In response to the above proposition our envoys replied:

"1. Let it be declared that the former treaties are renewed and confirmed, and shall have the same effect as if no misunderstanding between the two Powers had intervened, except so far as they may be derogated from by the present treaty."

Here seems to be a perfect restoration of the treaty stipulations, by and with the consent of the American Ministers, and an acknowledgment of mutual responsibilities not at all likely to come in at the heel of a general war, unless it is suggested that our envoys acknowledged every point in dispute on their side, without a corresponding acknowledgment on the part of France. Such an understanding of the case would hardly be regarded as complimentary to the spirit of our envoys. It is, sir, by no means difficult to establish the only fact necessary to our purpose. Our sole ground of complaint against France was on account of the capture of our vessels in time of peace, and a violation of our asserted right of neutrality, and of the law of nations; and yet the convention made no distinction between captures made before July 7, 1798, and those made after that date. It would appear that, if the existence of a partial war, under the act of 1798, annulled the treaties, and made the capture of our commerce legal, under the license which a general war affords to belligerent parties, that same distinction should have been made between the captures made prior, and those which were made subsequent, to the declaration. If a war existed, it was to enforce payment for plundered property; and yet we made no distinction between that which was plundered before the passage of the act of 1798 and that which was legally captured under the rule of maritime warfare, which was not plundered, in the same sense of the term as the other. If we acknowledge a state of war, we must show why we made war; if only for indemnity for property unlawfully seized, then we must have received satisfaction, or we were beaten in the war or in the diplomacy which followed it. If we received the money, where is it? If we did not receive it, why do we not set about getting it now, provided we assert that the claims are not cut off by the convention of 1800-1801? But I must pass from this point.

There is, sir, another objection sometimes suggested in reference to the payment of these claims—one, in fact, which is often urged, and with considerable effect. It is, that the claims have passed out of the hands of the original owners; that agents have stepped in between the parties; that underwriters have paid in some cases; and hence, the merchants being in some way satisfied, it is therefore not binding upon us to provide for payment of the claims at all. These premises are not sound, to begin with. The claims have not passed out of the hands of the original owners, generally speaking. But suppose it were otherwise: what would that have to do with the justice of the claims? Can we exonerate ourselves by any such pretext as this? If I employ an agent, have I not a right to transfer my interest in a claim intrusted to him for settlement; and if I am poor and needy, and he comes to my aid at my solicitation, is he not rather to be regarded a public benefactor than an outlaw? Should I not thank him for taking the risk of getting his money in the ordinary course of justice, if he does it for my accommodation? And have I not a right to take for my claim what I can get, without the consent of my debtor? And is the debtor any poorer for paying the agent than he would be if he paid the money into my own hand? And is there any law of the land which forbids such transfer of a claim? If every dollar of the spoliation claim was owned by one man, the principle involved would not be altered in the least degree, nor could we honorably withhold ample and complete satisfaction, provided we in any case admit the justice of the claims against the Government.

As to underwriters, I believe the law protects them. I understand their business to be legal; and if they have a risk which requires them to protect the merchant, and if the property insured is formally abandoned to the underwriter, then, under any and all circumstances, he is entitled to the advantages and chances of saving what he can from the wreck. If anything could ultimately accrue to the benefit of the merchant if he had not been insured, it certainly belongs to the underwriter, in cases where property has been paid for. A board of underwriters, or an insurance company, only represents a consolidated interest for convenience sake. Individuals are behind the works; and if great losses occur to stock offices or those insuring on the mutual plan, the losses after all affect the individual who owns the stock or subscribes to the plan of the mutual office, and he gains or loses according to the fortunes of the company in which he is interested. It so happens that my constituents are interested in the passage of this bill, and for them I speak, because I think their claims just. An attempt has been made from time to time to bring distrust upon the spoliation claims, by placing them amongst the measures sometimes styled lobby schemes. While I recognize the right of the people to throng every avenue to this Capitol, if they desire legislation, I have only met one man who is acting as an agent in urging the passage of this bill, and his character for probity is above suspicion. There has never been a question before Congress that awakens such general interest among the people as this spoliation question, and for reasons which are very natural. It has been the theme of conversation at every fire-side in the old States; and the generations of fifty years must all disappear, before the interest which tradition has thrown around the subject is broken and destroyed.

But it is useless to dwell upon this point. I know that the claims generally are in the hands of the original owners, or their heirs.

Mr. Chairman, the exact extent of the liability of the Government in matters where the interest of the citizens is concerned, is perhaps an open question—one to be considered and settled according to circumstances. As a general principle of Government, we know where the responsibility rests in this connection. Some say the Government is not bound to collect the debts of the citizens. Possibly not, if these debts are the legitimate result of trade and commerce; but how is it when we find our property violently seized by the subjects of a foreign Government, with whom we are at peace? and especially how is it when we formally agree to collect money for indemnities, and as formally encourage adventure. We find in Mr. Jefferson's letter, to which I have referred, this language:

"I have it in charge from the President to assure the merchants of the United States concerned in foreign commerce or navigation, that due attention will be paid to any injuries they may suffer on the high seas, or in foreign countries, contrary to the law of nations or to existing treaties; and that, on their forwarding hither well authenticated evidence of the same, proper proceedings will be adopted for their relief."

Now, sir, if there is any force in the objection often suggested, to the payment of these spoliation claims, I think it is set aside by the fact that the Government, in official form, promised protection, not only to that portion of our citizens who had already suffered by the seizure of vessels by French privateers, but by the promise of protection to all who might desire to continue their trade and commerce as previously carried on, which promise appears in the letter to which I have alluded, assuring the merchants of Charleston, South Carolina, and through them the whole United States, that due attention will be given to their rights and interests. If the understanding that the Government protects the citizen against foreign aggression is not so general as to cover the case in question, I think the extract which I have read forces the conclusion, or at least strengthens the suggestion, that the United States is bound by peculiar obligations to stand by the claimants for French spoliations, amounting almost to a liability for debts for captures, without reference to whether we received consideration for them or not.

But, sir, there is a class of persons who pretend that these claims are not due, because they have not been paid. This argument is a little remarkable, it seems to me. Because the United States Government has, to use nautical parlance, by backing and filling, and veering and hauling, managed to get through fifty years without doing justice to claimants, therefore the presumption is that the Government was never bound, or, if ever, is not now bound to pay: I do not find much to support such an idea as this, either in the shape of evidence or sound logic. It is no fault of the claimants that they have not been paid. The subject was presented in the House of Representatives as early as 1802, in the form of a resolution:

"That it is proper to make provision by law towards indemnifying the merchants of the United States for losses sustained by them from French spoliations, the claims for which losses have been renounced by the final ratification of the convention with France, as published by proclamation of the President of the United States."

The motion to postpone this resolution was lost by a vote of 54 to 33, and only so lost because a leading political question supervened to overrule action, at present, upon the spoliation matter. So it appears that these claimants were early in the field, and nearly every Congress since has had the matter under consideration in some form.

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire at this time to say more concerning the facts in the case. It is my opinion, that if we regard all the circumstances involved, we shall come to the conclusion that upon the United States Government rests more than a common liability. There is a moral, as well as pecuniary, responsibility at stake. We have not only appropriated the money belonging to citizens, but we have broken our good faith as agents standing between the people and their rights. Our oath of fidelity to the Constitution, which expressly forbids taking "the property of the citizen without just compensation," is involved in our deliberations upon this question. I can view the subject in no other light; and no amount of pleading or sophistry can get us clear of recorded facts. As I have before said, an array of technical objections to allowing the claims may be presented; but, until it is right under a legal guise to do wrong in the face of a moral fact, you can never convince me, nor those who hold these old claims, that the Government can honestly refuse to provide for their payment; and if, upon an examination of this question, the facts appear to others as they do to me, there will be no attempt to delay action any longer than is necessary to a fair understanding of the case.

Mr. Chairman, I have not hoped to be able to suggest considerations in support of the matter in question that have not been over and over again urged by the friends of the bill, and which have not been generally admitted as just by many who still stand upon technical ground, in opposition to the passage of a bill for the relief of claimants. No man denies that we made treaties with France, or that we had an object in view when these were made. No man can deny that mutual obligations existed between the United States and France. No man can deny that the claims of both parties were presented for adjustment, side by side; and it will be useless to deny that the accredited agents of both the parties agreed to extinguish all obligations existing between them, and to start afresh with a clean page. France may have been justified in her course as a nation. Perhaps we were justified in ours, up to the point of dealing with France; but our duty does not end there. We used the property of our citizens to satisfy a demand upon the country, and we cannot get rid of paying every dollar promptly and honorably. All the facts are against us; the law is against us; the principle of equity is against us; the spirit of the Government is against us; and the sentiment of the people is against us. The feeling of popular esteem for an upright administration of justice at the hands of the Government is involved in our action in reference to this matter; and upon such considerations as this truth may suggest, depends all that is legitimate and honorable that attaches to our institutions.

Mr. GILMER. I have been waiting for some time to make a short reply to my colleague [Mr. SHAW] from the first congressional district of North Carolina. On last Tuesday evening I supposed I should have had the opportunity to do so. I supposed it was the understanding in the morning that we were to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but the House declined to do so, and I was therefore cut off from making the reply which I desired to make. I would make the reply now were my colleague present, which I desire to have an opportunity to make before the adjournment of the present session of Congress, but I cannot do it unless he is present. I desire to say, however, that I think I will be able to show this House and the country that my colleague in his reply to me in my absence did me great injustice. Many statements applicable to me, I think, I would be able to show to be utterly without foundation. I think, also, I should be able to show that many portions of his reply to me were perversions of facts. I think in my absence he took occasion to represent me unfairly before my constituents and his, and to create, improperly and without foundation, prejudice against me. And although I discover, from the report of what took place in my absence, that gentlemen who are near to me undertook truthfully to correct the statement, he still persevered in it; for I say here with solemn regard to truth that no such thing as congratulation by Mr. GIDDINGS, of Ohio, did occur, as stated by him, and none of any kind to the best of my recollection. I see that a Representative replied to him, that he was passing up the aisle, and from the fact that some mention of his name was made to which I replied with a smile, the mistake may have occurred. That was all, nothing more.

I will say further, that my friend Mr. CHINGMAN, who is not here, and will not likely be here, I discover, said something to the effect that he was standing at the time at about the place where he was then speaking—where that was, I cannot tell. He certainly was not in the seat he usually occupied. I am advised that he was upon the other side of the House. From the fact, however, that he has his seat next to me, persons not acquainted with where he was might suppose that he was sitting at the time next to me. I am happy to see, however, that in the remarks made by him upon that occasion, he did not sustain the statement that the member from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] congratulated me. I was surprised that he should have made any remark about it, because I did not see him at the time at all. I do not know in what part of the Hall he was; he was not in his seat, and has been there but little of the time during the session. I shall take occasion, when the proper opportunity arrives, to make a suitable reply to the speech then made by my colleague.

Mr. FLORENCE moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 198) making appropriations for fortifications, &c., and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. BUFFINTON, (at a quarter past eight o'clock) the House adjourned until Monday next, at eleven o'clock, a. m.

IN SENATE.

Monday, May 24, 1858.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PEARCE presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Merchants' Exchange Association of Washington, District of Columbia, opposed to the bill introduced by Mr. SLIDELL to restrict the issue of bank notes as a currency in the District of Columbia, and in favor of rechartering the banks of the District of Columbia; which was ordered to lie on the table, and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SIMMONS presented the memorial of George T. Durham, praying compensation for services as clerk in the Indian Bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS presented a communication from the War Department, communicating copies of correspondence inadvertently omitted in the answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 20th May, 1858, respecting the claims of Blocker & Gurley and J. F. Davis; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. BROWN. I present the memorial of Thomas Motley, for himself and others, praying permission to cross certain avenues in the city of Washington with a railroad, a portion of which he proposes to lay down as an experiment in the city. I am opposed to the object of the memorial, but I present it, and move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE presented the petition of Richard H. Long, praying permission to locate upon the reserves on St. Andrew's Bay, in Florida, certain preemption claims held by him; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FITZPATRICK presented a petition of John P. Figh and John H. Gindrat, contractors for the erection of certain public buildings at Fort Gaines, Dauphin Island, praying compensation for damages sustained by them in consequence of a suspension of the work by an officer of the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

RESEARCHES IN ASIA.

Mr. GWIN. I present the memorial of Perry McDonough Collins, praying Congress to compensate him for commercial researches in northern Asia and explorations of the Amoor river.

Mr. Collins, who presents this memorial, was appointed by the President of the United States, Mr. Pierce, in 1856, to make commercial researches in northern Asia, and to ascertain if the commerce of that country could be made available to the United States from the Pacific ocean; by way of the Amoor river, which river empties into the straits of Tartary, the waters of the Pacific ocean, not far north (eight hundred miles) of Hakodadi, Japan. Mr. Collins proceeded, immediately after his appointment, to the duty assigned him, and has been for the last two years engaged in it. He crossed the whole of Europe and Asia, investigated the commerce of northern Asia, and has been the pioneer in the navigation of the Amoor river. Mr. Collins descended the Amoor river and its tributaries, from the center of northern Asia to the sea, and has practically demonstrated the fact that it is navigable for steamboats, and can be ascended over two thousand miles from the Pacific ocean. The knowledge of this fact opens at once to American commerce from the Pacific, access to the vast interior trade of Northern Asia, which amounts to $50,000,000 annually. Manchouria, Daouria, Siberia, Mongolia, Northern China, Thibet, and Tartary, with a population of thirty millions, will, through the navigable waters of this river, be opened to American commerce. The services rendered have been valuable and important, and it is hoped the committee will give the claim prompt consideration. I move that the memorial be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the motion to print to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PEARCE, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the memorial of E. R. Livingston, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it lie on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 263) granting the right of way over the depot grounds on the military reserve at Fort Gratiot, in the State of Michigan, for railroad purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the following bill and joint resolution, reported them without amendment, and that they ought not to pass:

A bill (S. No. 179) to extend the provisions of section twelve of the "Act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1858;" and

A joint resolution (S. No. 26) for the benefit of the nearest male heir of the late Major General Towson, United States Army, deceased.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the memorial of E. D. Tippet, praying the aid of Congress to test his "cold water safety steam-engine;" the petition of Franklin Kelsey, praying an appropriation for building, equipping, and testing a steamboat on a scientific model invented by him; a memorial of Joseph Humphries, praying that his patent "floating anchor or drag" may be tested; a memorial of Bishop, Simons & Co., praying permission to give a practical experiment before an appropriate committee, of the merits of Holmes' patent self-righting, self-bailing surf and lifeboat; a petition of John J. Rink, praying Congress to purchase the right to use certain improvements made by him in the construction of sub-marine masonry and in ship-building; a memorial of B. F. Simms, and Arthur Barbarin, inventors of an electro-magnetic fog-bell, praying an appropriation to test its practicability and utility; a memorial of John C. F. Salamon and George W. Morris, praying an appropriation for the construction and fitting up a vessel on their plan, as a "life-preserving vessel;" a petition of William W. Hubbell, inventor of a new and useful improvement in eccentric explosive shells, praying compensation for an infringement of his patent; a memorial of William Brenton Boggs, a purser in the Navy, praying to be allowed additional compensation while he served as purser of the North Pacific exploring expedition; a memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying a change in the present system of Government chaplains, and an increase in the number of chaplains; a memorial of Bishop Potter, of New York, and other clergymen, praying a change in the present system of Government chaplains, and an increase in the number of chaplains; four memorials of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that a system of instruction may be introduced into the Navy, as a means of improving the personnel of ships' crews; a petition of insurance companies, merchants, and others, of New York, praying that a system of instruction may be introduced into the Navy, as a means of improving the personnel of ships' crews; a petition of insurance companies, merchants, and others, of Cincinnati, praying that a system of instruction may be introduced into the Navy, as a means of improving the personnel of ships' crews; a petition of insurance companies, merchants, and others, of Newark, New Jersey, praying that a system of instruction may be introduced into the Navy, as a means of improving the personnel of ships' crews; and two memorials of insurance companies, merchants, and others, of New Orleans, praying that a system of instruction may be introduced into the Navy, as a means of improving the personnel of ships' crews, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the petitions of Mrs. Sarah Brashers, praying to be allowed the benefit of the act granting five years' pay to the surviving officers of the Texan navy; a memorial of Mrs. Georgiana M. Lewis, praying to be allowed the benefit of the act granting five years' pay to the surviving officers of the Texan navy; and a petition of Thomas W. Jordan, late captain's clerk on board the United States ship Fredonia, praying to be allowed the difference between his pay as captain's clerk and that of purser, during the time he acted as purser, reported adversely thereon, and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions and memorial.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 273) for the relief of John F. Cannon, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of the president and directors of the Dismal Swamp Canal Company, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 400) to surrender the stock of the United States in the Dismal Swamp Canal Company, upon certain conditions, to said Company. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 280) to repeal the twenty-fifth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789, reported that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of George Stealey, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 403) for the relief of George Stealey. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 389) providing for the allotment of lands to certain New York Indians, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of the United States judge for the western district of Arkansas, and others, relative to the erection of a jail at Van Buren, in that State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 200) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHIELDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 399) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend preemption rights to certain lands therein mentioned," approved 3d March, 1853; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DOUGLAS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 401) to facilitate communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electric telegraph; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DOUGLAS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 402) to restrain and redress outrages upon the flag and citizens of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 404) in relation to a revised code for the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FITZPATRICK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 405) for the relief of John P. Figh and John H. Gindrat; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CHRISTIAN INDIANS.

Mr. KING. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 323) for the sale of certain Delaware lands was passed. I had a conversation with the gentleman who reported it, who understood me to withdraw my objection to the bill by which it was laid over. I did not intend to do that, but stated that I knew nothing about it. My opinion is, that the facts do not appear to justify the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon what day did it pass?

Mr. KING. It passed on Friday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the bill has gone out of the possession of the Senate, but he supposes the motion may be entered.

Mr. KING. The bill passed upon a mistake as to the fact whether I withdrew my objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can make a motion to direct the return of the bill from the House of Representatives.

Mr. KING. I make that motion.

Mr. CLAY. Let it lie over.

Mr. BIGLER. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. SEBASTIAN] is not in his seat, and I hope the motion will lie over.

Mr. KING. The bill passed under a mistake.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered, and the Secretary will request the return of the bill from the House of Representatives.

A message was afterwards received from the House of Representatives, returning to the Senate the bill (S. No. 323) to confirm the sale of the reservation held by the Christian Indians, and to provide a permanent home for said Indians.

KEEP, BARD, AND COMPANY.

Mr. CLAY. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 318) for the relief of Keep, Bard, & Co., J. Caulfield, and Joseph Landis & Co., have directed me to report the bill back and recommend its passage. As it is a bill which should be passed at this session, if the relief asked is to be granted at all, I hope the Senate will take it up and consider it at this time. The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. POLK,] who introduced it and is familiar with the parties and the facts, can state the case to the Senate.

Mr. WADE. Will it cause debate?

Mr. CLAY. None at all.

Mr. WADE. Then I have nothing to say.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill, which proposes to authorize the attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana to enter satisfaction of the judgment rendered by the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana, on or about the 21st of January, 1858, in favor of the United States, against Keep, Bard & Co., principals, composed of E. S. Keep, J. S. Bard, and J. Caulfield; and Joseph Landis & Co., sureties, composed of L. H. Place and Paul E. Mortimer, jointly and severally in solido.

Mr. POLK. I will state the nature of this case. John J. Rowe & Co., heavy merchants and ship-owners, of St. Louis, took two contracts, one for the shipment of railroad iron from New Orleans to St. Louis; another for the shipment of railroad iron from New Orleans to Keokuk, in Iowa. Keep, Bard & Co., of New Orleans, were their correspondents there. They directed them to bond the iron, deliverable at St. Louis, for the custom-house at St. Louis; and deliverable at Keokuk, for the custom-house at Keokuk. The iron was shipped up. When the iron that was intended for Keokuk arrived at St. Louis, it was immediately transferred from the vessel in which it was brought up there to another vessel, and carried to Keokuk. The iron for St. Louis was delivered there. When they went to the custom-house to pay the duties and discharge their bonds, they found that by mistake Keep, Bard & Co. had bonded all the iron for St. Louis. They then wrote on to the Department here for liberty to pay the duty on the Iowa iron either at Keokuk or St. Louis, they did not care which; and if the Department would not let them do that, and would notify them of their determination in time, they would ship the iron back from Keokuk to St. Louis, so as to discharge their bonds there, and then take it from St. Louis back again up to Keokuk. The Department held the matter under advisement for some time, and then wrote back to John J. Rowe & Co., at St. Louis, declining to receive the duty either at St. Louis or at Keokuk, and ordering a suit upon their bond. This was only one day, according to my recollection—certainly not more than two days—before the time limited in the bond. Therefore they could not possibly bring the iron back from Keokuk to St. Louis within the time specified in the bond.

Mr. STUART. I should like to ask the Senator if the duties have been paid?

Mr. POLK. Yes, sir; and the costs have been paid.

Mr. STUART. Then there can be no objection to the case.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 341) making appropriations for repairing and securing the works at the harbor of Chicago, Illinois.

Mr. GWIN. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I should like to make some remarks on a privileged motion that has been on the docket for some time, and that is the reconsideration of the postponement of the Pacific railroad bill. I want to leave the city to-day or to-morrow, and I should like to have the privilege of giving my reasons as briefly as I can on that question. I believe it is a privileged question. This matter will certainly lead to a great deal of discussion, and I should prefer that the Senator would permit me to go on and make my remarks now.

Mr. WADE. I should be glad to accommodate the Senator if I could; but I know that the condition of the lake harbors, particularly those on Lake Erie, is such that, if we adjourn without passing these bills, so that the repairs can be made, many of them will be utterly destroyed before the end of another year. The proposed appropriations are very small. The Committee on Commerce report nothing towards the further construction of harbors anywhere, but barely propose to do that work which is absolutely necessary to preserve what has already been done. I do not suppose the bills will lead to much debate or objection. There is a number of them; but they are all of the character I have stated. Not one of them proposes to pay out money for the further construction of harbors, or to extend a work, but barely to preserve it. I am very sorry that the committee were not more liberal, and did not propose to appropriate more money for these works; but as they did not, I do not suppose the bills recommended by them will meet with much opposition. They seem to be a matter of necessity. There are some twenty-three of these bills; and if the Senate shall take up one—and I now move to take up the first—I shall move that the others be tacked on as amendments. That will be more expeditious than to pass them all separately. I hope these bills will be taken up, because the session is so far advanced that, unless we proceed with them now, there will be danger that they may be lost. I feel constrained to adhere to my motion.

Mr. GWIN. It is evident that the Senator from Ohio is mistaken. This question will lead to a prolonged discussion. I understand that the Senator from Georgia, who is not now in his seat, [Mr. Toombs,] a member of the Committee on Commerce, and also the chairman of that committee, the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] will oppose these bills somewhat at large. I merely made the statement I did, because I have not, I believe, obtruded myself on the Senate during the session. I have not made any particular set speech on any question. I want to give the reasons why the postponement of the Pacific railroad bill ought to be reconsidered. I shall occupy but a short time of the Senate in doing so. I wish to leave the city, and I was in hopes I should be permitted to go on this morning without any objection from any quarter.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the question will be taken. We should pass these bills now if they are to be passed at all. These works are all going to desolation.

Mr. CLAY. I trust the bill will not be taken up in the absence of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WADE. These bills are not for improvements, but to preserve harbors.

Mr. CLAY. I know that the Senator from Georgia, who is not now in his seat, wishes to say something on the subject, and I do not think it is fair to take advantage of his absence, and pass these bills, when it is understood that he and I were the only members of the committee opposed to them.

Mr. PUGH. I would suggest to my colleague that it is hardly worth while for us to proceed to the consideration of these bills; for I shall move as an amendment to the miscellaneous appropriation bill all these various bills reported by the Committee on Commerce. I think they belong to that bill, and we may as well have the debate there, if there is to be any debate.

Mr. WADE. I very much fear that they will be ruled out of order, or something take place there to prevent their passage, which would be a great misfortune to the country. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Jones, King, Pearce, Pugh, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—27.

So the motion was agreed to, and the bill (S. No. 341) making appropriations for repairing and securing the works at the harbor of Chicago, Illinois, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $87,225 37.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend this bill by adding to it Senate bill No. 342; and so I shall move to add all the bills reported by the committee, one after the other. I think that is better than passing them separately. The amendment is:

"That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $28,630, for the preservation and repair of the piers at the mouth of Milwaukee river, Wisconsin, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War."

Mr. HAMLIN. I think myself the Committee on Commerce wisely reported the provisions which they have for harbor improvements in separate bills instead of one general bill, and for this simple reason: while they are all embraced within the same principle, all designed to keep the works now in existence in a state of preservation, still there may be differences in the kind and character of the bills. By presenting them in separate measures, you make every appropriation depend upon its own merits, and not a bad case depend upon the merits of a better one. I think, therefore, it is wise. I have always thought that was the wisest policy. While I shall probably vote for every bill that has been reported by the committee with a single exception, and possibly for that—I do not think I shall vote for the appropriation for the Red river until I hear some explanation—I will vote against uniting them in one bill. If they are united, I shall probably vote for them; but I think it is the wisest policy, the sounder policy, the better policy, to let every appropriation stand upon its own merits.

Mr. WADE. I supposed that according to the course I proposed to take, each work would stand on its own merits if proposed as an amendment, as well as if in a separate bill. My only object was to expedite business. I supposed we could pass these bills in this way with much more expedition than we could pass them separately, each bill going through all the readings. If the committee find that there is distinction in the merits of the amendments offered, they can object to them, as well as to separate bills. I do not see any difference in that particular. I should be very unwilling, however, to do anything to embarrass the passage of these bills, or to change any vote in respect to them on account of the way in which they were considered. I really do not see any objection to the amendment I have offered. If the committee have objections to particular works, they may as well be stated on a motion to amend, as in regard to separate bills. It appears to me that, on reflection, the Senator from Maine will see that there is not much weight or force in the objection he had made.

Mr. CLAY. I trust that the course proposed to be pursued will not be adopted by the Senate. I do not see any motive for it, unless it is to bolster bad cases with some that are rather better. I do not think it a very reputable mode of legislation. It is a species of what is vulgarly called log-rolling, to combine all these measures together, and thereby confederate the friends of each for the passage of every other. I think the proper way is to let each bill stand on its own merits, as suggested by the Senator from Maine. Some of them are more objectionable than others, and it is certainly not proper to carry the bad along with the good, if there be any good. It is true I shall vote against all of them, but then I wish to test the sense of the Senate on each one separately. If the amendment is insisted upon, I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SEWARD. It was quite immaterial to me which course was pursued; but what seems important is that one or the other should be pursued as practically and speedily as possible. I shall vote with the Senator from Ohio for his amendment. It seems to me that the merits of each work can as well be discussed on a motion for amendment as it could on a separate bill, and it will save time. They all stand on one principle. I think it will secure for each one every vote that will be given for any one.

Mr. CLAY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. To exemplify the vicious practice into which we are about to fall if this amendment be adopted, I have a right to call on some one interested particularly in relation to this work to explain it, and especially whether it is now prosecuted in the same manner as the work at Chicago? whether the balance of the appropriation was not turned over to the city authorities? whether the city authorities of Milwaukee have not had charge of the work? whether they have not raised funds and proceeded to expend them, as well as the money raised by themselves as the balance of your appropriation on hand, in execution of the plan they themselves approve?

Mr. STUART. I take it for granted the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who reported these bills, can make any explanation necessary on the subject. These bills were all reported by the chairman.

Mr. CLAY. I cannot. I have not had time to go back and search the records to ascertain the facts. I have relied entirely upon the reports which have been sent me by the War Department, and they do not contain the information asked for by the Senator from Mississippi. There is no information of that character before us.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I rise to express the hope that this bill will be kept separate, and each one stand on its own merits. With the knowledge I have of Milwaukee harbor, I should go for an appropriation for it, but I think the committee acted wisely in reporting each measure separately. I take it for granted, if this is voted on to the Chicago bill, every other harbor improvement will be voted on, and they will be piled on in an omnibus bill, and get it so that even some of the friends of the measure will have to go against it. I shall vote against the amendment, not from any hostility to its object, but in order to have separate action on each work.

Mr. WADE. I perceive that some of the friends of these bills are opposed to the mode of proceeding I have marked out. With the permission of the Senate, I will withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the amendment will be withdrawn. The Chair hears none.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time; and the question was stated to be on its passage.

Mr. CLAY. I have only a word to say about this bill, and what I may say of that, I have no doubt may be well said of every other bill that has been reported by the committee. The title of the bill is delusive; it, in fact, asserts what is not true. It is a bill "to repair and secure the works at the harbor of Chicago," and yet there is no Senator on this floor, who is acquainted with that or the other lake harbors, who would, upon his honor, assert that the proposed appropriation, or ten-fold that sum, would secure that object. On the contrary, when an appropriation bill for this same work was pending during the last Congress, a bill proposing to appropriate double the amount appropriated by this bill, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] had the candor and courage to declare that the appropriation would not complete the improvement; that in consequence of the tides in that lake, annual appropriations would be necessary for an indefinite period of time in order to preserve it; that it was not a work to be accomplished in a day, or a year, or in several years, but it was one which required annual appropriations or annual repairs.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Alabama is in part right, and in part in error, in what he remarks on this question. It is very true that this appropriation is not going to complete the Chicago harbor, nor will any number of appropriations similar to this complete it. Money is to be expended there each year as long as it is a city, and the world lasts. It will never be completed, for the reason that the currents and drifting sands close up the mouth of the river; and appropriations from some source have to be made to keep it clear, or the harbor must be abandoned. But it is also true that this appropriation is made to repair and secure what has been done; and it will take every dollar of this money for that purpose alone. In other words, the pier you have made, inclosed, and cribbed, is so old that the timber is rotten, and it is falling to pieces; and the work done is all tumbling to pieces, and will be lost. Every dollar of this appropriation is merely to secure that which has been done, and which will fall to pieces, and be a total loss to the Government, unless secured. When this has been secured and preserved, I will not disguise the fact that next year, and the year after, there must be regular appropriations from some source, or otherwise the harbor will be closed up. I have intimated heretofore, and I believe it firmly yet, that there is a better plan than appropriations from this Government—the plan of tonnage duties, by which each harbor may be self-sustaining; but until that can be adopted, I must either sustain this system, or else allow the whole to go into disuse; you must give us the power to these improvements ourselves, or else you must make them. Whenever you give us the power to do it, I think we shall do it more effectually than you do; but in the mean time this is a simple appropriation, not to continue a harbor, not to enlarge it, but to preserve and save from destruction what you have done.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish merely to make a statement without entering into an argument on this question. About twelve years ago this work was commenced. Then the Chicago creek, or river, if I should so dignify it as to call it a river, had a bar at its mouth, over which sometimes you could scarcely drag an ordinary yawl. By constant expenditure they have made an entrance to what is termed the harbor of Chicago. At the time the work was commenced, its friends argued that it was necessary for a harbor of refuge. That was the argument then. I endeavored to expose it when the honorable Senator from Illinois and myself were members of the other House. The only storms which would make a vessel on the lake require a harbor of refuge, were such as rendered it impossible she should go into Chicago; the wind would take her beyond that. It is also true that the same wind bearing the driftings of the lake, would form a bar which would continue to expand until that bar was run across the river. It was a constant formation, and would extend to the extension of the piers. The Senator may very well say, therefore, that the work would never be complete.

At the time this work was commenced, and I think for reasons which did not hold in the case, there was a small village at the mouth of the creek of Chicago. Now a great city has grown—grown under the expenditure of the Government, making a harbor where nature had made none, and rendering labor profitable at the place, by the heavy expenditure the Government has been annually making. This city has now reached a size which should render it self-sustaining. I will concur with the proposition of the Senator, if he will strip it of all which is outside of the naked proposition, to turn over all the works at Chicago to the city—the works which the Government has constructed, and which have converted a little village on the lake shore into a great commercial city. Let them now be turned over to the commercial city. They have wealth enough to sustain them; they have interest enough to keep the works in repair, and replace them when they decay; and the fact that the Government has sustained them until they have reached decay, and sustained them with such great advantage to the population there, and thereabouts, I think would justify us now in turning the works over to the city, and letting them take care of them themselves.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It would not be sufficient to turn the work over to the city, unless you gave us power to levy tonnage duties upon vessels coming into the harbor. It is that right we want, when the work is turned over to us—the right to levy on the commerce coming in the expense of constructing and keeping the harbor in repair; but that right I have never been able to procure from the Congress of the United States, although I have asked for it several times. When that shall have been granted, it will be fully satisfactory to me. As a citizen and property-owner in Chicago, I believe that would be better for the city, although it is very probable that a large portion of the citizens think otherwise. That question is not now pending; the only point is, whether we shall preserve from destruction what has been done? This appropriation is not a question of extending or enlarging the harbor at all.

Mr. DAVIS. It is an appropriation to preserve the work, and that appropriation, as the Senator properly says, is to continue forever, to make repairs or to extend the work; but he says he is not willing to accept the work as a donation to the city of Chicago, though that city has grown up upon the work, unless we also give them the power to lay tonnage duties. That involves a very wide consideration; one into which I am not now able to enter, or I would gladly meet the Senator's proposition. I will, however, on this occasion, merely say that if, by tonnage duties, he means duties on the tonnage of foreign vessels, I have no objection; but if he means to lay tonnage duties upon vessels clearing from some port of the United States, and bound for this or other ports of the United States, then the Constitution stands in his way—a barrier which he cannot overcome.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will not argue the constitutional question now. If the Senator is right in that, he destroys the only remedy I have been able to devise for these appropriations by the Federal Government. I believe he is wrong on the constitutional point; and I say it with great respect to him, because it is not often on a constitutional question that I would express the opinion that he is wrong. However, I will not go into that question now. I will only add that I do not think the city of Chicago has been built up by these appropriations. We have many individuals there who each year expend four times as much money as the Government spends, on their own private account, in building up the city of Chicago.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask if the city would ever have been built up, if a harbor had not been made there by the Government?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think the city would have been built up. I believe, if the Government had never touched our lake harbors, but recognized our right to make our own and levy a reasonable tax for them, the lake cities would have been larger than they now are; but I either want the right to do it ourselves and tax for it, or else you must do it. Either allow us to do it, or do it yourselves. But a city must necessarily have grown up there, whether the Government aided it or threw obstacles in the way. Nature had marked it out. A great town was to have grown there, or in the immediate vicinity.

Mr. GWIN. Twenty-three bills have been reported here for the purpose of keeping in repair harbors on the Atlantic coast and on the lakes—none for the Pacific. We had an appropriation, many years ago, of $30,000 to preserve and protect the harbor of San Diego. Twenty thousand dollars more would, probably, complete that work; but I find here that it is left out entirely in this list of bills. That is a more important work than any which has been proposed here, so far as the protection of an important harbor is concerned. I do not know what induced this partial legislation on the subject. Not a dollar, except that amount of $30,000 has ever been appropriated to rivers and harbors on the Pacific coast, nearly two thousand miles in extent. I think if we are going to take up one bill here and another there because it has strength to get votes, we had better make a system of this matter or lay them all over. I am opposed to this favoritism, taking up this point or that, because it has political strength to pass it through the Senate.

Mr. STUART. I wish to say to the friends of these measures, that if they mean to pass them at all, those gentlemen who are in favor of them must not debate them. Now, if we take as much time on each bill as the Senator from Illinois has taken on the Chicago bill, they will not get through this session. I say there is no constitutional authority to levy tonnage duties; on that point I agree with the Senator from Mississippi; but there is no use in bringing in these collateral questions. I hope the friends of the measures will be content with voting. So far as the Senator from California is concerned, I believe he did not vote to take them up.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If many other friends of these measures raise constitutional questions I shall be compelled to go into the argument. I trust my friend will not raise any constitutional question.

Mr. STUART. I have not raised any constitutional question at all. The constitutional question was raised by the Senator from Mississippi; but I say again, that if these measures are to be passed, I simply ask their friends to content themselves with voting.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have so often expressed my opinion against the constitutionality and expediency of this system called internal improvements, that I do not intend to say anything now but for a point which, I think, was, upon a former occasion, started by the Senator from Michigan, and which the Senator from Mississippi has, I think, very unwittingly dropped into. I think, by a simple reading of the Constitution, he will find that there is no such distinction as he takes between foreign and domestic vessels, and there is no soundness at all in the argument of the Senator from Michigan, who holds the doctrine wider than the Senator from Mississippi. There is an express authority in the Constitution for tonnage duties to be levied by the States by the consent of Congress, and one of the great objects of the Constitution was to prevent there being a preference given to the ports of one State over those of another State. I am quite sure the attention of the Senator from Mississippi has not been called to one clause of the Constitution, or he would not have made the distinction he supposed to exist between foreign and domestic vessels.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Georgia has entirely misapprehended my design. The clause to which I referred is one of those clauses which mark the great purpose of the Union: to establish free trade between the States, and which declares—I cannot quote the language—that no State shall be bound to pay duties in the ports of another State.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have it before me, and I think the Senator will find that he is entirely mistaken in his distinction. This power is, in my judgment, unquestioned and unquestionable. It has been exercised occasionally since the foundation of the Government. It was granted to Georgia for some thirty years; it was granted to Maryland. It has been granted, I think, to all the States that have asked for it. I am not aware of any application of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It has been granted to Maryland, Georgia, Alabama, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and to other States.

Mr. TOOMBS. I never knew it refused.

Mr. DAVIS. That has always been in general terms, but the exact question, I think, has never been decided.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am quite certain it is not only constitutional, but eminently just. The clause of the Constitution to which the Senator from Mississippi refers is this:

"No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another."

Mr. DAVIS. That is the clause.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator will perceive that this applies as well to the foreign as to the coasting trade; in fact, in terms it applies to the foreign trade, because the expression is "pay duties;" and we do not pay duties in going from one port to another in the United States. Tonnage duties may as well be levied upon the coasting trade as upon the foreign trade. The next clause to which I shall advert is:

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops, or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay."

I say here is express authority to lay tonnage duties on the entire tonnage, foreign and domestic, that comes into the ports of any State, with the consent of Congress. It is a negative pregnant: the Constitution expressly declares that the States shall not lay such tonnage without the consent of Congress. Of course, with the consent of Congress, tonnage duties may be laid on foreign and domestic tonnage; and the other clause does not conflict with it. This is the construction given to it by all commentators, even by the Federalists, as well as by the more stringent and more accurate school to which the Senator from Mississippi and myself belong. I may illustrate it. There is a port, or a hole in the lake, which has been made by Government money, in Indiana, called Michigan City. We tried to make a harbor there; but nature seems to be too powerful even for Congress. If a vessel was bound from Buffalo for Michigan City, which is near Chicago, this clause would prohibit the paying of duties at Chicago. It means that a vessel bound to Richmond or Baltimore shall not be compelled to enter, clear, or pay duties, at Norfolk, because that would be giving an advantage to the ports of one State over those of another. It means nothing else. If a vessel leaves Buffalo for Michigan City, it would be unconstitutional to compel her to clear or pay duties or enter at Chicago; but, if she was intended for Michigan City, the Government could allow the State of Indiana to lay tonnage duties, under the express grant of the Constitution. This is a very important principle, and it lies at the bottom of this whole question. The enemies of tonnage duties are the friends of this present system. The Senator from Michigan, and those who want to levy money out of the public Treasury for their local improvements, have been the stern advocates of restriction upon the power of Congress to let them tax themselves. I submit that it is an entire misapprehension of this clause—its object or its words. The language is clear:

"Nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay, duties in another."

You shall not divert a vessel from her voyage; you shall not compel her to enter, clear, or pay duties in any port, unless she is bound for it. You cannot divert her from her voyage for the benefit of a State. That, however, does not limit the clear express power to lay tonnage duties with the consent of Congress. It is as broad as the word tonnage. It includes foreign and domestic vessels. It was so construed by our fathers immediately after the Revolution. Then this power was granted constantly for the purpose of keeping up lights, and it ought to be done now, for among the greatest abuses in this Government is the light-house system. Tonnage duties were originally laid for the purpose, among other things, of keeping up lights; but now the Government keeps up the light-house system itself. It is one of those devices under this Government by which the commercial classes throw the burdens of their business upon agriculture. England is frequently referred to as a bugbear to our honest, republican citizens, and they are told of its extravagance, its abuses, its class legislation. Why, sir, in England every dollar of the light-house expenses are paid by the owners of the ships, on the principle that every class of society ought to bear the legitimate burdens of its own business. In that well-governed country—ininitely better governed in all these respects than our own—that is the rule. Its wisdom and its justice are apparent throughout its whole legislation so far as the rights of the different classes and interests of that country are concerned, and we should be wise in many of these respects to imitate her example. Our vessels going into Liverpool pay heavy light duties, but her vessels coming here pay none, because, under our treaties, her vessels come in upon the same footing with our own. While she charges every vessel that enters her ports two or three hundred dollars for light dues, we charge them nothing.

This results from the fact that in the active and enterprising cities, where there are newspapers, the commercial classes, who have been alert from the beginning, have, by every possible means, endeavored to levy out of the common Treasury, to levy out of the agriculturist, to levy out of the mechanic, to levy out of the shopkeeper, the expenses of their own business. It is not strange that they should—such has always been the case with mankind. There never was, from the beginning of the world, and there never will be to its latest generation, a time when any given class of society will not plunder the rest if they can. That is the law of our nature. It is our business, as the representatives of all interests, to hold the scales even, to do exact justice to every class in the community, no matter what it pursues. Our Government goes on more rapidly in this downward career as these influences are more concentrated. You pay for lights. You persuade the ignorant people all over the Union that these expenses, being increased on commerce, fall on the goods. Well, let them start at the right place, and take their chances afterwards.

The light-house system is one illustration, the postage system is another. For the last six or eight years we have paid out of the Treasury a large portion of the expenses of the Post Office establishment. We have heard gentlemen in the Senate and House of Representatives declaiming most patriotically about economy and retrenchment and extravagance; and we have had laid on our tables, this morning, a bill to borrow $15,000,000, in addition to the $20,000,000 already borrowed at this session. Gentlemen here hope to escape the consequences of their legislation by putting it upon the Administration. Well, sir, I am not prepared to defend the Administration in any of its extravagance, any more than the Senate. In all these matters it is my object to discharge my duties as a Senator; and I must say that it does not strike me that they have done their duty in the retrenchment of the public expenditures, and I cannot but hold those here, who are squandering public money on unnecessary objects, to some accountability. It does not lie in the mouths of men here to complain of loans, to complain of the want of money. When they come to creating offices, and expending money from the public Treasury, they are, as they call it, liberal. There is no "meanness," no "narrow-mindedness" in their votes; but they complain of the Government when asking for the means to carry out these votes. You appropriate eighty, or ninety, or one hundred millions in a year, and you expect the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the money. He cannot do it, and he comes to you for a loan. He cannot create money; he cannot raise money; he cannot make a tax law; he can levy no money; he can get none except what is raised by law. The legislative department makes the appropriations. The Executive portion of the Government is responsible for every dollar of its own estimates, and no further. When Congress undertakes to appropriate money beyond that, it is responsible. It is responsible, also, to the country for voting bad estimates of the Departments, because it is the duty of the Senate and House of Representatives to cut down improper estimates, and it will not do for Congress to make improper appropriations, and then, with a view of getting votes, attack the Administration for asking for money. My object is to refuse such appropriations as are improperly asked for by the Government, and to limit it to those that are necessary. That is the only true road to economy. It cannot be arrived at in any other way.

We are asked in these bills for some three and a half millions; and we shall be asked this year for about six millions to maintain the postage system. For sixty years the Post Office Department supported itself. That was founded upon an eminently just principle, that wherever you can put the burden upon the person benefited, it ought to be done; it ought not to be dispersed over the whole community, or taken out of the public Treasury. In the Post Office, you can apportion the burden according to the benefit. At first, you charged enough postage on letters to meet the expenses of the Department. Later, under the delusion, under the folly well known to those who adopted it, that reducing the rates of postage would so increase the correspondence as to increase the revenues to a large extent, you reduced the rates, and commenced by voting a few hundred thousand dollars out of the Treasury to the Post Office Department as compensation for the free matter; and, at this session, you are asked to give six millions to that Department. I remember that my honorable friend from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] when he was at the head of that Department, which I will say he managed with signal ability and integrity, recommended a raising of the postage to an amount which would be adequate to maintain the establishment, and he used all legitimate means for restraining it within proper limits, giving all the facilities possible consistent with the great idea of its maintaining itself.

We are to spend this year six millions on the Post Office Department. These river and harbor bills propose to appropriate three or four millions more, and we are to pay one and a half million for light-houses, making about twelve millions for these items of expenditure, the greater portion of which were absolutely unknown until the last few years of the Republic. Many of these improvements are important to the country, and the expense of them ought to be levied upon the commerce which they benefit. It is but just and fair and constitutional that commerce should support its own burdens. If it wants better water, if it wants greater safety, it is able to pay for it, and ought to pay, and the expense should not be levied upon the agriculturist, or the other great industrial classes of the country. For this reason, this clause of the Constitution allows the States to levy tonnage duties, with the consent of Congress, and an early instance of the exercise of the power is to be found in the case of my own State, which, for the purpose of removing wrecks in the Savannah river, was allowed to lay tonnage duties for many years. Since I have been a member of Congress, I know a bill passed the other House allowing the State of Maryland to lay tonnage duties, to improve the Patapsco river. I know that the friends of internal improvements, those men who wanted to levy money out of the public Treasury for their local improvements, have opposed the exercise of this power. The Senator from Michigan does not want it. Since I have been in both branches of Congress, I have never known a sturdy applicant for public money to carry on internal improvements that was not opposed to the exercise of this power. I know the Senator from Illinois has, from time to time, said it was a better scheme; and, I believe, in a letter to a portion of the people of the United States, which I very highly approved, he suggested a plan of this kind, and it was talked about in newspapers; but I do not think it ever made its appearance in the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is entirely mistaken. There have been two votes on it by yeas and nays in this body, when it was brought forward on my motion.

Mr. TOOMBS. It escaped me.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator had not the good fortune to be here at the time.

Mr. TOOMBS. I very much regret that the proposition was defeated; but if you will look to those yeas and nays, I warrant you you can spot a greater number of the friends of these improvements out of the Treasury among its opponents.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TOOMBS. They do not want the power. If you levy the expense out of the commerce of a single place, Chicago or Savannah, the shipping interest will pay the burden—the men who get the benefit. That would be the correct principle; let those who go over the bridge pay the toll; let those who travel on the railroad pay the fare. These gentlemen know very well that by the present system they are levying money out of the pockets of people who get no direct advantage, to put in their own; and that is the reason they want no such power. It is one of the means by which enterprising persons combine together in order to take money out of the pockets of the whole people and appropriate it to their individual and local uses.

Now, sir, with reference to these improvements: the Senate expressed a very strong inclination that these bills should be returned from the Committee on Commerce. Our chairman sent to the Departments, and from my experience of them for thirteen or fourteen years I was amazed at their moderation. They sent us these propositions as necessary to preserve certain improvements. I think they did not embrace more than half the cases for which moneys have been appropriated heretofore; but I have no doubt, before you get through you will take the list of the last Congress, and there is not one of them that will not stand on the same great grounds of reason and justice as the bill before the Senate. I recollect that there were some curious disclosures about these matters before the committee. A Senator from one State, who wanted an improvement, came before the committee, and amongst the evidence which he presented in support of it was, that unless a certain improvement was made, the wharf property of a certain very rich man in the State of New York, to the amount of $800,000, would be destroyed. This man, who has wharf property at Oswego to the amount of $800,000 comes down here and says, "hurry out of the public Treasury your moneys for the purpose of protecting my property." I have no doubt that if we could get at the truth we should find that nine tenths of these improvements are stimulated by the same kind of personal interest. As far as my inquiries have gone, interest is the life-blood of these applications. Improvements are made for the benefit of owners of wharf property, owners of town sites, who desire to build up towns by spending among themselves the public money.

On a former occasion, waiving the question of constitutionality, which I had before very thoroughly discussed, I presented an issue upon the justice and equality of this scheme. I gave upon that occasion an illustration that is simple, clear, unanswerable, and, in my judgment, unanswerable. I took the State of Georgia. We had no river from our northwestern boundary to the coast. Nature had denied us even an imperfect communication. Lands were worth very little, because their products could not get to market. There was no stimulant for labor, because the avails of labor were worthless. The State of Georgia levied out of the people of the State $5,000,000, to build the most expensive, and what was then supposed to be the least paying portion of a railroad, to the coast. When we levied this tax out of our people we did not make the work free to those who carried produce over it; but there was a tax, a toll, a freight put upon passengers and produce, at such a rate as in time would reimburse the public for their expenditure; and then by individual enterprise, it was continued to Savannah, to the sea-coast, a distance of four hundred and thirty-eight miles. Did the Government of the United States give us any aid? Our people were poor; their industry was unproductive; but inasmuch as nature had denied us even an imperfect communication, instead of aiding us at all, you charged us at the rate of $1,500 a mile for duty on railroad iron. You put that burden on us in order to get our own provisions to sea and to market, and you gave the money to those who had such magnificent highways as the North river and the Mississippi and its tributaries. Was there justice in it. Was there justice to any agricultural community that their efforts should be thus burdened? Nature had given us no communication, and we had to make one entirely artificial for ourselves. The Government, so far from aiding us, taxed $1,500 a mile as duties on our railroad iron, and expended the money upon the North river, and the Mississippi, and other great rivers of the country, which now and then had a snag; the effect of which appropriations, perhaps, was to save insurance, and enable larger vessels to go into trade, and thereby lessen the freights on other people. They taxed the products of my constituents, the honest men whom I represent, in order to ease the burdens of other men's constituents.

I said that was unjust; even if you had the constitutional power, it was a bad use of it; and, upon that occasion, I went on to show that the general judgment of mankind, in this country and abroad, had been, that if the Government undertook this business, it ought to lay such tolls as would reimburse the public for the expenditure. New York did it in the case of her canal; Virginia did it with her canal. I know of no case where a State has undertaken an improvement for the transportation of commodities which did not lay a toll to reimburse the public, whom they had charged with its construction, for the outlay. That is the case in the French Government. It was true, in olden times, of the Greeks and Romans. It is so with the English, and all other civilized people; because the same eternal principle of natural justice has existed everywhere from the beginning. It was the same case in Massachusetts; she had no mode of communication to her sea-ports from the interior, and she built railroads, by using her credit and the means of her own people; she paid a tax on railroad iron, as Georgia did, except that she commenced earlier, when, probably, the tax was not quite as hard on her. Those persons who till the poor, cold, reluctant soil of western Massachusetts, and who had the greatest difficulties in getting their produce to market, have been taxed to clear out the Mississippi river, which, according to last year's returns, was freighted with one hundred and twenty millions of products going down, and as much coming up.

When gentlemen want an appropriation to help their port or their river, they get your topographical engineers, who are excellent fellows for increasing their business—that is all they want to do; they are the greatest curse we ever had in this country, as I have said frequently—to make statements, many of them the most ludicrous, the most absurd, and the most ridiculous ever put upon paper, and for making which they should be stricken from their position. They make statements of the vast amount of trade that goes in that particular channel. It strikes me that if there be a great amount of trade, so much the worse for the application, because the commercial interest is better able to pay the necessary duty. Throughout our whole vast country, we know that where ever there is a large amount of commerce there will be a great deal of traveling, a great deal of freight, and they are therefore much better able to bear the burden. Why should Congress levy pence out of the poor in order to lessen the freight upon the vast and rich cargoes which are transported upon those waters?

Mr. President, it is an unjust system; it is a wrong system; it is an indefensible system. Gentlemen talk of nationality, and now and then they throw in a glorification for the Union. These are the clap-traps by which they extort the labor of the poor for the benefit of the rich. The masses throughout the United States, who are referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts, the laboring men, are taxed upon their sugar and other commodities as much as the rich man; but they do not own town lots; they do not own fronts on Chicago river; they do not own eight hundred thousand dollars' worth of wharf property, like Gerrit Smith, at Oswego. The poor man pays into your Treasury for his daily consumption; he pays for the silk gown for his wife, and he pays for his own sugar; you grind money out of him, and you expend it for the purpose of increasing the already overgrown wealth of the millionaire. That is the effect of your system. I am opposed to it even if you had the power. In my own State, I voted to levy taxes on my constituents to build an improvement to enable them to get their products to market, and I thought it a wise and legitimate purpose of Government; but, at the same time, I proposed to reimburse the public Treasury for its temporary outlay. I made those who used the improvement pay for it; I made those whose lands were increased in value pay for it; I made those whose town lots were increased pay for the use of the work, so as to reimburse the public. It is not done here; and hence I say, if you had the constitutional power to make these improvements, you should adopt the principle which has been adopted in every State of the Union by the universal judgment of mankind, to make those pay who are benefited, and not to take from the common fund to build up local interests.

I have only recapitulated arguments which I have advanced heretofore in the Senate. I thought I would avail myself of this occasion to present briefly some of the views which I have before so repeatedly and so elaborately presented to the Senate and to the country.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall be very brief. I do not comprehend the point to which the Senator from Georgia referred, about reports for the improvement of the Mississippi. I do not know to what reports he refers; but upon them he seemed to give a most unqualified judgment against the topographical corps.

Mr. TOOMBS. I made no reference to any reports, but took the North river and Mississippi river as two of the rivers furnishing the finest navigation, and I said you had spent money to improve them. I did not allude to any report whatever.

Mr. DAVIS. I will merely say, in relation to the topographical officer, that he has nothing to do with the political question; his is the physical problem. On that he makes a report and leaves others to decide whatever political relation it may have. As to the Mississippi river, below St. Louis, where the great commerce exists, no improvement has been attempted by any construction whatever, until a recent one, under an appropriation made for clearing out the bar at the mouth of the river. All that was required in that deep stream was to take out the snags; and very little money has been expended for that. It is many years, fourteen, I am not sure that it is not fifteen years ago, before I entered either House of Congress, that I urged then, as the proper policy, that we should resist all internal improvements by the Federal Government, and claim the taxes upon the navigators of our river, as a means from which it should be improved.

Nor is this a new opinion I entertain in relation to tonnage duties; but in the argument it is presented that unless we give the power to lay tonnage duties, we deprive the people of the power to tax themselves. It seems to me that is not the proposition. It is merely an argument that the Constitution has deprived them of the power to tax other citizens of the United States for coming into a harbor of the United States. It is not taxing themselves, it is taxing others. The restriction in the Constitution as I construe it, that no State shall impose tonnage duties without the consent of Congress, is one which involves very little hazard, those tonnage duties being on foreign commerce. It would follow that no port of the United States or the people residing in it would willingly lay a tax which would be a burden upon their own commerce, or in other words, a tax upon themselves, and would influence them unfavorably in every possible aspect if they levied a tax beyond their extreme necessity. Not so, however, in relation to internal trade. Take the case to which the Senator alludes, Savannah. If Savannah desired, to the injury of Charleston, to lay tonnage duties; if she chose to impose a tax upon vessels sailing from Charleston, bound to Savannah, for the injury of Charleston, she might bear the tax at Savannah, because of the effect it would have upon a rival town.

Then it is found in the Constitution that one clause precedes the other: first there is the great declaration that no vessel bound to and from ports of the United States shall pay any duty whatever. It will be remembered that at that period of our existence the transportation was by sea. We did not then use these great rivers, at least very little the North river, and not at all the Mississippi; our population did not even extend into the territory which is watered. Steam had not been brought to propelling vessels, without which the Mississippi never could have been used as it now is. Railroads had not been constructed. Commerce was transmitted along the sea. Commercial cities rose along the sea. The country was the dependent of the sea in all matters of commerce. Then to exempt a vessel coming from one State to another from any duty, was to make free-trade between the States; and that was one of the objects of the Union, one of those things which resulted from the fraternal feeling growing out of the revolutionary struggle.

Then the Senator from Georgia argues that the power given to a State to impose tonnage duties with the consent of Congress, meant duties upon all vessels which came into her ports. Just before that lies the prohibition, the protection, if you please, the great shield thrown over free trade between the States. It could have been but an admission that the State could impose any duty which Congress itself could impose. I deny that Congress has the power to impose by any law a duty upon a vessel clearing from one port to another in the United States. Free trade is at the bottom of the Constitution, and this is a violation of free trade. As well, in the present time, when the power exists, might we impose duties on goods brought on railroads across the line of one State; but the prohibition in the first instance covers the grant in the second. I do not attach to it the importance the Senator from Georgia does. It is a term that has a technical application. But take the case in point, the case which is now before us of Chicago. It had no harbor by nature. There were no navigable waters there—not navigable for sea-going vessels. If, then, Chicago chose to take these works by the grant of the United States, to continue the basin by constant dredging—it is a basin of the city, not the navigable water of the world—nothing save the reservation in relation to the navigation of all the streams in that country would intervene; they would have a perfect right to impose any duty they pleased on a vessel coming into the basin. That would be an artificial harbor, not a port in which they would have such a right under any international law.

Then further, you may avoid the words tonnage duty altogether; and the Senator has not given us what are the difficulties we encounter in the improvements of the Mississippi. He has applied to the Mississippi arguments that would belong to the sea and ports of the sea, but which do not belong to the navigation of that river. I would ask how he would collect tonnage duties on a vessel clearing from one port to another, and apply it to the Mississippi river? The vessel is not bound to start from any particular landing; she is not bound to stop at any particular landing. She may start below the landing at St. Louis; she may land above the landing at New Orleans. Then she would be free from any tax, exempt from the tonnage duties levied upon her because she had run from St. Louis to New Orleans.

Again, they run unequal distances over unequal parts of the river. There are no ports, there are landings along the highways, and they have a constitutional right to use them. Yet the local authorities clearly have a right to impose a tax on them, if they land at a wharf, an artificial construction, and use it for the deposit of freight. A great variety of taxes may be imposed on river-going boats, but none of them belong to the idea of tonnage duty. It would be unjust to levy a tax, in the form of tonnage duties, on vessels sailing from one port to another, when all the benefit derived, all the benefit conferred, is in the port; whereas here the benefit is strong over the whole line of travel from St. Louis to New Orleans. You take an obstruction out of the river; it is not entering into the port of New Orleans.

It would rather be a sort of toll. We should have to erect toll-gates all along the river; and I would ask the Senator—here is another constitutional question—could you erect toll-gates along the Mississippi? Could you require boats to land and pay toll for the free navigation of that constitutional highway? If not, then, I say, you are driven at last to resort to the taxes which may be imposed at the landing, and on that mighty stream with its mighty commerce, these taxes, though so small as scarcely to be felt, would create a fund quite adequate to the very few improvements which the river requires. Before I entered Congress, and since, I have been an advocate of resorting to some mode of taxation which would throw upon the locality benefited the burden of the work. Upon a select committee with the Senator from Illinois, when a member of this body on a former occasion, the subject was fully discussed.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MAY 25, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 148.

After he introduced his proposition, I thought he had departed from the position which we had occupied on that select committee, and that he had involved himself in a constitutional difficulty. I think so now.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am following the argument of the Senator with a view to make its application. For instance, to the improvement of the mouths of the Mississippi river. I would inquire how he would apply his theory to the improvement of the bar at the mouth of that river? How would he lay his tax?

Mr. DAVIS. Upon foreign vessels.

Mr. BENJAMIN. He would have the State of Louisiana tax tonnage on foreign vessels?

Mr. DAVIS. Exactly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I merely wished to understand the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. I will also say that that is a tax which may be safely trusted to the local authorities, because it is a tax they would never impose in any onerous degree. Their object would be to reduce it to the very lowest point to encourage vessels to come into their port, and I think that is the true limitation contained in the clauses of the Constitution, when they are taken together. It was a wise prohibition to prevent duties on vessels passing from one port in the United States to another. Otherwise, it might be, from rival interests, it might be from rival feelings which I am sorry to say have been developed to an extent that could hardly have been contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, duties might be levied to exclude vessels coming from a particular port, and under the name of tonnage duties they would be made prohibitory. It is turning over a power to destroy what I consider one of the most beautiful features in our Government—free-trade between the States.

The light-houses are also brought in. That is only a part of the same general thing. These light-houses are not built for foreign commerce. If they had been built for foreign commerce, you ought not to have had one fifth the number. You have multiplied them until they are really an embarrassment to the sea-going vessel. As she approaches your coast she is at a loss to know what the light means. You have multiplied them for the coastwise trade. They are free, because you impose no tax upon the coastwise trade. We have fostered coast navigation under the same theory which the Senator from Alabama so recently overturned in relation to the bounties on fishing vessels; but I refer to it now because it is a case in point. We lay no tax upon the use of those lights, no lightage tax; but it belongs to our theory of fostering the coastwise trade and making it as free as possible, between the different ports of the United States. I think that is a distinction which is to be drawn in relation to the light-houses.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to say a word or two—

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a motion. I rise for the purpose of submitting a motion to postpone all prior orders, that the Senate may take up the loan bill. I wish to test the sense of the Senate, whether they will take up that bill to-day. I now submit that motion.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WADE. I hope that all the friends of the harbor and internal improvement bills, will stand by them in preference to any appropriation or loan bill, because it is perfectly evident now, from what we have seen, that if these measures get behind the appropriation bills, or loan bills, they will go over, and we shall not be able to say when they will be taken up again. There is no danger of the appropriation bills or the loan bills being defeated by any process that I know of. You cannot get rid of them. In my judgment, it would be prudent in the friends of such measures, as it is necessary to pass before Congress adjourns, to keep them ahead of loan and appropriation bills. I hope the friends of harbor bills will vote against taking up the loan bill, and will continue the consideration of the bill now before the Senate, until it is disposed of.

Mr. CLAY. I would suggest to the Senator that we had better raise the money before we spend it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I hope the Senate will not postpone the prior orders. The loan bill has just been brought in, and I think we ought to have some time to consider it. I hope the special order will be taken up, and that the Senate will not postpone any pending measure for the purpose of passing a bill to borrow money. The special order is a proposition to enable the people to increase the revenue of the country by increasing the productive capacity of the country, by providing homes for the people. This, I think, is a very important matter; and yet it appears that everything, however important, must give way that the Government may be authorized to borrow money, and that the bills making appropriations of money may be passed. I hope we shall be permitted to take up and dispose of other important measures, before passing the appropriation or loan bills.

Mr. SEWARD. It is now one o'clock. I do not know what the effect of a vote to postpone the prior orders will be on the present question. I desire to know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot in the chair.) That motion was made before the hour arrived for taking up the special orders, and the Chair regards that motion as not including the special orders; but the hour for taking up the special orders has now arrived, and it is the duty of the Chair to present the special orders to the consideration of the Senate. It is in the power of the Senate to dispose of them as it sees fit. The Chair will now regard the motion of the Senator from Virginia as embracing the special and the general orders.

Mr. HUNTER. It does.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Then I understand that will postpone the homestead bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I hope the Senate will not postpone it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on postponing all prior orders, with a view to take up the loan bill.

The question being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Crittenden, Davis, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Sidel, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wade—19.

FIFTEEN MILLION LOAN.

The Senate accordingly, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 396) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of fifteen million dollars. The bill was debated at some length, several amendments were made in its provisions, and its further consideration was postponed until to-morrow. [This debate will be published in the Appendix.]

INDIANA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

In the course of the debate on the loan bill, during the remarks of Mr. Wilson, Mr. PUGH asked unanimous consent to make a report, and no objection was made.

Mr. PUGH. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the credentials of the present Senators from the State of Indiana, together with the testimony in the case, have instructed me to report by resolution, and to move that the resolution and testimony be printed. If the minority of the committee desire to make any statement, I move that they have leave to print their views likewise. I move that the resolution and accompanying papers be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to hear that report. I did not know that a report was to be made.

Mr. PUGH. Read the report. It is very short. The Secretary read it, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of GRAHAM N. FITCH and JESSE D. BRIGHT, Senators from the State of Indiana, together with the documents and testimony relative to that subject, has had the same under consideration, and reports by resolution as follows:

Resolved, That GRAHAM N. FITCH and JESSE D. BRIGHT, Senators returned and admitted from the State of Indiana, are entitled to their seats which they now hold in the Senate as such Senators aforesaid; the former until the 4th day of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th of March, 1863, according to the tenor of their respective credentials.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot.) The question is on the motion to print the report and accompanying documents.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know what the accompanying papers are; whether they embrace all the papers referred to the committee?

Mr. PUGH. They comprise the testimony taken; certain affidavits which were offered by the sitting Senators, which are put separately, and upon which the majority of the committee have passed no opinion, but they think proper to bring them before the Senate, inasmuch as the Senate referred them to the committee; and the transcripts from the Indiana Senate Journal, which were furnished by the Senator from Illinois himself, at the last Congress; and certain transcripts from the House Journal, and testimony and documents relating to the question. I collected them as carefully as I could, to present every view, and I think the Senator will find that they contain everything that is relevant to the case. At all events I present the report of the majority of the committee, and ask that it be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I prefer that the motion should lie over until I see or ascertain what papers are to be printed. I presume, from what the Senator from Ohio states, that all are embraced; but I should like to see whether the papers referred at the last session are included. I was not aware that the report was being made. The last meeting of the committee—

Mr. PUGH. I cannot consent that the motion to print the papers shall go over. We are near the end of the session, and it will take some days to print the papers. I wish to bring the question before the Senate at the earliest possible moment. I state to the Senator that among the papers which he furnished at the last Congress, were transcripts of the entire day's proceedings in the Senate of Indiana, a great part of which had no connection with the subject. I have stricken out everything except the resolutions that bear on the election.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does it embrace the protests and all?

Mr. PUGH. The protests and papers and certificates are there, every one of them, without exception. If the Senator finds anything omitted he can have it printed. I give him my word it shall be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not desire to delay the matter at all. I presume I can look at the papers during the session of the Senate to-day. Perhaps it might be called up before we adjourn. I should like to see what the papers are before the question is disposed of. If the Senator will let it lie over for an hour or two, I will look at the papers and see what is proposed. I can do it, perhaps, in half an hour.

Mr. PUGH. I would rather have the motion to print put. If there is a paper omitted, the Senator shall have it printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I raise, then, the question whether it is in order to move to print this report in the midst of a debate upon another bill, without any examination of the papers. I do not think it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will answer that question at once. It would not have been in order without unanimous consent. That consent was given. That consent having been given, the whole subject is before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—
Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator from Illinois will permit me. If I understand the gentleman who made the report, the only object is to get the papers in the hands of the Printer as soon as possible. If, after this order be given, there is anything that the Senator from Illinois wants added, there can be no possible objection to its being added. If there is anything whatever omitted that he wishes put in, the committee, or a majority of the committee, will add it to its report and have it printed. There is nothing here for printing but what was before our committee. If the Senator is afraid that anything may have been omitted which he would like to have printed, it shall be added on his suggestion at any moment after we have made the order to print.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The report is brought here in the midst of pending business. I was not aware myself that it was coming in. When the committee last met, it was not determined as to what the report would be. I have had myself no impression what the report would be. I did not know what papers would come in. The report is not a unanimous one. Certainly it is not unanimous, as far as I am concerned, because I did not know that it was to be made, and there was some disagreement in the committee. It seemed to me not very unreasonable that the Senator from Ohio should suffer these papers to lie half an hour to be looked at. The case has been here more than a year. I have repeatedly called attention to it. I do not propose to delay it for any length of time. I merely wish to run over the list of papers, informing the Senator, at the same time, that before the Senate adjourns he can take his order, for I do not wish to resist it; but it looks to me exceedingly discourteous to a member of the committee, and unreasonable to insist that the vote must be taken this moment, and no other moment.

I can accomplish all the object I have by following the suggestion made by the Senator from Louisiana. If any paper which is omitted can be added afterwards, perhaps it is as well; but it seemed to me that it was not throwing any obstacle in the way, or asking anything unreasonable, to request that the papers should lie on the table for a few moments, until I could see what they were; and I was a little astonished, and am now, that anybody should make an objection to such a proposition. It is all I asked; and had the suggestion been made at first, perhaps I should have fallen into it at once; but, having asked merely to see the list of papers, I still insist that it is but courteous and proper that I should have that opportunity. I trust that, if the Senator insists upon his motion to print the papers instantly, the Senate will vote it down. I give notice to the Senate that I do not wish to delay the matter beyond its present sitting. I merely want to see what the papers are, they never having been submitted to me at all in the committee, and I not knowing what were to be reported, the report not having been agreed upon when the committee last met. If there is anything unreasonable in that, I certainly cannot perceive it.

Mr. PUGH. What the Senator from Illinois demands as a matter of right, that he shall have; but when he puts to me a mere question of courtesy, and I make him a courteous answer, but he chooses to persist, he can take all he can get by that. Now, I stated to him at the time that if there was any paper omitted, he should have the opportunity to add it. That suggestion was repeated by the Senator from Louisiana. He did not take it from me, though he took it from my colleague on the committee. So much as to the question of courtesy. He has no right to the papers at all. That is the report of the majority of the committee. Who gave him the right to overhaul their papers? Nobody. He has no such right.

As to the question whether the committee acted, there is no doubt about that. A vote was taken at a special meeting of the committee on last Saturday morning, to which the Senator has referred. Two of the members were absent. The chairman then stated to the committee, and it was agreed upon that he should take their votes. He did report their votes, and I was instructed by the majority of the committee to make this report. I should have made it during the morning hour, only I was not able to get a sufficient memorandum of the extracts from the House Journal of the Legislature of Indiana, and I have been compelled to wait here for that purpose.

Now as to the importance of time: we are at the end of the session, and if we are to decide the case at all, the papers ought to be printed, and printed at once. Many hours to-day may be saved. I do not know but that we can get the papers printed by to-morrow morning, if we do not delay them.

I say again, what I said at first. The Senator would not take it from me, though he took it from the Senator from Louisiana. If there is a single paper which he deems material, it shall be added. I do not admit the right of the Senator from Illinois to take possession of a report which I make to the Senate for his own private purposes; and I say, therefore, that when he spoke to me as to a question of courtesy, I made a courteous answer. When he claims a right, I stand on my right to insist that the question shall be put on the printing. If the Senate do not choose to vote for it, that is none of my business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish nothing, sir, but what is right and proper; and the Senator from Ohio, I presume, will have to wait before he gets his question put on the printing. It is my right to object to that motion. I may move to postpone it, or to make any other motion which I think proper to make; and I suppose it to be my right, being a member of the committee, to see the papers before the committee. I suppose it my right, without the permission of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PUGH. Does the Senator claim the right to see my report from the committee?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I claim the right, when the report is made, to see it; I claim the right as a member of the committee to know what the committee report. There is very little in having committees if the papers referred to them are not to be shown to the members of the committees. I do not know that there is any importance at all in the suggestion which I made; certainly no time would have been taken up with it but for the persistency of the Senator from Ohio. All I asked was simply to look at the papers which he had reported to be printed—papers which have been before the committee, and with which we are somewhat familiar. I presume there are no new papers there which I have not seen; but I desire to know whether all the papers are embraced which those members of the committee who do not agree with the Senator from Ohio think ought to be printed—a matter which can be determined in a very few minutes. The Senator is not willing that I should have that opportunity. Now, in order to test the view of the Senate to know whether it is unreasonable or not, I make a distinct motion to postpone the consideration of the order to print for one hour. I do not wish more than an hour to examine them.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope that by general consent the matter will be laid aside for one hour, so that we may go on with the loan bill. I presume the Senator from Ohio will not object.

Mr. PUGH. I do object.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

After disposing, for the day, of the loan bill, Mr. BENJAMIN again called up the subject.

Mr. PUGH. I withdraw the motion to print, which I made. I have a right to withdraw it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. We must print the papers. I renew the motion. The Senator makes his report, and I move to print it.

Mr. PUGH. I have made the report under instructions.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to print it.

Mr. PUGH. I made the motion to print, this morning, and I now withdraw that motion, it not having been acted upon. As to the resolution itself, that will come up hereafter. I now ask the Senate to excuse me from further service as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. PUGH. I withdrew the motion to print, and I do not think the Senator from Louisiana got the floor to make any motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the right of the Senator from Ohio to make the motion, and to withdraw it; and then the Senator from Louisiana interposed a motion to print the report and accompanying documents.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I want to see what the report is. I want it printed.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. I made my motion before the Senator from Louisiana got the floor away from me. I now make it again, however—that the Senate excuse me from further service upon the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 24, 1858.

House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. F. SWENTZEL.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, asking an appropriation to repay Robert J. Walker, late Governor of Kansas, for certain extraordinary expenses incurred by him while Governor of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, setting forth the receipts and disbursements for the service of the Post Office Department for 1856-7; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary, informing the House that he had approved and signed the following acts:

An act to prevent the inconvenient accumulation in the Post Office Department of postmasters' quarterly returns;

An act to create a land district in the Territory of New Mexico;

An act to revive an act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs, or their legal representatives, of William Conway, deceased;"

An act for the relief of Regis Loisel or his legal representatives;

An act for the relief of the representatives of William Smith, deceased, late of Louisiana;

An act for the relief of Isaac Drew and other settlers upon the public lands in the State of Wisconsin;

Joint resolution for paying the compensation of stenographers employed by committees of the House of Representatives;

An act for the relief of Brevet Major H. L. Kendrick;

An act for the relief of Isaac Carpenter;

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Marie Melincs;

An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to Ansel Wilkinson;"

An act for the relief of Pierre Gagnon, of Natchitoches, Louisiana;

An act for the relief of Thomas Smithers;

An act to increase the pension of John Richmond; and

An act for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Broussard, deceased.

BUSINESS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was business for the District of Columbia, made a special order for this day and to-morrow.

Mr. GOODE. I am very happy to inform the House that the Committee for the District of Columbia have determined to retain in their own room for the remainder of the session all the business relating to the District of Columbia which does not meet the unanimous approval of the committee. They will report no business to the House which might give rise to any debate; and they will, therefore, occupy but little of the time of the House.

MICHAEL NASH.

Mr. GOODE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, made an adverse report upon the bill of the Senate (No. 261) for the relief of Michael Nash, of the District of Columbia; which was laid on the table, and the bill ordered to be printed.

TURNPIKE ROAD.

Mr. GOODE, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon a memorial relative to a turnpike road in the District of Columbia; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

BILLS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. GOODE. I move that the bills on the Speaker's table relating to the business of the District of Columbia be taken up and disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Virginia desires taken from the Speaker's table for action the bills from the Senate in reference to the District of Columbia?

Mr. GOODE. That is my desire.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay such bills before the House.

There being no objection, the following bills were taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and disposed of as indicated below:

An act (S. No. 191) for the benefit of the public schools in the city of Washington.

Mr. GOODE. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia. It is not our intention to report it back this session.

The motion was agreed to.

An act (S. No. 182) for the enforcement of mechanics' liens on buildings, &c., in the District of Columbia. Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

An act (S. No. 168) to relieve the corporation of Georgetown from the expense of making and repairing roads west of Rock creek. Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

An act (S. No. 227) authorizing the organization of a fire department in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GOODE. That is a bill which has been matured in the Senate, and its provisions have been scrutinized by the Committee for the District of Columbia, and unanimously approved by its members. I therefore move that it now be read, and put on its passage.

The Clerk read the bill in extenso.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. PHELPS.

HARDY AND LONG.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to have entered a privileged motion. My colleague, [Mr. CARUTHERS,] who is not here because of indisposition, desired to have entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which a bill reported for the relief of Hardy & Long was referred to the Court of Claims. I make that motion, and ask that it shall be entered, to be taken up for action at a future day.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the Committee for the District of Columbia had the bill now before the House under consideration, and believed that it was impossible to correct the disorders of this District by passing a law of this kind, which gave this corporation power over an organization which is perfectly incorrigible. Therefore, they propose to do away with the policy of fire companies in the District, and give the Common Council authority to establish a paid fire department. For that purpose, I have proposed a substitute for the Senate bill.

Mr. BLISS. I wish to make an inquiry. If I heard the Senate bill correctly, it provides that the members of the fire department shall act in certain cases as special constables. Is that so?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURNETT. The Committee for the District of Columbia will move that that part of the bill shall be stricken out.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the Committee for the District of Columbia were unanimous in recommending this bill, and were unanimous on the ground that it was necessary to provide additional means, or rather more efficient means, for the extinguishment of fires in this District than are now to be had. The Government has erected here immense and expensive buildings, costing millions of dollars, and which have been put up within a few years past, and it is a matter of prudent economy to provide for some more efficient means of protecting those buildings from fires than by the present fire engines.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a point of order. Does not this bill make an appropriation, and must it not, under the rules, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The point is well taken. The substitute makes an appropriation, and must, therefore, have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to the bill going to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GOODE. If the bill offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania be voted down, the original bill will stand, and that does not contain an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The House, however, would first have to vote on the substitute.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to amend the original bill by striking out the provision making firemen special constables; and then I move that the bill and amendments be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

BOUNDARY LINE OF TEXAS.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up and agree to certain Senate amendments to the bill for running the boundary line of Texas. It is absolutely necessary that the bill should be passed at once.

Mr. DEAN. I call for the regular order of business.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA RESUMED.

An act (S. No. 241) relating to the manner of holding and transmitting the title to certain church property therein mentioned, was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. GOODE. There are principles in that bill which will involve discussion, and I move that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill making an appropriation for the repair of certain roads in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GOODE. There were some other gentlemen who desired to make reports in reference to the District of Columbia; but, as I do not see them present, I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair,) and took up the Calendar of business pertaining to the District of Columbia.

DEAF AND DUMB, AND BLIND INSTITUTION.

The first bill on the Calendar was taken up and read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 247) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbian Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and the Blind," approved February 16, 1857.

Mr. BURNETT. I move that the committee take up the Senate bill, which is identical in its terms, and consider that in place of the House bill.

No objection being made, the Senate bill was taken up for consideration.

The bill provided that, in addition to the provision made in the act to which this bill is an amendment, for the maintenance and tuition of pupils in said institution, the sum of $3,000 per annum, payable in quarterly installments, shall be allowed for a period of five years, for the payment of salaries and incidental expenses of said institution; and that $3,000 be appropriated for the present fiscal year, payable out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; that the deaf, dumb, and blind children of all persons in the military and naval service of the United States, while such persons are actually in such service, shall be entitled to instruction in said institution on the same terms as deaf and dumb and blind children belonging to the District of Columbia; that all receipts and disbursements under the bill shall be reported to the Secretary of the Interior, as required in the sixth section of the act to which this bill is an amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask that the report may be read, and I ask the attention of the committee to it while it is being read.

The report states that the institution was incorporated by Congress at their last session, and the act of incorporation made provision for the payment out of the Treasury of $150 per annum for the maintenance and tuition of each deaf, dumb, or blind pupil properly belonging to the District of Columbia, whose parents or guardians were pecuniarily unable to give them the advantages of such an institution. The institution thus organized commenced with five pupils, which number has since been increased to seventeen, and a further increase of the number to twenty-five or more is anticipated within a year, while the number of this class of unfortunate persons who will need the benefits of this institution will be fifty or more within a very few years. Of the seventeen pupils now in the institution, fifteen are supported by the Government, and two by their parents. Two things were obvious to the committee:

First. That such an enterprise could not be started without pecuniary grants from some source, and those not meager or suited. A few of the citizens of this District have contributed liberally for this purpose; but the burden has borne hard upon the few who have struggled nobly to give it a hopeful commencement. It is, however, embarrassed with a portion of the outlay absolutely essential to its first successful operation, which the subscription of the citizens was not sufficient to meet.

Second. The sum of $150 per annum is not sufficient to feed and clothe a pupil; and even when parents or guardians furnish the necessary clothing, it leaves but a small surplus to meet the payment of salaries and other necessary expenses. To meet this deficiency, but two sources are open to the directors. The first is, by soliciting subscriptions from the benevolent. That source, always uncertain, has, however, during the late financial trouble, become wholly unavailable. The other alternative was to petition Congress for the necessary aid. This the petitioners have done. It was the opinion of the committee that it will be very difficult for the directors to carry on this institution, even in a crippled and inefficient condition, without some aid from the Government. The object is one which commands the sympathy of the civilized world. This is seen in the liberal endowments and assistance which have been granted similar institutions in Europe, and among the different States of our Confederacy. The Congress of the United States manifested their appreciation of the object not long after the introduction of the system of mute instruction into this country, by a generous donation of lands to the American asylum at Hartford, Connecticut, and of which that institution has accumulated a fund of about three hundred thousand dollars. Grants of land have also been made by Congress to the deaf and dumb, as well as the insane asylums of Kentucky; and the same body has also provided most liberally for the insane of this District. Many of the States have also made ample provision for the instruction of these unfortunate classes of their population, by the construction of buildings, and a per capita allowance for indigent pupils, besides making annual appropriations to pay salaries and meet contingencies. The amount allowed last year for board, tuition, and clothing, in the New York institution for the deaf and dumb, was $180 for each pupil; in addition to which the Legislature makes a regular appropriation of $5,000, per annum. Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Virginia, Indiana, North Carolina, Michigan, Texas, and perhaps other States, have institutions for the instruction of the deaf and dumb, or of the blind, or both, which have been established, and are supported, in whole or in part, by appropriations from the State treasuries. The committee could not recommend Congress to be less mindful of that unfortunate class of our fellow beings within their jurisdiction than are the Legislatures of the several States enumerated. The committee were informed that the average cost of supporting deaf, dumb, and blind pupils in the principal State institutions, including the salaries of superintendents, matrons, and teachers, and all contingencies, does not vary much from two hundred dollars each. When the number of pupils is small, the cost of each must, of course, be greater, for the expenses do not increase in the same proportion as the number of pupils increase. The directors of the Columbian Institution ask an annual appropriation of $3,000, in addition to the per capita allowance now provided for, in order to pay up arrearages, and place the institution upon a sure footing; and with this the directors pledge themselves to meet all its current expenses, without calling upon Congress for further aid. The committee, therefore, reported a bill authorizing the payment of the amount requested, limiting it, however, to a term of five years. The committee also thought proper to introduce a section placing the deaf, dumb, and blind children of persons in the military and naval service of the United States on the same footing in relation to this institution as the deaf, dumb, and blind in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURNETT. I move, unless gentlemen desire to move amendments, that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTIONS IN WASHINGTON.

The next bill on the Calendar, a bill regulating municipal elections in the city of Washington, was taken up for consideration.

The bill, which was read, provides that the second section of the act approved May 16, 1856, entitled "An act to provide for at least two election precincts in each ward in the city of Washington, and for other purposes," shall be repealed; and that from and after the passage of this act every free white male resident of the city of Washington of the age of twenty-one years, (vagrants, paupers, felons, and persons non compos mentis excepted,) who shall have resided in the city one year immediately preceding the day of election, and who shall be a citizen of the United States at the time he offers to vote, and shall have paid the school tax and all taxes on personal property due from him, shall be entitled to vote in the ward of which he shall be on the day of election, and shall have been for thirty days preceding a bona fide resident, for Mayor, members of the Board of Aldermen and Common Council, register, collector, surveyor, assessors, and such other officers as may hereafter be made elective; provided, that in all cases where the person so otherwise entitled and offering to vote shall not have been a resident of the particular ward in which he is resident bona fide upon the day of election for the space of one month immediately previous thereto, then such person shall be entitled to vote in the ward in which he last previously resided.

The second section provides that no person shall be allowed to vote at any election as aforesaid, unless he shall have been returned on the books of the corporation of said city as subject to a school tax; and that it shall be the duty of the register of said city, in addition to the names of persons so returned by the assessors of said city, upon satisfactory proof, under oath, to be administered by some justice of the peace of the county of Washington, that the name of any such person has been accidentally or willfully omitted from said books, to place the same thereon at any time after he shall have received said books from the assessors, up to ten days before the said election; and in case any such person shall be absent from the city at said time, or under twenty-one years of age, and his name, in consequence thereof, be omitted from said books, then upon his return, or becoming of age, at any time after the day of registration, and before the day of said election; and upon satisfactory proof thereof made as aforesaid, the said register shall place the name of such person so returning on said books. That if any person shall knowingly swear falsely in the premises, he shall, upon indictment and conviction thereof before any court competent to try the same, be adjudged guilty of willful and corrupt perjury, and punished accordingly.

The third section provides that if any commissioner or other person appointed to superintend municipal elections shall willfully and knowingly refuse to receive the vote of a person possessing the legal qualifications to vote at such election as prescribed in this act, or shall in any other manner hinder or prevent the legal exercise of the elective franchise in the city of Washington, he shall, upon indictment and conviction thereof before the criminal court of the District of Columbia, be subject to imprisonment in the county jail for a period of time not exceeding six months, and to a fine not exceeding $200 in each case, at the discretion of the court, and shall thereafter be ineligible to any office under the city corporation, besides being liable in damage to the party whose vote shall be so rejected.

The fourth section provides that the penalties prescribed in the first three sections of this act shall apply to any commissioners or other person appointed to superintend an election who may willfully and knowingly receive, or permit to be received, the vote of any person not legally authorized to vote; and, also, to any person or persons who may vote illegally, or more than once, at any municipal election; and, also, to any person or persons who may willfully disturb, molest, hinder, or interfere with said commissioners while in the discharge of their duties, or who may willfully disturb, molest, hinder, or interfere with any voter while at or going to the polls; and in making the returns of any election to the register of the city, the commissioners or other persons appointed to superintend said election shall also make a return of all the ballots cast on the occasion, to be securely kept for a period of at least two years.

The fifth section provides that in the joint meeting of the Boards of Aldermen and Common Council for the appointment of commissioners of elections, as provided in the sixth section of the act approved May 15, 1820, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose," no member of either board shall be entitled to vote for more than two of the three commissioners to be elected for each ward or election precinct, and in all cases the three persons having the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected.

The sixth section provides that all elections to be held in the city of Washington for municipal officers the polls shall be opened at seven o'clock, a. m., and closed at seven o'clock, p. m.; and that it shall be the duty of the register of the city to furnish the commissioners of elections in each election precinct, previous to opening the polls at every election, a list of all the qualified voters of such precinct, as provided in the first and second sections of the bill, designating those who shall have paid the taxes due from them, so as to facilitate said commissioners in the discharge of their duties; provided, however, that the sixth section shall not have the effect to exclude from voting any one who, possessing all other qualifications required by this act, and whose name may not have been placed on the said registry, either from accident or by the default of the said register, shall establish the same to the satisfaction of the commissioners of election, and shall exhibit a receipt showing all taxes due from him to be paid; that full power and authority is given to the corporation of Washington to increase the number of election precincts in each ward, to appoint commissioners to superintend elections in the same, and to adopt all such regulations as may be necessary to give force and effect to the provisions of the act; and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the bill shall be repealed.

The bill was then read by sections for amendment; and the first section being under consideration,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee said: I move to strike out the words "and shall have paid the school tax, and all taxes on personal property, due from him."

My qualification for a voter is, that he shall be a free white man, a citizen of the United States, twenty-one years of age, and a resident, for a certain length of time, in the place where he proposes to vote, excluding, of course, vagrants, felons, paupers, and persons non compos mentis, as they are excluded in this bill. These words which I move to strike out prescribe a qualification for voters which I think is opposed to the spirit and genius of the institutions of this country. I am opposed to all property qualifications, to all money qualifications, for voting purposes. I am willing that this corporation shall have the power to tax each person named in the bill; but when you give them the power to levy a tax, it is their business to collect it. But I will not recognize this most odious property qualification making a citizen's right to vote dependent upon the payment of this tax. I think that should be no qualification of a voter; and it is so contrary to my notions of what should be the qualifications of a voter that I cannot vote for any bill containing such a provision.

Mr. STANTON. I wish some gentleman would have the goodness to inform me what is the basis of the assessment of the school tax?

Mr. GOODE. It is a capitation tax.

Mr. STANTON. Then I do not see any objection to the provision. As I understand it, this bill amounts, practically, to a registry law.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This, as I understand it, is a poll-tax, and you propose to make the right of a man to vote dependent upon the payment of that tax.

Mr. GOODE. I merely wish to say that this clause is intended to enforce the registration of voters, and requires them to pay the moderate tax which is assessed before they exercise the right of voting.

The question being upon the amendment submitted by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee,

Mr. TALBOT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and Buffinton were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, nays 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to amend the first section of the bill by inserting after the word "male," in the eighth line, the words "citizen of the United States;" and by striking out the words "and who shall be a citizen of the United States at the time he offers to vote;" so that it will read, "every free white male citizen of the United States, resident of the city of Washington, of the age of twenty-one years," &c.

My proposition is, to give to citizens of the United States who have resided in this city one year prior to the election, the right to vote; and not to confer it upon every citizen of the United States who may have been here thirty days. This clause, as it now reads, is evidently intended to confer upon the foreigner who may have resided here for a year, and who may be naturalized on the day of the election, the right to vote. My amendment will have the effect to require the citizenship to run with the residence for one year. I think there should be permanent residence connected with citizenship to confer the right of suffrage. I do not think it fair or right that the clerk in one of the Departments, who is a sojourner here, engaged upon the public business, and who does not, by being so engaged, lose, in point of law, his residence in the State from which he came, should have the right to vote in elections in the city of Washington. I do not believe that it is fair to citizens who own estate in the city of Washington, and whose estate is to be assessed and taxed, that the thousand and one office-holders in the city shall have, upon the factitious residence which this creates, a right to regulate and control the assessment and taxation of property, and the regulation of the persons who are permanently resident here. I do not think it right to place the control of the assessment and taxation of the property of these persons in the hands of a body of men who are not now citizens of the United States, but who may be made citizens of the United States between this day and the day of election. For that reason, I desire to cut off that provision which gives a man a right to vote in the ward in which he shall be on the day of election, and shall have been for thirty days preceding a bona fide resident. I do not think it right or fair that persons coming here in the employment of the Government, drawing a per diem allowance or a stated salary, having no other connection with the city of Washington than as office-holders, or workmen on the public buildings or on the public works, and not by that sort of employment losing their residences in the States from which they come, should be made voters for municipal purposes, and be enabled to tax the property of persons who are permanent residents of this city.

Mr. BURNETT. I propose to answer the latter portion of my colleague's speech first. I believe that under the theory of our Government, taxation and representation are inseparable—that the two always go together. He says that you ought not to permit mere sojourners in the District to vote in the city elections. This bill only proposes to permit such persons to vote as pay the school tax and all assessments upon personal property. Now, I hold, if men come here and hold offices in the Departments, although you may call them mere sojourners, for a temporary purpose, and they are taxed while they are here, that in the elections for officers of the corporation which levies these taxes, they ought to have a voice. That is my answer to the latter part of my colleague's speech.

Now, sir, such is my colleague's American zeal, so intense is his American feeling, that everything connected with his action here as a legislator has but one point; and that, it seems to me, is to make war upon the adopted citizens of the country. He proposes now, by this amendment, virtually to extend the period of naturalization to six years. That is its effect. Now, by what course of reasoning can the conclusion be reached that a man who has been a resident in the District for one year prior to the election, and has been subject to taxation, and who has become a citizen of the United States, although he may heretofore have been a foreigner, should be excluded from voting? The native-born citizen of the United States may have resided here all his life, and he may not have become entitled to vote until the day of election. The reasoning of my colleague, if just and right, ought to exclude both of these classes of citizens. These men are taxed by the corporate authorities here if they have property, and are as much interested in the government of the city as any others. I ask the committee whether they are prepared to carry out the extreme views of my colleague in regard to those whom he is pleased to call foreign-born citizens? Under this bill none are permitted to vote but tax-paying citizens. I, for one, will make no discrimination between the white male citizens of the United States, whether born upon foreign or American soil.

If he has complied with the necessary requisitions of the Constitution and the laws of my country to make him a citizen of the United States, then, sir, in my legislative action I shall favor that system which makes no unjust distinctions or discriminations against one class for the benefit of another.

I accord my colleague a high order of ability; but I had hoped the useful lesson taught him in Kentucky had cured him of the mania which he has on the subject of foreign-born citizens. I make the statement with pride, that the fell spirit of civil and religious proscription—a spirit which ran so wild in its fanaticism that neither life nor property was secure from it—a spirit which pervaded the city of Louisville, in my colleague's district—that that fell spirit has no longer with it the prestige of success in the proud old Commonwealth of Kentucky. We have buried it so deep that, in my humble judgment, the hand of resurrection will never reach it; and I will say to my colleague, as was said to him the other day, that he had better (if he will take the suggestion of so humble a man) abandon the political organization which has engendered this proscriptive spirit. This is not the time, in the middle of the nineteenth century, for the dogmas which constitute the principles of that party. In this connection, I will say to him, as was said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] that "While the lamp holds out to burn,

The vilest sinner may return."

I hope that the committee will vote down the amendment, containing, as it does, an unjust discrimination against one class of the citizens of this country.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, therodomontade of my colleague is entirely out of place here. He puts his anti-Americanism into the wrong box. He would have found, if he had given wing to his intellect, that my amendment produces no discrimination, whatever, between a native and an adopted citizen.

Mr. BURNETT. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. BURNETT. I will ask him this question: If a man resides here for five years, and has taken the initiatory steps for the purpose of becoming naturalized, does not the gentleman, by his amendment, require a longer residence for him to vote than would be required for a native-born citizen?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will answer my colleague. If he will look at the effect of my amendment, he will find by it that we do not notice the alien at all. We confine the regulation of our elections to citizens of the United States. We do not notice the alien who is in our midst. We require, by the amendment, from the citizen of the United States, who may come from Maryland, the same residence exactly that we require from the adopted citizen who comes here from Maryland. Do you not perceive that my amendment will read, that from and after the passage of this act, every free white male citizen of the United States, resident of the city of Washington, who shall have resided in the city one year immediately preceding the day of election, &c.? It refers to this class alone. It requires, in the first place, that the voter shall be a citizen of the United States. It does not discriminate between the native and the adopted citizen; and in the second place, it requires a residence here of one year, to enable a citizen to vote. But my colleague asks, if an alien has resided here up to this day, and wanted to vote on the first Monday in June, will not my amendment cut him off if he shall be naturalized that day? I say that it will, because he will not fall within the qualifications required by the law. If he was twenty-one years of age to-day, and had been born and resided here all his lifetime, will not your amendment cut him off?

Mr. BURNETT. It will not.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. You do not allow him to vote unless he shall be borne upon the tax-book and upon the registry.

Mr. BURNETT. With my colleague's permission, I will again interrupt him. If he will look at another provision, he will find that the names of those left off the assessors' books may be placed there within ten days of the election.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. That is where names are left off from inadvertence. The section of the bill reads:

"No person shall be allowed to vote at any election as aforesaid, unless he shall have been returned on the books of the corporation of said city as subject to a school tax; and it shall be the duty of the register of said city, in addition to the names of persons so returned by the assessors of said city, upon satisfactory proof under oath, to be administered by some justice of the peace of the county of Washington, that the name of any such person has been accidentally or willfully omitted from said books, to place the same thereon at any time after he shall have received said books from the assessors, up to ten days before the said election; and in case any such person shall be absent from the city at said time, or under twenty-one years of age, and his name in consequence thereof be omitted from said books, then, upon his return, or becoming of age, at any time after the day of registration, and before the day of said election, and upon satisfactory proof thereof made as aforesaid, the said register shall place the name of such person so returning on said books. And if any person shall knowingly swear falsely in the premises, he shall, upon indictment and conviction thereof before any court competent to try the same, be adjudged guilty of willful and corrupt perjury, and punished accordingly."

I had not observed, before, the extent of the qualification in favor of the minor coming of age. Still, it does not remove my objection. I say that the residence required ought to be the residence of the citizen; and that the residence of the alien, pending his alienage, ought not to count under our laws. Our laws should refer only to our citizens.

Mr. GOODE obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, my colleague well remembers a decision of our court of appeals on this very question. I have examined it, and I believe that it is almost identically the same on the subject of residence. It was decided by one of our inferior courts that the one year's residence was absolutely necessary, although the man may have been naturalized between the commencement of the year prior to the election and the day of the election; and our court of appeals reversed that decision. On what ground did they reverse that decision? On the ground that I have taken here, that it was an unjust discrimination against one class of our citizens, which discrimination was never contemplated.

My colleague will remember that this was decided last winter by our court of appeals. I refer my colleague to it to show that I am right. The election takes place here on the first Monday of June. Suppose a foreigner had been residing in this city for twenty years, and that he was naturalized and became a citizen of the United States on the 1st day of July last: although he may have paid taxes here and been subject to all the burdens of citizenship, yet he cannot vote; and you extend the period of disability from five years to five years and eleven months. That is the effect of it; and, that being so, it is an unjust and unwise discrimination against one class of our citizens.

Mr. GOODE. I wish to offer a single suggestion in reply to the remarks of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL.] He affirms that it is not his purpose to make an unjust discrimination between different classes of citizens of the United States. To me, it does seem his proposition does make such an invidious distinction. Under the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, no credit of residence in the city is allowed to the person of foreign birth laboring under the disability prior to the period of naturalization. No residence, during that term, is allowed to satisfy the requisition of residence. In the case of an infant, such a residence does satisfy the requisition of residence. So in the case of a native-born citizen: though he may be laboring under a disability during the term of his residence; although he may not qualify during the term of that disability, yet if he resides within the city during the term of that disability, the residence is sufficient to satisfy the requisition of residence, and he may be allowed to vote as soon as the disability is removed. But such is not the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] when it affects the foreign-born citizen. His disqualification continues for a year after his naturalization takes place. His disqualification is removed, and yet you will not allow his previous residence to satisfy the requisition of residence as it does in the case of the native-born infant.

Now, sir, in the last Congress the gentleman from Kentucky was understood to urge his objection to the bill then pending, upon the ground that it made an unjust discrimination between the native-born minor and the unnaturalized foreigner. We endeavored to frame this bill to satisfy that objection. He introduced a proposition to exclude both classes of voters. We have introduced a proposition proposing to admit both classes, and therefore make no discrimination between these classes. If the gentleman from Kentucky, with his philological skill, can aid us in carrying out the object which he professes to be bona fide in favor of, I shall be obliged to him.

I believe we have accomplished this object by this bill, by allowing both parties to vote under precisely the same circumstances, and nothing more. Our theory is, that when a man becomes a citizen of this country, whatever may be the place of his birth, that his character is identified with us, and he ought to have all the rights and privileges of American citizens. If it be the will of the country to extend the period of naturalization, I shall not complain. I believe that five years is long enough. But if the majority of the country are of the opinion that a longer term is necessary, I shall urge no serious objection. But so long as five years is the term which we require to entitle a man to become a citizen of this country, it seems to me unjust, after a foreign-born citizen has been in the country and in the city for a sufficient time to bring himself within the definition of an American citizen, to require him to reside here for another additional year before he is allowed to vote. The gentleman surely does not desire that, when the native minor here is allowed to vote as soon as his disability shall have ceased.

I earnestly desire to do justice to both these parties, and I think it is done in the bill which has been reported by the committee; and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky will not be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky by inserting "two" years instead of one. The whole bill is open for discussion, and I wish to make a few observations upon some of its provisions.

Mr. GOODE. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman from Maryland, but it appears to me that we are reading this bill section by section, and that it is in order to confine the debate to the amendment and section under consideration.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I suppose the whole bill is open to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that, strictly speaking, the debate should be confined to the section under consideration; but the Chair understands that it has been the practice in committee to consider the whole bill open to debate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I suppose it is competent for me to discuss the merits of the whole bill. I did not come into the House with the knowledge that any such bill as this was to be proposed for consideration. I did not know that, as the municipal election in the city of Washington is approaching, we should have had the same proceedings repeated that have been repeated at almost every election, or preceding almost every election, for the last two or three years.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I will say that I think he is laboring under a mistake when he makes the statement that a bill has been pending here for the last three or four years, preceding every election. Now, if the gentleman from Maryland will remember, the last municipal election in this city took place in 1855. That is my recollection.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. No, sir; in June, 1856.

Mr. BURNETT. Well, sir, this bill is substantially the same as that which was pending subsequent to, and not prior to, the last municipal election in this city.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. My friend from Kentucky is mistaken as to the time of the pendency of that measure. I remember to have taken some part in that discussion, and hence I am quite certain in my recollection.

Mr. HILL. I see, by reference to the statutes, that this law passed on the 16th of May, 1856.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. My friend will, therefore, see that it was prior to the date of that election.

But, sir, what I wish first to say is, that my friend from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] who has charge of this measure, a few weeks ago was before the House pressing upon us another measure to strengthen the hands of the municipal authorities of the city of Washington. Then a number of very grave occurrences were stated to the House, and a degree of excitement prevailed in the House, with reference to the personal safety of gentlemen in the city, that I have never before seen equaled. The purpose of the bill then proposed was to secure personal safety by creating a metropolitan police, under the control of the Executive. The distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] opposed that bill, upon what struck me as a profound and statesmanlike ground. He thought that the evil was not in the deficiency of physical force, but that it lay in the incompetency or in the neglect of those administering the municipal government. I entirely concur with that gentleman in that view.

I desire to say now, that we are brought, for whatever purpose, to the consideration, virtually, of the organization of the government of the city of Washington; for, sir, those who shall wield the police power of the city are to be elected by the voters, whose qualifications are indicated in this bill; and I think that gentlemen who were so zealous and earnest in endeavoring to arm the Mayor with adequate power to enforce the laws, have now an opportunity to consider the principles of the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, and apply them to the construction of that power which designates the Mayor, and places in the hands of the Mayor the authority which he is to exercise. That gentleman said rightly, that we were attempting to remedy, by an increase of force, that which only could be remedied by changing the spirit which presided over that force. That can only be changed by placing the power of election in competent and responsible hands. If that be so, what ought we do here?

We are not legislating for a city like Louisville, for a city like New York, a city like Baltimore, or a city like Boston, where there is a permanent population, whose life is to be spent in the city in which they are living, who are born there, who grow up there, and expect to die there, or whose lot is cast there by their own choice, for good or for evil. We are legislating for the Federal city, where there is a comparatively small portion of permanent residents, and where there are a great proportion of temporary residents; not merely, Mr. Chairman, a floating population, which comes to-day and goes to-morrow, for the purpose of transacting business; but I say temporary residents. By those I mean, in the first place, several hundred, possibly, a thousand, clerks in the various Government Departments, some of whom keep house here, others of whom do not, most of whom are not permanent residents, and look to leaving the city at the end of four years. Those persons, when they shall have resided here one year, under the terms of this bill, will only have a prospective residence of three years in the city. That class of voters can, in no sense, be said to be identified with the interests of the city of Washington. Few or none of them are owners of property, real or personal, except the furniture of their houses. There are none of them engaged in the transaction of any permanent business here. They are what, in the States, we would call independent men. Most of them are dependent upon the mere will of the Government, be it of what political complexion it may, for their daily bread; and they therefore combine those qualities most unfortunate when they happen to exist in the persons who are to determine an election, municipal or national. They are temporary in their residence, having no community of interest with the people whom they are to govern, and they are under the will of the political power which furnishes their bread, and may need their votes. What I say here, I do not desire to be regarded as saying in relation to the existing Administration, or the last Administration, any more than I do in reference to a future Administration. Those who hold political power are, in many respects, the same, irrespective of party. Any Government which controls a man's bread, can and does control his vote; and those who are under that control, if they form a great proportion of the population, as they do here, ought not to be allowed to exercise a direct and controlling influence in a city where they are merely temporary and passing residents. That vote is a very material one in this city. It amounts to from six hundred to one thousand, I suppose.
